In Laredo, Tex., President Bush was also upbeat, saying that remarks by Iranian officials sound "like a positive response to me." He repeated his new offer for the United States to "sit down at the table" with the Iranians, but only if "they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way."

Several weeks ago, the administration rejected entreaties by the other powers to give Iran explicit security guarantees that the United States would not intervene politically or militarily in Iran's internal affairs, senior officials involved in the negotiations said. The United States has not ruled out military action against Iran.

Instead, it has committed itself in the incentives package only to support the creation of a vague regional forum to discuss issues of mutual concern, officials said.

The Iranian foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, also welcomed the initiative and said after a separate meeting with Mr. Solana that the talks had "ushered in a new prospect," according to Iran's official IRNA news agency.

But he characterized Iran's enrichment program as solely designed for "research," suggesting that it must be allowed. "What is important in giving the incentives is supporting Iran's rights on research in technology," he said. "This issue should be very clear and without any ambiguity in the negotiations."

Iran is still continuing to enrich uranium at its vast site at Natanz, and Mr. Solana told the Iranians they had only "weeks" to decide whether to accept the offer, officials said.

However, he has not ruled out another meeting or even another trip to Iran, the officials added.

Mr. Larijani indicated that the Iranian side was in no rush to decide, saying, "We hope, after we study the proposal in detail, we will have another round of talks and negotiations to reach a balanced and logical conclusion."

Still, it was striking that both sides characterized the talks in positive terms. And in his brief but temperate public response, Mr. Larijani did not repeat Iran's longstanding position that it would never relinquish what it considers its sovereign right to nuclear energy, nor did he automatically reject any demand for a freeze on its enrichment-related activities.

DOJ_NMG_0032532

The crisis over Iran's nuclear program, which Iran insists is for peaceful purposes, reached new urgency in April after Iran announced it had enriched uranium to the low levels needed to fuel a nuclear reactor. But Iran has run into technical difficulties and has made little progress since then, which may make it more willing to slow its program.

France, Germany and Britain announced after the collapse of their 2004 agreement with Iran to freeze its nuclear-related activities that they would be willing to engage in new talks only if Iran returned to a complete freeze of uranium enrichment at Natanz.

The United States is demanding that all enrichment-related activities be suspended before any negotiations start.

So it is unclear what exactly would constitute "negotiations" and whether the Iranians will use talks with Mr. Solana as a way to continue their enrichment activities while seeking even more concessions.

Iran has offered to freeze plans for large-scale enrichment of uranium, which it probably is not technically capable of carrying out. It has tried repeatedly during the negotiations that started in 2003 to continue what it has called "research" involving a limited number of fast-spinning centrifuge machines.

"The trick is to get into a dialogue," said one senior European diplomat involved in the discussions. "Both sides have preconditions for talks and we have to find a way out. We have been asking for suspension of all enrichment-related activities as a precondition for negotiations and that is exactly what they said they cannot do."

U.S. Risks Political Backlash In Iran Nuclear Offer (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A package of U.S-backed incentives presented to Iran includes proposals for wide-ranging civilian nuclear cooperation as well as new trade perks such as allowing Tehran to replace its aging fleet of commercial aircraft.

If Iran is willing to abide by international nuclear rules, the deal also calls for sweeping European involvement in Iran's oil and gas industry and for Iran's "full integration into international structures" such as the World Trade Organization, according to a draft of the package whose contents were confirmed by a senior U.S. official.

But if Iran refuses to go along, the document says, the international community would adopt "proportionate" punishments ranging from travel bans on high-ranking officials to a possible arms embargo and "a general freeze of assets of Iranian financial institutions."

Some of the nuclear provisions could stir opposition both on Capitol Hill and among conservatives in President Bush's own party.

In their bid to get Tehran to end its uranium-enrichment program and return to multiparty negotiations, the U.S. and its international partners are offering "state of the art" light-water reactor technologies for electricity generation, including components under U.S. patent but built by European companies, according to U.S. officials. The deal put to Iran also promises to provide "a substantive package" of nuclear research and development cooperation.

Under the deal, which the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, presented yesterday to Iranian authorities in Tehran, U.S. officials say they would desist from sanctioning foreign companies that transfer controlled nuclear technology to Iran. The U.S. would also agree, possibly with certain restraints, to allow the sale of certain components containing U.S. technologies. "It's a licensing issue," said one senior Bush administration official.

General Electric Co., for one, could benefit from such an agreement. The company manufactures nuclear reactors, most recently building reactors in Japan and Taiwan. GE is eyeing the market for new reactors in China and India, and is partnering with electric utilities that are looking at building new plants in the U.S., where the market has been dormant for more than two decades.

In a major shift in policy, the Bush administration last week offered to join European-led talks with the Iranian government so long as Iran suspends its uranium-enrichment work.

After meeting with Mr. Solana, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, gave a relatively upbeat assessment that omitted Tehran's usual insistence on its right to enrichment. The international proposals -- presented by the U.S., Britain, France, Russia,

DOJ_NMG_0032533

China and Germany -- contained "some positive steps in them and some ambiguities which should be removed," he said, adding that Iran was prepared to enter "another round of talks and negotiations to achieve a balanced and logical conclusion."

President Bush yesterday said the reaction from Tehran "sounds like a positive response to me."

Sales of U.S.-licensed nuclear technologies to Iran would almost certainly require changes to U.S. law. Suggestions that the U.S. might be prepared to go down that road drew a quick response from one ardent nuclear opponent, Democratic Rep. Edward Markey of Massachusetts, who said in a statement that "the U.S. is barred from exporting nuclear reactors, nuclear materials or nuclear technology to any country that is a state sponsor of terrorism."

Some conservatives also drew parallels to a similar Clinton administration-led effort to stem North Korea's development of nuclear weapons by agreeing to provide Pyongyang with nuclear fuel and advanced reactor technology. That agreement later fell apart as North Korea moved ahead on developing nuclear warheads. "Having finally killed the reactor deal with Pyongyang, we can't seem to control our urge to cut another similar deal with Iran," said Henry Sokolski, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program.

Critics fear the Iran deal could replicate mistakes the Clinton administration made in cutting its arrangement with North Korea. Under that deal, the U.S. agreed to help North Korea build two light-water reactors in return for Pyongyang giving up its pursuit of plutonium-based nuclear fuel. But in 2002, the Bush administration nixed the deal after U.S. intelligence said North Korea was pursuing a separate clandestine nuclear weapons program using highly-enriched uranium.

Others worry that the new U.S. approach toward Iran is still too incremental and too focused on the nuclear issue to be of much effect. Robert Einhorn, a proliferation expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, argues that the main issues for Iran are prestige and security. And the only way the U.S. can address those, he said, "is for the administration to hold out the possibility of normalized relations with Iran."

Those Were The Days, When Reform Was In Flower (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

TEHRAN — The windowless room was crowded and hot as Mostafa Moin, former reform candidate for president of Iran, worked his way past the folding chairs filled with people applauding his appearance.

Mr. Moin lost his bid for the presidency last year. Actually, he came in fourth, a distant fourth, signaling the collapse of his party, the Islamic Participation Front, once a promising force for change in Iran.

But this was a celebration, marking the day on the Iranian calendar called the Second of Khordad, May 23, when Mohammad Khatami was first elected president in 1997, shocking the status quo and ushering in hope of a kinder, gentler, more democratic Iran. Every year since that historic day, those self-identified as reformers have joined together to celebrate the anniversary.

But the Khatami era has passed, and now this party sits on the sidelines, celebrating — mourning, actually — in a cramped basement, as elements of a new Iran continue to emerge in many ways in spite of those years, not because of them. In the end, it seems, Mr. Khatami and his conservative opponents had the same end in mind: to preserve the theocratic system.

Many people here are now realizing that real reform in Iran, such as it is, will be driven from the bottom up, slowly, stubbornly, no matter how repressive or punitive the rulers choose to be. It is a cliché, for sure, but the phrase on the lips of weary Iranians in Tehran is "evolution, not revolution." No one seems to have the stomach for starting over again.

The change is glacial in pace but forward moving. Political analysts here say the hard-liners of today are promoting ideas introduced by the reform camp two decades ago.

"It is not possible to make a very big jump," said Emadedin Baghi, director of a prisoners' rights group, who studied religion for many years. "Some reformers thought that they could make a big jump. But it is an evolution that will proceed millimeter by millimeter."

At the party meeting, there was music and poetry reading and upbeat talk about looking to the future, even while every speaker seemed to focus on the past, and the whole thing seemed more like a funeral than a pep rally.

DOJ_NMG_0032534

People loitered outside, smoking cigarettes and looking a bit dazed, as though they had just bumped into the former star of the high school baseball team stocking supermarket shelves while telling stories about the glory days gone by.

It was not just Mr. Moin's defeat that shocked the reformers; many sensed that was coming. It was the victory of the un-Khatami, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the tough-talking, Holocaust-denying apparatchik who catapulted from obscurity to become the head of state. Reformers insisted that with his less-than-diplomatic approach to diplomacy and his willingness, perhaps eagerness, to antagonize the West, Mr. Ahmadinejad was going to dial back to the earliest days of the revolution.

But even if that was his plan, Mr. Ahmadinejad has been foiled. There has been a tightening of political speech and a general sense of unease around the country as the West confronts Iran over its nuclear program. But in political terms, Iran's opponents have taken a page from one another's books.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has emerged, at least in words, as a defender of women's rights, trying unsuccessfully to allow them into stadiums for the first time since 1979 and refraining from cracking down on women in relatively revealing dress.

For their part, the remnants of the Islamic Participation Front have begun to follow Mr. Ahmadinejad's lead, suggesting that he understood the electorate far better than they did. After recoiling from public life, the reformers have set aside their lofty talk of religious democracy and social freedoms and are instead focusing on the issues that have come to define the president: security, the economy and nuclear development.

"I am looking to the future," insisted Abdullah Ramezanzadeh, Mr. Khatami's former spokesman, as he hurried off after his speech. Asked why there was no talk of democracy or social freedoms during the anniversary, but instead a heavy emphasis on the economy and security, he said, "The public is looking for something like this now."

Yet speaker after speaker said everything was better under the Khatami administration. And they suggested that they would return to power not because of new ideas, but because the new president would ultimately fail on his bread-and-butter programs.

Even on the nuclear confrontation, Mr. Ahmadinejad's signature issue, the reformers said, his combative approach has actually diminished the chances of opening a nuclear power plant anytime soon because of international hostility to Iran.

"We ran the nuclear policy to a very proud spot," said Mohsen Aminzadeh, a former special envoy of President Khatami's. "This policy was damaged, and we hope there will be no more damage done."

But if the reformers are hoping to return to power, they may want to consider plain old pothole politics. It may be a lesson, too, for Mr. Ahmadinejad, as his public waits for him to deliver on his campaign promises of jobs and low-cost bank loans. The reformers still talked at this meeting about participatory democracy; Mr. Ahmadinejad likes to talk about enriching uranium.

Hamid Shahrabi is waiting for a bank loan, and a job.

"I helped Ahmadinejad for 15 days, putting up posters during his campaign," said Mr. Shahrabi, 33, who lives with his wife and two small children in one small, unfurnished room in East Tehran. "But it was no use. Nothing happened for me."

Mr. Shahrabi said he had already given up on clerics, like Mr. Khatami, and had thought that by campaigning for Mr. Ahmadinejad he might at least qualify for a low-cost loan that would help reduce his $14 a month rent, which he has trouble paying. His only source of income is ferrying passengers on his scooter around the traffic-choked streets of Tehran.

His bank loan was denied three times and, for the moment, he has lost faith in the system, but he is open to anyone who will actually help him find a job, pay his medical bills and buy him a chair to sit in.

When asked to identify Iran's primary problem, he replied, "It's the leadership."

Bush Worried About Instability In Somalia (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

President Bush expressed concern on Tuesday that volatile conditions in Somalia could lead al-Qaida to use it as a staging ground to plan attacks.

"There's instability in Somalia," Bush said in Texas where he was traveling. "The first concern, of course, is to make sure that Somalia does not become an al-Qaida safe haven — it doesn't become a place from which terrorists can plot and plan."

Bush said he talked on Monday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about the instability in Somalia where Islamic militiamen have claimed control of Mogadishu, the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0032535

"We're watching very carefully the developments there, and we will strategize more when I get back to Washington as to how to best respond to the latest incident there in Somalia," Bush said.

In Washington, the State Department rejected widespread media reports that U.S. policy in Somalia has suffered a severe setback with the militant Islamic group's takeover in Mogadishu.

The situation in Mogadishu is "very fluid" and has been for years, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Without offering specifics on the nature of U.S. activities in Somalia, McCormack said the United States has a strong interest in fighting foreign terrorists in the Horn of Africa.

He recalled that al-Qaida chieftain Osama bin Laden sought refuge a decade ago in Sudan, located to the west of Somalia, before heading for Afghanistan.

Somalia's Islamic Extremists Set U.S. Back (AP)

By Chris Tomlinson

AP, June 6, 2006

The success of Islamic extremists fighting for control of Somalia's capital is an important setback in the U.S. war on terrorism, with the defeat of a counterterrorism alliance providing hope for militants elsewhere in the region.

Somalia's location in the Horn of Africa and its role as a cultural bridge with the Middle East gives the country strategic importance, so much so that the United States has posted troops in neighboring Djibouti to try to prevent terror groups from taking hold in the Horn of Africa.

But U.S. efforts to influence chaotic, clan-riven Somalia have consistently fallen flat, sometimes with deadly results. The United States has not carried out any direct action in Somalia since the deaths of 18 servicemen there on a humanitarian mission in a 1993 battle in Mogadishu depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

Islamic radicals seized control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, on Monday, defeating U.S.-backed warlords in weeks of fighting that left more than 330 people dead.

Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, U.S. officials have expressed concerns that Somalia could become a haven for terrorists, a concern State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeated on Monday.

"We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia, and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia," McCormack said in Washington.

A U.S. official told The Associated Press recently that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering three al-Qaida leaders indicted in the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The same al-Qaida cell is believed responsible for the 2002 suicide bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya, which killed 15 people, and a simultaneous attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner over Kenya.

Now men willing to shelter al-Qaida suspects have established their authority, if limited to Mogadishu.

The U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, confirmed the U.S. was cooperating with the secular warlords to capture the men. But the warlords took that narrow goal and turned it into a bid to defeat the Islamic leaders who had within two years developed the most powerful militia in Somalia.

The Islamic extremists — some of whom had contacts with al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden in the 1990s — had co-opted an Islamic court system that provided the only means of justice since Somalia's last effective central government collapsed in 1991.

The Islamic Courts Union portrayed itself to a war-weary public as a neutral, religious organization capable of bringing peace and prosperity. The union's leaders condemned the warlords for being responsible for 16 years of chaos and anarchy and rejected a U.N.-backed government formed in Kenya as being too secular and not authentically Somali.

When the warlords formed the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism, the Islamic leaders immediately dismissed it as the work of U.S. agents, who were often seen visiting the alliance's leaders.

Appealing to Somali nationalism, while exploiting public hatred for the warlords and anti-American sentiment common among Muslims across East Africa, the Islamic leaders garnered widespread support.

DOJ_NMG_0032536

Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Court Union, told supporters on Tuesday that his group would continue fighting until all of Somalia falls under the union's authority. The courts have already made alliances with rebels from outside of Somalia to accomplish their goal.

Residents of Mogadishu, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal, have reported seeing hundreds of non-Somali militia — including non-Africans — fighting alongside the Islamic forces. At least 600 Ethiopian rebels from the predominantly Muslim Oromo National Liberation Front have been seen manning checkpoints in Mogadishu.

The Oromo "share the Muslim faith with Somalis and if someone convinced them that this revolution in Somalia will eventually become an Islamic state across the whole region, including the Oromo region of Ethiopia, they will think it is worth fighting for," said Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., a hub of expatriate Somalis.

There are Islamic extremist elements in Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania and Eritrea, all watching what is happening in Somalia and how the United States reacts.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Ahmed said in a radio broadcast Monday in a veiled reference to the United States and its proxies.

McCormack has said the United States will back the U.N.-sponsored Somali government, now residing in Baidoa, 140 miles northwest of Mogadishu.

Whether that government can defeat or co-opt Islamic radicalism in Somalia is the key question.

Protesters Rally To Challenge Islamists In Somalia (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

New York Times, June 7, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, June 6 — Tensions remained high in Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, on Tuesday, as the Islamic militants who seized control of the city the day before vowed to set up a religious state, while thousands of protesters allied with one of the country's largest clans pledged to challenge the effort.

The warlords who have been pushed from their strongholds in Mogadishu said they would fight back against the Islamists, said news agency reports from the capital.

Bashir Rageh, a warlord who lost control of a key airstrip and port in March, and Muse Sudi Yalahow, another important Mogadishu leader who has lost ground to the Islamic militias, joined thousands of their backers from the Abgal clan at a stadium north of the capital to denounce the Islamic courts and militias that have taken the city.

"Our clan has agreed to defend our land, and we will fight the courts hiding under the cloak of Islam and trying to fool our people," said Mr. Rageh, who was protected by heavily armed security men.

As the protesters rallied, the leaders of the alliance of Islamic courts insisted in a letter to American officials and other diplomats that they were not hiding terrorists, as the United States has claimed, and instead were seeking friendly relations with the outside world.

In the letter, Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, the alliance that control the militias, accused Americans of fueling the fierce fighting in Mogadishu by backing the warlords who he said have terrorized the country for the last 15 years.

An array of Africa analysts, academics and Somali politicians said Washington had made financial payments to the warlords in recent months in an effort to root out members of Al Qaeda who American officials contend are being sheltered inside Mogadishu by the Islamists.

"We categorically deny and reject any accusation that we are harboring any terrorists or supporters of terrorism in the areas where the courts operate," the sheik wrote.

He welcomed visitors to Mogadishu, which has long been considered too unsafe for international diplomats, to see whether terrorists are operating there. "We have nothing to hide from the international community," he said.

In Washington, a senior Bush administration official said the administration was willing to take the letter at face value. "If they're going to be a credible, legitimate political actor, and not support Al Qaeda and terrorism, then we'd encourage the transitional government to work with them," said the official, who could not be identified because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0032537

Some critics argued that American efforts in Somalia did not add up to a coherent policy, and that recent events had caught policy makers off guard. "The problem is that we don't have any strategy at all," said Sen. Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat who is the Senate's leading expert on Somalia. "We weren't even paying attention."

Sheik Sharif Ahmed mentioned nothing in the letter about his plans for turning Somalia into an Islamic state, but he raised the topic at a gathering of hundreds of supporters in Mogadishu on Tuesday. "Until we get the Islamic state, we will continue with the Islamic struggle in Somalia," he said, according to news agency reports.

Also left unaddressed by the sheik was whether the Islamic court leaders would work with the new transitional government that is operating in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu.

The counter-rally, which was held about a mile from positions held by Islamic militias, underscored the challenges that the new rulers of the capital would face in consolidating power after 15 years of anarchy there. Clan allegiance has long been the most powerful force in Somalia, trumping religion. By rallying the Abgal clan, opponents of the Islamists have sought to redefine the conflict.

Our Failure In Somalia (WP)

By John Prendergast

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

It was before "Black Hawk Down," before Somalia became the only country in the world without a government, that I took my first trip there. It changed my life. This was in the mid-1980s, when the United States was underwriting a warlord dictator in support of our Cold War interests, at the clear expense of basic human rights. As a young, wide-eyed activist-in-training, I couldn't accept the idea that my government would use defenseless Somali civilians as pawns on its strategic chessboard -- in a strategy that ultimately produced only state collapse, civil war and famine.

Twenty years later the enemy has changed, but the plot is hauntingly similar. In recent trips to the capital, Mogadishu, I have seen evidence of U.S. support to warlord militia leaders in the name of counterterrorism operations. Since the beginning of the year, pitched battles between U.S.-backed warlords and Islamist militias in Mogadishu have claimed hundreds of lives and displaced thousands of families.

Now "our" warlords -- and by extension our counterterrorism strategy -- have been dealt a crushing defeat by the Islamists, as the latter have consolidated control of Mogadishu. Our short-term interest in locating al-Qaeda suspects has thus been undermined, and the risk of a new safe haven being created for international terrorists has been greatly increased.

The statelessness in Somalia has already been allowing al-Qaeda and other destructive forces to operate there. The president of a neighboring country told me recently that the "governance vacuum is growing larger, with very negative implications for Somalia. It increases the potential for international terrorists to use the structures that are filling the vacuum for safe haven and logistical purposes."

It was partly from Somali soil that al-Qaeda organized and carried out two serious terrorist attacks, in Kenya and Tanzania, against U.S. embassies and a foreign-owned hotel, and narrowly missed bringing down an Israeli passenger jet with two surface-to-air missiles. A plot to crash an airplane into the U.S. Embassy in Kenya was foiled. "Soft" targets are legion throughout East Africa, and intelligence indicates that new attacks are being planned.

Somalia is an al-Qaeda recruiter's dream -- with rampant unemployment, travel restrictions, and no government or foreign investment -- and young Somalis will turn to terrorism for money and, occasionally, because of shared ideology. Schools run by Islamic charities are graduating large numbers of students, many of whom are being taught in Arabic instead of Somali and who have no prospect of meaningful work. Drug dealers and militias looking to restart conflict over economic interests find easy recruits, further destabilizing the area and sowing the seeds of radicalism.

The U.S. counterterrorism approach in Somalia isn't working: The al-Qaeda leaders sought by the United States there remain at large, and the Islamists who protect them are gaining ground against U.S.-backed militias, as this week's events show.

DOJ_NMG_0032538

With a growing chorus of voices, rightly or wrongly, blaming the United States and the warlords for the fighting, public opinion in Mogadishu has been swinging in favor of the Islamists.

In April the United States tried a different tack, inviting clan and political leaders to Kenya for talks and to enlist their support in dismantling the al-Qaeda safe haven. But fighting broke out as soon as the leaders returned to Mogadishu, making it seem as though one hand of the U.S. government didn't know what the other was doing.

A successful counterterrorism effort would require the United States to pull the political and military threads together into a coherent strategy of broader engagement. U.S. officials and those from other governments throughout the region uniformly have told me that long-term counterterrorism objectives can be achieved only by American investment in the Somali peace process. Yet the State Department has just one full-time political officer working on Somalia -- from neighboring Kenya, and he was just transferred out of the region for dissenting from the policy on proxy warlords. Somalia's ineffectual transitional government remains confined to the shaky central town of Baidoa, where it is still struggling to overcome internal divisions.

A functioning government that could ensure security would be a win-win scenario for Somalis and the United States, enabling the state apparatus to address the criminality and extremism that undermine progress in the country. This would provide a real partner for the war on terrorism in an area that has a track record for exporting trouble.

The continuation of Washington's current approach in Somalia would ensure that U.S. interests and those of other countries in the region remain dangerously vulnerable to terrorist attacks from this collapsed state. Continued fighting between Islamist elements and the U.S.-backed warlord alliance will breed resentment, attract recruits to the extremist cause and provide a training ground for new militants. The United States can no longer afford not to engage more deeply and directly in state reconstruction efforts in Somalia. It is in our national security interest to do so.

The writer is a senior adviser to the International Crisis Group. He worked for the National Security Council during the Clinton administration.

Somalia, Revisited (NYT)

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Terrorist groups linked to Al Qaeda may just have won a new foothold in the strategic Horn of Africa, as radical Islamist militias captured Somalia's capital, Mogadishu.

The immediate concern among many Somalis is a forcible imposition of harsh Islamic law, Taliban style. The larger international concern is that Mogadishu's new rulers may follow the Taliban's example in another way, sheltering international terrorist operations in a region within tempting striking distance of vulnerable countries on the Arabian peninsula and in East Africa.

The Bush administration wasn't exactly caught looking the other way. But with more than 130,000 American troops tied down in Iraq and some 20,000 more in Afghanistan, and with America's reputation in the Islamic world driven to an all-time low, Washington's ability to respond effectively to a very real danger was severely compromised.

For want of better options, the United States had thrown its support to a different set of warlords with few visible merits beyond their willingness to fight their Islamist rivals. But by some accounts, Washington's support for these warlords only discredited them in the eyes of many Somalis.

The parallels to Afghanistan when the Taliban took power in 1996 are uncanny, and frightening. The sequel, however, does not have to turn out quite as horribly. Mogadishu's new masters claim to be interested mainly in establishing peace, stability and Islamic rule at home. They insist that they are willing to talk with anybody, which at least raises a possibility that they could be talked out of sheltering international terrorists.

With good luck, perhaps a new battlefront with international terrorism may yet be avoided. Luck, however, is no substitute for a more supple and effective American strategy against a highly mobile foe like multinational Islamist terrorism. Washington needs to develop more agile responses of its own. It especially has to avoid getting drawn into quagmires that force it to fight on the terrorists' terms and timetable.

Abbas Extends Hamas Deadline On Israel (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

DOJ_NMG_0032539

AP, June 6, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas stepped back from a political showdown with his Hamas rivals, giving the Islamic militants several days to recognize Israel or face the voters in a referendum on the idea.

Abbas, a moderate, has been pushing the Hamas-led government to accept a proposal that calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel, implicitly recognizing the Jewish state. Abbas believes the plan will help lift the economic pressure on the Palestinians and allow him to pursue peace talks with Israel.

Hamas, which is sworn to Israel's destruction, has balked at the plan, demanding changes in the language, calling for more time to discuss it and saying it won't give in to deadlines.

"We are giving enough time, about three days, for our brothers in Hamas to reconsider their position," said Yasser Abed Rabbo, a top official of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Abbas also heads.

Hamas officials welcomed Abbas' offer to extend their dialogue but repeated their opposition to deadlines on the referendum.

Abbas initially gave Hamas until Tuesday to accept the plan. Officials said Abbas agreed to the delay at the request of unspecified Arab leaders.

Although a referendum would be nonbinding, a vote could deeply embarrass Hamas, putting public pressure on the group to moderate its violent ideology.

A new survey released Tuesday showed 77 percent of Palestinians would vote in favor of the proposal. The survey of 1,200 Palestinians was conducted by Bir Zeit University in the West Bank and had a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

Abbas' Fatah movement says the president will not accept amendments.

The delay gave Hamas some breathing room as it struggled with a devastating international economic boycott and increasingly bloody tensions with Fatah.

In the latest violence, a battle erupted early Wednesday between Hamas and Fatah forces in Gaza City. Hospital officials said one person was seriously wounded by gunfire.

On Tuesday, rocket-propelled grenades were fired at the pro-Fatah Preventive Security compound in the Gaza Strip, wounding three maintenance workers, officials said. Fatah officials accused Hamas of being behind the attack. Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas called the incident "regrettable" and urged restraint by all sides.

Meanwhile, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at a street in northern Gaza and at a building in Gaza City early Wednesday, witnesses said. No one was hurt.

Witnesses said the street targeted was a launching area for rockets aimed at Israel. Less than an hour earlier, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at a facility of the militant Popular Resistance Committees in Gaza City. The PRC claimed responsibility for firing nine rockets at an Israeli town on Tuesday.

Later Israeli aircraft fired three more missiles at empty fields, residents said. Israel often targets launching areas in northern Gaza with artillery and air strikes.

Palestinian officials said the referendum would be held about 45 days after an announcement by Abbas.

"We still have a chance to make this dialogue a success," Haniyeh said in Gaza. "Therefore we ask for more meetings and more dialogue and that we don't use the language of days and time as a threat."

The Palestinian plan was formulated by senior Hamas and Fatah prisoners held by Israel. Prisoners hold great weight in Palestinian society.

Israel opposes key elements of the 18-point document, but is staying on the sidelines during the internal Palestinian debate. At the same time, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is making a series of trips abroad to discuss policy.

After visiting the U.S. and Egypt, Olmert is to visit Jordan on Thursday for talks with King Abdullah II, both countries said. A Jordanian official said the king would try to persuade Olmert to drop his plan to set Israel's border unilaterally if talks with the Palestinians fail.

Exiled Hamas leader Mousa Abu-Marzouk told the AP by phone that his group had "accepted" an invitation by President Ali Abdullah Saleh of Yemen to top Hamas and Fatah representatives to continue talks on the prisoners' plan in Yemen.

Abbas politely declined the offer, according officials close to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0032540

Abbas has been involved in an increasingly bloody power struggle with Hamas since the Islamists defeated Fatah in legislative elections early this year. Sixteen people have been killed in clashes between the sides in recent weeks. Abbas was elected separately last year.

The financial crisis has left the government unable to pay the salaries of tens of thousands of civil servants. Israeli military officials said Hamas nonetheless has managed to smuggle hundreds of thousands of dollars into the Gaza Strip in recent weeks.

The money has enabled Hamas to sustain key operations, including charitable activities and operations of its new 3,000-member security force, the officials said.

Asked about the smuggling, government spokesman Ghazi Hamad did not deny it.

"We will look for money everywhere and every place. That is our right," he told Israel's Army Radio, in Hebrew.

US Welcomes Abbas Referendum Proposal (AFP-Y2)

AFP, June 6, 2006

The White House welcomed Palestinian Authority president Mahmud Abbas' call for holding a referendum on implicitly recognizing Israel.

"Abbas has demonstrated that he's somebody who wants to work toward a two-state solution" to the Middle East conflict, spokesman Tony Snow told reporters.

"I think it's important for Palestinians to wrestle with the issue of whether they want to have a two state solution," he said, referring to a US-backed effort to build a Palestinian state at peace with Israel.

Abbas was headed for a showdown with the Hamas government after winning the green light Tuesday to hold the referendum despite fierce opposition from the militant group, which argued that more time was needed for talks to resolve deep differences with Abbas's own Fatah faction.

Azzam al-Ahmed, an aide of the Palestinian leader who has played a key role in cross-party crisis talks over the last 10 days, said Abbas would announce the date of the referendum in a decree on Thursday.

Abbas spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina said a date for the referendum would be declared within 48 hours -- still leaving open the possibility of a last-minute compromise. Polling would take place 40 days after the announcement, he added.

However, there was little expectation that Hamas is about to change its tune, although a new poll showed the vast majority of Palestinians both back Abbas's call for a referendum and intend to vote in favour of a document first drawn up by a cross-party group of senior militants held in Israeli prisons.

"We're just going to have to wait and see what happens, whether he's able to have a referendum and what happens," Snow said as US President George W. Bush traveled here to push his immigration reform plans.

The document at the centre of the referendum calls for a national unity government, an end to attacks in Israel and the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel on land conquered by the Jewish state in 1967.

Such a blueprint would undercut Hamas's long-time platform of refusing to recognise Israel or disavow the use of violence even within the Jewish state's borders.

Abbas Delays Setting Date For Referendum (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 6 - Facing political and practical challenges, Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas gave Hamas more time Tuesday to endorse the creation of a future state on all territory occupied by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war before he sets a date for a referendum on the issue.

Abbas's decision to give Hamas until Friday to accept a two-state solution to the conflict, something the radical Islamic movement has rejected since its creation nearly two decades ago, comes in the midst of rising factional tensions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. A morning mortar attack on the Palestinian preventative security headquarters in Gaza wounded six people, including four officers.

But the delay also reflects the logistical difficulties Abbas would face in staging a referendum that Hamas, now running the Palestinian Authority's day-to-day operations, opposes in principle. Hamas officials have warned that they would not allow the vote to proceed, even though it could give them cover to moderate their hard-line position toward Israel at a time when foreign donors are demanding they do so in return for future aid.

DOJ_NMG_0032541

Abbas -- who in addition to being president of the Palestinian Authority is head of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Fatah movement -- met for several hours Tuesday in the West Bank city of Ramallah with the PLO executive committee, which voted to give him the authority to hold the vote.

But he told the committee that he would wait three days before setting a date to allow Hamas more time to endorse what is known as the prisoners' document, an 18-point declaration of principles signed last month by the leaders of Hamas, Fatah and other Palestinian factions being held in Israeli jails.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, a member of the committee, told reporters in Ramallah that "before the end of the week, President Abbas will hold a news conference to announce the holding of the referendum and the beginning of the process for carrying it out." But Abed Rabbo also said negotiations with Hamas would continue even after the date is set, saying the vote could be canceled up until the last moment.

The main element of the prisoners' document calls for the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem. Israel still occupies those areas, although it evacuated troops and settlers from Gaza last year. Hamas calls for a Palestinian state across territory that includes Israel, while Abbas favors its creation alongside the Jewish state.

With opinion polls showing broad support for the proposal, Abbas is hoping that a nonbinding vote on the matter will provide a clear expression of Palestinian desires for a peaceful resolution to the conflict and help revive negotiations with Israel.

A Bir Zeit University poll released Tuesday showed that 77 percent of those questioned would vote in favor of the prisoners' document, which demands internal Palestinian political reforms, the creation of a national unity government, the freeing of Palestinian prisoners and the right of refugees to return to their homes. The document also calls for armed and political opposition to the Israeli occupation to be focused in the territories, rather than inside Israel.

"At the end of the day, we are heading toward a vote," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah legislator and the chief Palestinian negotiator with Israel. Abbas "must go back to the people if he wants to avoid chaos in the streets. I think the only option now, even if the date was not set today, is for the Palestinians to vote."

Foreign donors suspended most aid to the Palestinian Authority following Hamas's victory over Fatah in January elections that brought the Islamic movement into government for the first time.

Israel also froze the monthly transfer of roughly $55 million in tax revenue it collects for the Palestinian government, an amount equal to nearly half its monthly payroll. Most of the authority's more than 150,000 employees have not been paid in three months, and unemployment and poverty rates are climbing in the territories.

But Abbas has declined to exercise his authority to fire Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a Hamas leader, for refusing to endorse a two-state solution, renounce violence and accept previously signed agreements that implicitly recognize the Jewish state's right to exist. Instead he has chosen the referendum to challenge Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement.

Hamas's imprisoned leaders play an important role in the movement's collective decision-making, along with leaders in exile and those inside the territories. While Hamas's more hard-line exile leadership rejected the document, Haniyeh and others in the government called it a starting point for discussion.

But Hamas prisoners called Tuesday for Abbas to cancel plans for a referendum and allow talks to continue between the two main Palestinian political movements. The six-point statement, posted on the Hamas Web site, states that the vote would be illegal and could cause more bloodshed.

"There's an opportunity for the success of the national dialogue," Haniyeh said after the three-day delay was announced to allow more time for talks. "But we reject the threat of using" deadlines.

Earlier in the day, three 60mm mortar shells were fired at the Palestinian preventative security service headquarters in Gaza. The attack wounded the four Palestinian officers and two maintenance workers.

Also Tuesday morning, Palestinian gunmen fired at least five rockets at the southern Israeli city of Sderot, including one that smashed into a home and another that landed near a school. One Israeli woman was wounded by shrapnel. Sderot's mayor warned the Israeli government that he would evacuate the city if the military did not stop the rocket fire.

DOJ_NMG_0032542

Indonesian Scolds U.S. On Terrorism Fight (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

New York Times, June 7, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, June 6 — Indonesia's defense minister warned the Bush administration on Tuesday that its approach to fighting terrorism was perceived as overbearing, and that the United States needed to be sensitive to local concerns.

"It's best that you leave the main responsibility of antiterrorist measures to the local government in question, and not be too overly insistent about immediate results arising from your perception about terrorists," the minister, Juwono Sudarsono, told reporters as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld stood nearby.

"It's important to us because, as the world's largest Muslim country, we are very aware of the perception, or misperception, that the United States is overbearing and overpresent and overwhelming in every sector of life in many nations and cultures," he added.

Mr. Rumsfeld arrived here Tuesday to help build the United States' newly restored ties with the Indonesian military. American military aid was gradually phased out after Indonesian security forces fired on civilians who were protesting Indonesian rule in East Timor in 1991.

In rebuilding ties with the Indonesian military, the Bush administration has said it is not only solidifying relations with an ally in its campaign against terrorist groups, but also reinforcing the importance of respecting human rights.

"The U.S. has established fully normal relations, with military-to-military relations with Indonesia," said Mr. Rumsfeld, who met with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono; Widodo Adi Sutjipto, a senior minister for security issues; and Mr. Sudarsono.

Some American lawmakers complain, however, that Indonesian officials who were linked to the abuses in East Timor have not been held accountable.

On Tuesday, it was the Indonesians who were free with their advice. One important lesson, Mr. Sudarsono said, was that the United States needed to be attuned to local concerns. Then the minister took the unusual step of repeating the counsel he had given Mr. Rumsfeld in a room packed with Indonesian and Western journalists.

"So I was telling the secretary just recently, just two minutes ago, that your powerful economy and your powerful military does lend to misperception and a sense of threat by many groups right across the world, not just in Indonesia," Mr. Sudarsono said.

Mr. Sudarsono's remarks prompted a quick reply by Mr. Rumsfeld, who insisted he had been sensitive to other nations' concerns from the start. "I have never indicated to any country that they should do something that they were uncomfortable doing," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The discussion over political perceptions had affected deliberations over one of the Bush administration's major efforts: the Proliferation Security Initiative, which calls for an international arrangement that would enable the United States and its allies to search cargo ships suspected of transporting biological, chemical and nuclear arms, as well as the missiles to deliver them.

The aim of the initiative, announced in 2003, is to keep unconventional weapons and their components out of the hands of terrorist groups and so-called rogue states. But the Indonesian government has been wary, perhaps because it wants to reinforce its claims over nearby waterways, or because it is concerned about public opinion regarding efforts to collaborate with the Bush administration.

Indonesia's Foreign Ministry bluntly rejected the initiative as a threat to Indonesian sovereignty when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice raised it in a March visit here.

Mr. Sudarsono was somewhat more supportive. In his closed-door meeting with Mr. Rumsfeld, he indicated that the proposal would be studied, and suggested that Indonesia would be willing to carry out some of the activities that are called for under the plan.

Yet at the news conference, Mr. Sudarsono gave a starker assessment, suggesting that the plan might be carried out only if it was limited in scope. "Perhaps we can agree on a limited framework of cooperation on an ad hoc basis.," he said.

Those comments caught Mr. Rumsfeld's team by surprise. It was not immediately clear whether Mr. Sudarsono was trying to balance domestic political considerations with his efforts to work with the Americans, or if there was a more fundamental difference between the sides.

DOJ_NMG_0032543

"Some Indonesian analysts view the United States as focused on the 'search and destroy' aspect of the war against terror, and feel that the United States has not focused sufficient attention to winning the 'hearts and minds' aspect of the struggle," according to a study by the Congressional Research Service.

In resuming American military assistance, the initial emphasis is to improve the Indonesian military's mobility, by providing spare parts for C-130 aircraft and helping to upgrade naval patrol vessels. The Indonesians have also indicated that they are submitting requests for parts for the F-16 warplanes in their arsenal.

A senior American military official said the Pentagon wanted to improve the ability of the Indonesian military to carry out disaster relief operations, to conduct joint operations with the United States, and to secure the Strait of Malacca and other waterways.

War Game Finds Two-week Capability (WT)

By Richard Halloran

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

TAIPEI -- Taiwan could fend off a concerted attack by China for at least two weeks before it would need help from the United States, according to the results of an unprecedented high-level exercise.

For the first time, the Ministry of National Defense ran the weeklong war game for President Chen Shui-bian of the Republic of China and other political leaders in April to test their ability to respond to a military assault from the mainland.

Mr. Chen, Prime Minister Su Tseng-chang, Defense Minister Lee Jye and other Cabinet ministers participated in the exercise, wrestling with a simulated missile attack that severely damaged the island's financial communications.

They sought continuity in government when several leaders were killed or wounded. They mobilized the armed forces to repel an amphibious invasion from the mainland.

"We could defend our country by ourselves for at least two weeks if we were attacked by the [People's Republic of China]," said Abe C. Lin, the ministry's director of strategic planning, referring to the outcome of the exercise and intelligence assessments.

The findings are important to the United States: Under the Taiwan Relations Act, often cited by the Bush administration as the basis for the U.S. posture on Taiwan, the United States would be obliged in most circumstances to come to the island's aid.

Two weeks would give the U.S. ample time to get forces to the Taiwan Strait, especially after plans for a military buildup on Guam have been completed. Three submarines, which would be vital to disrupting an amphibious assault, are there, and more are coming.

U.S. officials have been in what one called "a grumpy mood" toward Taipei over what they have seen as a provocative posture toward China and a failure to complete an $18 billion arms purchase from the United States.

Bush administration officials have suggested that Taiwan is unwilling to defend itself and relies too much on the United States to prevent it from being seized by China, which claims sovereignty over the island.

Civilian officials and military officers in Taiwan argue vigorously that the characterization is unfair. "We have never thought that we would get a free ride from the U.S. We have never planned to rely only on U.S. forces in our defense," Mr. Lin said.

He and several colleagues pointed to the lessons learned from the war game; to Taiwan's first comprehensive national security strategy report, issued in May; to planned increases in defense spending; to forthcoming cuts in military personnel to free funds for investment in weapons; and to a national mobilization law adopted in 2004.

They acknowledged, however, that Taiwan needed to "harden" more of its communications apparatus. The security report called for setting up a hot line between Taipei and Beijing to preclude miscalculation.

Polls suggest that Taiwan's residents are eager, maybe even desperate, to avoid war with China. A survey by the Mainland Affairs Council, which oversees Taiwan's relations with China, found that 88.6 percent of respondents wanted a continuation of the status quo. Only a few chose either independence, which could prompt an attack, or unification with China.

Against this backdrop, the U.S. Pacific Command in Hawaii has been quietly strengthening military ties with Taiwan at the same time it executes the Bush administration's policy of engaging China through exchanges of visits by senior officers.

DOJ_NMG_0032544

Retired Adm. Dennis Blair, a former Pacific commander, has visited Taiwan annually for the past several years to offer advice on a large Taiwanese military exercise. Defense attaches at the American Institute in Taiwan, the de facto U.S. embassy, are serving officers rather than retired officers on contract. Pacific Command officers regularly visit to confer with counterparts.

Even so, Taiwanese military officers and defense officials expressed misgivings about the U.S. engagement with China, saying they fear the United States might succumb to Chinese pressure or cajolery.

"We support [Pacific commander Adm. William Fallon's] policy of engagement," said a Taiwanese admiral, "so long as it is not at our expense."

The chief spokesman for Adm. Fallon, Capt. W. Jeffrey Alderson, said in response to a query: "No one loses here. Our efforts at engagement and transparency are intended to avoid miscalculations and thus maintain peace and stability in the region."

US Values Push Alienates Muslim Women (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Muslim women are potentially important allies in the war on terrorism, but the United States must avoid pushing Western values to win their support, according to data presented yesterday at the Gallup Organization.

The Bush administration has promoted women's rights throughout the Muslim world to gain support in the region, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan. But a worldwide Gallup project found that many Muslim women are not as concerned about changing their status as Westerners might think.

In Lebanon and Turkey, 9 percent to 11 percent of women said sexual inequality was a major problem, but negligible concern about the issue was found elsewhere. Jordanian women did not mention it when asked what aspects of society they disliked, and 2 percent of women cited the issue in Egypt and Morocco.

Far more often, Muslim women were worried about the same things as Muslim men -- lack of unity, extremism and political corruption.

Dalia Mogahed, a Gallup Organization analyst, said a majority of men and women expressed opposition to extremism and terrorism and said they were conscious of the rights that women deserved. The key, she said, is how the United States approaches the issue.

"The imposition of Western values alienates both men and women, because it is strongly associated with colonialism, like the British policies of unveiling in Egypt," Mrs. Mogahed said.

"Westerners need to understand how to reach Muslim women through their own value systems, by using the positive aspects of their own beliefs to encourage increased rights."

Mrs. Mogahed noted that Muslim women admired women's legal rights in Western countries, but thought that Western society degrades women by tolerating pornography and encouraging promiscuity. Muslim women do not want to adopt Western values because they think moral decay is present in these societies, she said.

Andrea Rugh, an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute, said in a telephone interview: "We need to understand that we have very different concepts of rights than Muslims do.

"In the Muslim world, the focus is on the role within the group, not the individual. A Muslim man will receive more of an inheritance than a woman, for example, but the woman has the right to be taken care of by a man."

Another aspect of the Gallup project highlighted this lack of understanding between the two cultures. When interviewers asked Americans what they most admired about Muslim societies, more than 50 percent answered "Nothing" or "I don't know."

Ms. Rugh said too many Americans rely on outdated information about the Muslim world and have difficulty understanding how those societies work.

"When I worked with Afghan women after the fall of the Taliban, they often said that they didn't understand why we wanted them to go out and work," she said.

"Most of them were not educated, so work meant construction work or hard labor. Improvement in the education system for both males and females should be the focus here, not imposition of our model of right."

DOJ_NMG_0032545

Peru's New President Looks To Renegotiate Trade Pact With U.S. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

LIMA, Peru -- Peruvian President-elect Alan García said he expects to renegotiate a free-trade agreement with the U.S. that was signed by the outgoing president in April but has yet to be ratified. He said he would revise the agreement line by line.

The agreement "is just a first draft, which can be improved and broadened if this government decides to approve it," Mr. García said. He suggested the pact should include language to discourage the import of subsidized U.S. crops.

Mr. García, whose 1985-90 presidency ended in economic ruin, won't have a majority in Congress when he takes office on July 28, and will have to work with smaller parties to advance his legislative agenda. Mr. García's Apra party won 36 seats in the 120-seat unicameral legislature that also takes office in July. The alliance of defeated presidential candidate Ollanta Humala gained 45 seats in the April 9 general elections.

In a news conference, Mr. García, 57 years old, suggested he would keep Washington at arm's length. He recalled that he had angered the U.S. and international lenders by unilaterally limiting debt payments during his first term. He had also railed against the U.S. for its 1989 invasion of Panama and its intervention in Nicaragua.

Mr. García said that though he had received congratulatory phone calls from many world leaders, he hadn't heard from President Bush.

US Tries To Keep Seat From Caracas (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

The United States is urging Latin American nations to deny Venezuela a seat on the U.N. Security Council when the region chooses a replacement for the rotating seat held by Argentina, whose term expires at the end of the year.

Reluctant to campaign openly against Venezuela, the Bush administration instead has been boosting the rival candidacy of Guatemala, a U.S. ally.

Even if elected, Venezuela would wield only one vote among 15 on the council and not have veto power. But at some point it would chair the council for a month, setting the agenda and giving President Hugo Chavez an opportunity to use the highest U.N. forum to advance his anti-American agenda. It also could turn close votes against the United States at any time.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick made an impassioned pitch in support of Guatemala's candidacy at a meeting Monday of the Organization of American States (OAS), but failed to convince several of the region's major players.

Mr. Zoellick cited the United Nations' "important history" in helping Guatemala move from civil war to democracy, and the country's participation in U.N. peacekeeping in Africa, where eight of its soldiers have been killed, said a transcript released yesterday by the State Department.

In addition, he noted at the meeting in the Dominican Republic that Guatemala, with a population of less than 13 million, "was one of the founding members of the U.N. but has never served on the U.N. Security Council."

"I know that the European democracies are supportive of Guatemala. Many of the East Asian countries are supportive of Guatemala, so we hope that it'll find broad-based support here [in Latin America]," Mr. Zoellick said.

Both Guatemala and Venezuela were among the first U.N. members when they joined in November 1945.

Venezuela, a country of more than 26 million people, has been on the Security Council four times, once during each of the past four decades. It was last elected to a two-year term in 1992, more than six years before Mr. Chavez took power.

The council is made up of five permanent members with vetoes -- the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China -- and 10 rotating members elected by region for two-year terms. The rotating members have limited power individually, but can tip a vote when the body is split.

In the spring of 2003, the United States and Britain dropped a much-discussed second resolution on Iraq that would have authorized military action because they were not able to secure the nine votes needed.

In the next couple of years, Washington may need all the support it can muster for tough votes on Iran's nuclear program. But U.S. officials think Venezuela is pursuing cooperation with Tehran on military training, uranium and nuclear technology.

DOJ_NMG_0032546

"When you face issues like we'll be facing, such as Iran, it's good to have a country that has been at the heart of the U.N. system and who appreciates the role that it can play," Mr. Zoellick said at the OAS meeting.

Several of Latin America's most influential countries, led by Brazil and Argentina, said that they will support Venezuela's candidacy. Uruguay also is seen as backing Caracas, while Chile has not made up its mind.

Peru, Colombia, Nicaragua and perhaps Ecuador are expected to vote for Guatemala.

Critics of Guatemala's candidacy say that it is not fit to be a Security Council member because it has a border dispute with Belize. But Mr. Zoellick countered that Venezuela has a border dispute with Guyana.

If the countries from the region cannot agree on a candidate, both Venezuela's and Guatemala's applications will go to the U.N. General Assembly, where one of them will need a two-thirds majority to be elected.

The term of the second Latin American country on the Security Council, Peru, expires next year, so even if Venezuela loses the battle this time, it is likely to try again, diplomats said.

Retail Politics In Mexican Race, 'Wal-Mart' Voters May Hold The Key (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Wal-Mart Stores Inc. figured there were enough new middle-class residents in the urban sprawl outside Mexico City to build four superstores in the area in the past year. Now those same shoppers could prove to be the X-factor in next month's presidential election.

Conservative candidate Felipe Calderón has pulled virtually even with liberal front-runner Andrés Manuel López Obrador by running a sophisticated, high-tech campaign with one primary goal: targeting the burgeoning ranks of the lower-middle class, a long-overlooked group in a nation of extreme wealth and poverty.

Poll takers say the 15% of Mexico's voters who have yet to make up their minds -- some 11 million voters in all -- are massed among the lower-middle-class residents of the urban enclaves ringing Mexico City, Guadalajara, Monterrey and other large cities. These are the small businessmen, salesmen and housewives who have climbed a few rungs out of poverty in recent years -- but fear they will lose it all should Mexico stumble into crisis, as it has so often in the past.

Six years ago, these voters helped defeat the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, which ruled Mexico for 70 years. They were strong backers of President Vicente Fox, who promised that free trade, foreign investment and macroeconomic stability would better their lives. But since then, Mexico's gross domestic product has grown only 1.8% a year and created few new jobs, prompting millions of ambitious Mexicans to leave home in search of opportunity in the U.S.

This time around, lower-middle-class voters are skeptical of both left and right. They share the left's anger that Mexico's economy is stacked in favor of the rich. But a message from the right also resonates strongly: concerns that a return to the free-spending ways of the past could produce inflation and disaster.

The outcome of the vote may determine whether Mexico will continue to tie itself tightly to the U.S. and the global economy or follow some other Latin American nations in making a turn leftward. Mr. Calderón, from Mr. Fox's party, is a business-friendly candidate who says he would boost private initiative. Mr. López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, says Mexico's free-market policies have largely failed to help average Mexicans. He wants to create jobs through government spending -- though he isn't advocating nationalization along the lines of Venezuela's Hugo Chávez or Bolivia's Evo Morales.

Largely Unknown

After a slow start, Mr. Calderón, a largely unknown 43-year-old who climbed through the ranks of the National Action Party, or PAN, made a big push to reach lower-middle-class voters. That helped him make up a nine-point deficit against Mr. López Obrador in February. The pair are now in a statistical tie in the most credible polls. Their only televised debate was last night.

In the debate, Mr. López Obrador said a vote for Mr. Calderón meant "more of the same" -- an inequal country where the rich evade taxes and the middle classes get stuck with the bill; Mr. Calderón countered that Mr. López Obrador's spending proposals would ultimately hurt the country's poor by bringing about devaluation, inflation and economic crisis.

Importing electoral techniques from the U.S., the Calderón camp market-tested different strategies with focus groups of lower-middle-class Mexicans. Strategists discovered that while these voters admired the 52-year-old Mr. López Obrador's passion, he also reminded them of populist leaders whose largess ultimately wrecked Mexico's economy in the 1970s and 1980s. So the campaign ran a series of negative television and radio ads -- the first significant use of such ads in a Mexican presidential race -- portraying him as a threat to Mexico's hard-won gains.

DOJ_NMG_0032547

Mr. Calderón's team also mixed in new media, recognizing that the 20% of Mexicans who now have email accounts -- including many younger people from the lower-middle class -- were a key demographic. Emails from the Calderón camp attacked Mr. López Obrador, and his Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD. A Calderón-campaign Web site has brought in more than 130,000 poll-station monitors, outreach workers and other volunteers.

"The middle and lower-middle are our key groups," says Juan Camilo Mouriño, Mr. Calderón's 34-year-old campaign manager. "These are people who have started to acquire a small patrimony, and see a risk of sliding back down." Mr. Mouriño, a veteran of the 2000 Fox campaign and governors races, hones his tactics at U.S. campaign seminars. He got advice from former Clinton campaign guru Dick Morris, though the consultant doesn't have an official role in the campaign. Neither side would discuss the nature of his advice. Mr. Morris wrote a New York Post op-ed piece, decrying Mr. López Obrador as a danger to Mexico, just as the Calderón negative-ad campaign was getting under way in Mexico.

With less than a month to go before the July 2 ballot, Mr. López Obrador's PRD has an edge over Mr. Calderón's party among the poor, which includes the 40% of heads of households earning less than $4,100 a year. But Mr. Calderón partly offsets that advantage by polling higher among the 15% of households in the upper-middle class and wealthy, broadly defined as those who earn more than $11,000 a year.

That leaves as the key battleground households earning between $4,100 and $11,000 per year. Those lower-middle- and middle-class households grew by about 25% during the first four years of the Fox administration, and now account for about 45% of total Mexican households.

A Concrete Sea

Together, the sprawling cities outside Mexico City, with Aztec names like Tlalnepantla, Ecatepec and Ciudad Nezahualcóyotl look like a concrete sea that overflowed its basin and rushed up the surrounding hills. But there are signs of progress amid the sprawl. In Tecámac, homebuilders have turned cornfields into planned communities of $20,000 townhouses, in a Mexican version of the Levittown of the 1950s. Wal-Mart, which has been in Mexico for about a decade, opened its doors in Ecatepec just last year.

The undecided are people like Vicente Lugo. Six years ago, the 47-year-old aluminum salesman voted for Mr. Fox, hoping the economy would improve. Instead, his sales are down, his salary is stuck and he isn't sure whom he will vote for. Economic stability gives him comfort, but he worries about whether his young children will find jobs when they become adults.

"I thought we'd have better salaries, less crime, less poverty, less migration, less corruption," he says. Mr. Lugo is waiting anxiously to hear if he qualified for a mortgage to buy a town house in Las Americas, a new housing subdivision going up in Ecatepec. "In the end, Fox really didn't do all that well," he says.

Mr. Calderón's latest foray into the lower-middle-class precincts came in late May, when he assembled thousands of flag-waving supporters along the main highway that connects the outlying municipalities like Tlalnepantla to the capital. The campaign supplied a caravan of souped-up Volkswagen Beetles -- the signature vehicle of urban workers -- and a truckload of midriff-baring dancers to keep the crowd entertained until Mr. Calderón wheeled by, waving from a confetti-strewn pickup. He didn't bother to speak that day, letting his cheering followers convey the message to passing motorists.

The Man From Tabasco

His opponent, Mr. López Obrador, 52, a charismatic politician from the southern oil state of Tabasco who has developed an intensely loyal following among the poor, has a deep reservoir of support in the areas Mr. Calderón is targeting. During his term as mayor of Mexico City, he granted cash subsidies to the elderly and single mothers, and built elevated highways and improved the bus system. In March, he stopped by a local park in Ecatepec, to back the PRD's mayoral candidate, José Luis Gutiérrez, who cruised to victory by linking himself to Mr. López Obrador's record in Mexico City.

But the candidate hasn't been back to the lower-middle-class outskirts of Mexico City since. Instead, he tours rural Mexican villages as many as five days a week, figuring that Mexicans have become so jaded by corruption and mediocre economic growth that they will trust only a politician who personally greets them.

DOJ_NMG_0032548

As the election draws closer, Mr. López Obrador, who acts as his own campaign manager, calculates that he has already clinched the lower-middle class outside Mexico City, and his time is better spent in areas where he is weaker, like the North, and in poaching PRI voters in rural areas and labor unions. His campaign is being heavily outspent on national media advertising by Mr. Calderón and has largely eschewed made-in-the-U.S. campaign tactics.

It is a high-stakes bet. Mr. López Obrador "thinks we've already won this area, but votes aren't a sure thing," says Mr. Gutiérrez, the Ecatepec mayor who campaigns for Mr. López Obrador in parts of the city that are so poor that braying donkeys interrupt his speeches. "He can't spend all his time in the villages and skip over the most populous areas."

Diverse Bunch

In Mexico, the lower-middle class is a diverse bunch, ranging from those who can barely afford a television and refrigerator to families that can qualify for a mortgage and own a car. The group was battered by a currency and banking crisis in 1994 and has only recovered its previous economic standing under Mr. Fox, a decade later. Many are frustrated by the mediocre economic performance of the Fox administration and energized by Mr. López Obrador's attacks on the rich, as well as his promises to create jobs by building roads, refineries and high-speed trains.

Mr. Calderón's campaign strategists decided to focus on the party's chief economic achievement: stability. The six years of the Fox administration will mark Mexico's longest stretch without an economic crisis since the 1960s. With inflation tamed, banks began offering 20-year fixed rate mortgages -- unthinkable before Mr. Fox took office -- creating a housing boom.

After a flurry of negative ads trying to link Mr. López Obrador to the bad old days of free-spending Mexican leaders, Mr. Calderón sought to cast himself as a reliable alternative. A diminutive, bespectacled man with a master's degree from Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government, Mr. Calderón was largely unknown to the public until he won an upset victory in the PAN primary late last year. Mr. Calderón's image makers advised him to start displaying his open palms in TV ads and during speeches, to suggest that he'd be entering office with "clean hands."

Mr. Calderón's team cast him as the "Jobs President," the candidate who was most likely to create jobs by making Mexico attractive to private investors. That strategy has worked: In an April poll by Mexico City-based Consulta Mitofsky, 42% of voters associated Mr. Calderón with the word "jobs," compared with 21% for Mr. López Obrador.

Mr. Calderón's campaign is working among voters like Roberto Saldaña, a 26-year-old technician, who lives in one of Ecatepec's rougher sections with his mother and two siblings. He counted himself as a López Obrador supporter after the politician stopped at his free technical college late last year. The politician vowed to force Mexican monopolies to hire based on merit rather than connections, which Mr. Saldaña lacked.

But Mr. Saldaña says he started rethinking his vote after he saw one ad that replayed a speech of Mr. López Obrador condoning a mob-justice lynching of two cops. Mr. Saldaña's father was killed five years ago during a robbery while walking to work, and the young technician began to worry that Mr. López Obrador was soft on crime. Since then, the Calderón campaign has been regularly sending him emails attacking Mr. López Obrador, and he has also received a phone call from Mr. Calderón's telemarketing firm.

Final Switch

He switched his allegiance for good in late March, after landing an $8,000-a-year job at a local unit of Chinese telecommunications-equipment maker Huawei Technologies Co. He is now convinced Mexico's future depends on foreign investment and job creation. "At first I was going to vote for AMLO, because he wants to help people," says Mr. Saldaña, using one of Mr. López Obrador's nicknames. "But now I think it would be a step backwards."

Watching his lead evaporate, Mr. López Obrador is making heavier use of television to reach middle-class voters. Recently, he purchased slots during prime time on several national channels to outline his economic ideas and is doing more TV interviews. He vowed to use subsidies and wage increases to boost the spending power of people making less than $9,500 a year by 20%, a move that targets the lower-middle-class voter. He is also going on the offensive against Mr. Calderón in a series of TV ads that try to link him to Mexico's mid-1990s bank bailout, which many Mexicans believe aided wealthy bank owners and pushed borrowers into bankruptcy.

That argument resonates with voters like Jessica Almaraz, a 22-year-old college student who works as a hostess at the Chili's restaurant in the new Plaza de las Americas shopping mall outside Mexico City. She says the harsh attacks on Mr. López

DOJ_NMG_0032549

Obrador have only strengthened her belief that he is a crusading outsider. "You have no idea how corrupt things are, or how much money gets stolen in Mexico every single day," she says. "We need someone who can make a change."

Oil May Grease Attitudes Toward Cuba Trade Policy (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, June 7, 2006

The imminent release of a new Bush administration status report on U.S.-Cuban relations is re-energizing the anti-embargo lobby, which believes the skyrocketing price of oil could provide a winning angle in its fight to relax trade sanctions on the communist island nation.

When the Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba issued its first policy recommendations at the president's behest two years ago, it resulted in stricter curbs on educational travel and Cuban-Americans' ability to send money home. But the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), its affiliated business coalition USA Engage and the newly independent Freedom to Travel Campaign are stumping for a milder report this time around.

The groups have found a new weapon for their campaign to loosen the trade embargo that has stood against Havana since the Kennedy administration. Oil companies from Norway, India, Spain and China (whose government-controlled petroleum group set off protectionist alarms last year with its bid to purchase Unocal) recently have signed drilling deals to explore Cuba's offshore waters.

"The embargo has the effect of turning our entire back yard over to other countries — China, India," USA Engage director Jake Colvin said. "Cupec [Cuba's state-owned oil company] is certainly looking for partners, and it's better that we are there than that we are not."

With the appropriations cycle heating up in the House this month, the annual ritual of amendments offered to ease sanctions on Cuba is sure to spark a fierce debate. Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a longtime opponent of the embargo, has raised the stakes with a bill that would allow U.S. oil and gas giants to profit from Cuban reserves and with a release from the House Cuba Working Group, which he co-chairs.

Flake and many on K Street are counting on the fearsome specter of China's quest for oil to raise support for the Cuba drilling bill. Among those backing the Senate version, sponsored by Rep. Larry Craig (R-Idaho), is Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), whom NFTC President Bill Reinsch touted as a powerful ally.

Cuban waters contain somewhere between 4.6 billion and 9.3 billion barrels of oil, according to estimates by the U.S. Geological Survey, a figure comparable to the low end of available resources in the GOP-coveted Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), in Alaska.

"It defies common sense not to explore our options over in Cuban waters," Flake spokesman Matthew Specht said. "When we get serious about ANWR, why can't we get serious about this?"

Lawmakers working to preserve tight restrictions on Cuban trade and travel remain influential in both chambers, however, particularly in the Florida delegation, and Cuban-Americans committed to isolating Cuban dictator Fidel Castro have revitalized their political activity through the U.S.-Cuba Democracy PAC. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, a Cuban émigré who leads the White House's commission along with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has given to the PAC in recent years.

Mauricio Claver-Carone, one of the PAC's 25 directors and a pro-embargo lobbyist for the Cuba Democracy Public Advocacy Corp., dismissed the political value of Cuba's oil wealth as a red herring.

"Energy exploration is a big smokescreen issue," Claver-Carone said. "It has sucked the whole Cuba policy community in, and I think it's something the Jeff Flakes of the world wanted to do on purpose."

Yet Claver-Carone acknowledged the allure of alleviating sky-high gas prices to Republicans. He said anti-Castro activists are not expecting oil exploration to pop up in the administration's new report, which officials had expected to release last week.

"I think it will backfire because the oil industry is pretty radioactive in Congress right now, at least from a lobbying perspective," Claver-Carone said. Instead, he is bracing for the report to address limits on religious travel to Cuba, now regulated more lightly than trips home to visit family members.

DOJ_NMG_0032550

The U.S.-Cuba PAC has already given $347,000 this cycle, including contributions to four senior House Republicans on the appropriations panel with jurisdiction over the Treasury Department, a key enforcer of the embargo. That puts the PAC on pace to more than double its giving for the 2004 elections.

Anti-sanctions lobbyists claim widespread support for the Cuba drilling bill among oil and gas companies, but industry sources were hesitant to confirm this.

"In general, we think it's good when anyone tries to expand energy production," said Bill Bush, a spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute (API), the oil industry's trade association. The API has left the question of a public stance on Cuba drilling to its individual members, several of whom attended a controversial February meeting with Cuban officials in Mexico City that was briefly broken up at the Bush administration's request.

One of those Mexico attendees, ExxonMobil, is "obviously interested in exploring for oil anywhere that U.S. law allows us to," said company spokesman Russ Roberts. "Right now Cuba is a country the U.S. is not doing business in. … I'm not sure we would want to go as far as making a comment on whether we would want the law to change."

Valero, a Texas oil refiner also reportedly present in Mexico, has no position on the Cuba drilling legislation, according to a corporate spokeswoman.

The Freedom to Travel Campaign last month formally split from its parent think tank, the Center for International Policy, and will continue organizing congressional trips to Cuba even as the uncertainty of lobbying-reform negotiations clouds privately sponsored travel. Campaign Director Sarah Stephens said members not usually considered foes of the embargo, "people who never vote with us," are expressing interest in next month's Havana trip.

But Cuban-American members have their own current-events hook to play up in Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's coming visit with Castro, whom Ahmadinejad considers a crucial international partner.

"All the problems we're having with Iran right now, and we're going to help one of its proudest allies just 90 miles from our shore?" said Thomas Bean, communications director for Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.), one of the Capitol's most vocal proponents of strengthening the embargo.

Other pro-sanctions voices include Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.), Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), considered the front-runner to chair the House International Relations Committee next year, and Florida Sens. Mel Martinez (R.) and Bill Nelson (D). Nelson and Martinez both have countered the Senate's Cuban drilling bill with measures preventing foreigners involved in Cuban exploration from entering the country.

Plan Targets African Migration (WT)

By From Combined Dispatches

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal -- Authorities in Europe and Africa yesterday drew up a joint plan to fight illegal migration that will combine tougher prevention measures with more aid to persuade young Africans to stay in their homelands.

Harrowing images of parched, exhausted young Africans washing ashore in boats on Spain's Canary Islands by the thousands this year have given added urgency to moves to improve international cooperation to combat clandestine emigration.

Hundreds are thought to die in the perilous sea voyages of more than 600 miles organized from Mauritania and Senegal by traffickers who run a lucrative business carrying would-be migrants seeking a better life in Europe.

Starting a two-day meeting in the Senegalese capital, senior officials from more than 50 countries of Europe and Africa worked yesterday on a joint action plan that foresees an integrated multinational strategy on migration.

The plan -- originally drafted by Morocco, Spain and France, three countries in the front line of the immigration problem -- is expected to be adopted by European and African ministers at a summit on migration July 10 and 11 in the Moroccan capital, Rabat.

"This is a political initiative of the highest importance that aims to combine both managing migrant flows and managing development," said Alvaro Iranzo, a senior Spanish Foreign Ministry official.

On Europe's southern flank facing Africa, Spain is the first target of thousands of penniless sub-Saharan Africans seeking entry to Europe, and Madrid has begun a diplomatic offensive in West Africa to try to stanch the flow.

DOJ_NMG_0032551

But while coastal patrols and surveillance can cut illegal departures, European and African experts agree that such short-term measures will be useless unless the unemployment, poverty and conflict that prompt migration from Africa are tackled.

"If we don't go to the root causes, there's not going to be a solution," Moroccan delegation chief Youssef Amrani said.

Delegates said the novelty of the joint European-African migration initiative was that destination, origin and transit countries were coming together to seek solutions.

"This affects us all. We need a global response," Mr. Amrani said.

Although a consensus exists for joint action, delegates said they expected discussions on how to find a balance between improved controls to halt illegal migration and long-term measures to help poor countries whose young people were leaving.

The draft plan calls for aid and trade with Africa to attack the root causes of migration and help keep young Africans in their own countries.

But it also proposes stronger police and security cooperation on land, sea and air to crack down on migrant-smuggling networks, which Senegal Interior Minister Ousmane Ngom condemned as "modern-day slavers."

The draft document also refers to the need for "readmission agreements," which will allow receiving countries to send back illegal or undesirable migrants to their nations of origin.

Senegal last week suspended repatriation flights from the Canaries, saying its migrants had been mistreated by Spanish authorities. Madrid denied this.

In a related development, an Associated Press-Ipsos poll released yesterday showed that despite the fierce political debate in the United States on immigration, American attitudes toward immigrants are considerably more positive than in several European countries.

People in Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Spain are much more inclined than those in the United States to think immigrants are likely to get involved in criminal activity.

"Often the immigrants come here and can't find work; they are forced to become criminals," said Leonardo Delogu, a doctor from Sardinia who was visiting Rome.

More than a third of Germans, Italians and Spaniards think immigrants are more likely to be involved in criminal activity than people born in their countries. A fourth in France and Britain feel that way.

Those European countries are about evenly divided on whether immigrants are a good influence. In general, people who have higher incomes and are more educated are more likely to say immigrants are a good influence.

In the United States, 52 percent think immigrants are a good influence on the country. Only about one in 10 Americans thinks immigrants are more likely to be involved in crime, according to the poll.

DOJ_NMG_0032552

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senators Won't Grill Phone Companies (USAT) 4
Specter Won't Ask Telcos To Testify On Taps (CNN)..... 4
Specter Won't Subpoena Telecom Executives (AP) 5
Bomb Plot Allegations Detailed In Canada (WP)..... 6
Prosecutors: Terror Plot Included Bombs, Beheadings (LAT) 6
Canada Saw Plot To Seize Officials (NYT) 8
Defense Lawyers In Canada Fault Terror Case Data (WSJ) 9
Prime Minister Said To Be Target (WT/AP)..... 10
New Details Of Canadian Terror Charges Come To Light (USAT/AP) 10
Praise Canada (WSJ) 11
Military Alters The Makeup Of Interrogation Advisers (NYT)..... 12
Pentagon Limits Medical Role In Questioning (LAT)..... 12
Md. Teacher Accused Of Aiding Terror Group (WP)..... 13
Why More Must Be Done To Protect London (FT)..... 14

Homeland Response:

New York, You're Still No. 1 (NYT)..... 15
House Blocks More Funding For New York, Other High-risk Cities (AP)..... 16
City Will Not Change Its Strategy For Dealing With Terror (NYT)17
Katrina Displaced 400,000, Study Says (WP)..... 18
Storms Also Shifted Demographics, Census Finds (LAT)..... 18
Katrina's Unlearned Lessons (WP)..... 19
Hurricane Forecasts: Good Headlines, Bad Science (USAT)..... 20
Are Hurricanes Uninsurable? (WSJ)..... 20

War News:

Senate To Hold Hearings On Iraq Massacre (AP) 22
Rumsfeld Pressed To Disclose Findings Of Haditha Probe (AFP)..... 22
Senators Press Pentagon On Haditha Hearings (NYT) 23
Quantico Islamic Center Dedicated (WP)..... 23
Rumsfeld Is Correct - The Truth Will Get Out (NYT/IHT)..... 24
"Lawfare" Over Haditha (WSJ) 25
Torture As Defined By The Media (WT) 27
Iraqi To Release Detainees In Bid To Ease Tensions (NYT)..... 27
Iraq's Premier Planning To Free 2,500 Detainees (WP) 29
Iraq's Tougher Stance Toward US (CSM)..... 30
Another Grisly Discovery In Iraq (LAT)..... 31
Basra's Descent Bodes Poorly For Allied Mission In Iraq (USAT)32
Salvaging Iraq (WP)..... 32
Donors Accused Of Spending Aid Outside Iraq (FT)..... 33
'We Have Your Husband' (WP) 34
Baghdad's Wealthy Are Careful To Hide Their Riches (PHI) 36
Afghanistan: Roadside Blast Kills 2 G.I.'s (NYT/BLOOM)..... 37
Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury (USAT)..... 37
Even Mild Injuries To Brain Add Up (USAT)..... 38

Corporate Scandals:

SEC: Investigations Into Options A Concern (AP)..... 39
Lawmakers Criticize Former Fannie Mae CEO (AP)..... 39

Criminal Law:

Silence Angers Judiciary Panel (WP)..... 40
Senators Question Bush Administration's Openness (KRT) 41
US Lawmakers Concerned About FBI Probes Of Journalists (VOA)..... 42
Senators Seek Answers In Probe Of Reporter (AP)..... 43
U. Political Scientist Calls Probe 'fishing Expedition' (SLT) 44
Getting Stonewalled: Administration Out To Keep Us In The Dark (SLT) 45
Documents Point To Bribes Of Nigerian By Congressman (NYT)45
Affidavit Outlines Alleged Scheme In Jefferson Case (LAT) 46
Rep. Accused Of Trying To Bribe Nigerian (AP) 47
Gonzales Defends Jefferson Office Search (AP-Y2)..... 48
Hoyer Backs Pelosi, Smacks Rep. Jefferson (HILL) 49
Separation Hypocrisy (LAT)..... 50
Lobbyist Says Client Paid Half The Cost Of Town House (NYT) 50
Retirement Account Of DeLay's Wife Traced (WP)..... 51
DeLay: GOP's 'panic, Depression' Risk Losing Elections (USAT)53
McKinney Deal May Be In Works Lawyer Rejects Talk Of Any Negotiations (AJC)..... 53
Gambino Captain Convicted Of Racketeering (AP) 54
Fat Lip Gets Mobster Life (NYDN)..... 54
GABBY CAPO IS KAPUT (NYPOST) 55
Ex-Tenn. Lawmaker Denies Taking Payoffs (AP) 56
Dixon Tells Of 'network' (MCA)..... 56
Corruption Trial Witness: I Had To Hire A Drunk (CHIT)..... 57
Sorich's Lawyer: 'Not One Red Cent Changed Hands' (CHIST). 58
FBI Probing Fumo In Warehouse Sale (PHI) 59
Feds Say Bureaucrat Fixed Tickets For Tickets (PHI) 61
Bolivar Co. Administrator Faces Federal Charges (BSH) 62

Bolivar County Administrator Indicted On Federal Charges (JCL)62
Witness Recovers From Overdose To Describe New Jersey Graft (NYT) ... 62
Flemmi Describes Gang's Relationship With The FBI (BOS/AP) 63
FBI Handler Treated `me Like An Equal,' Flemmi Testifies (BOS)64
Most Popular Flemmi Details Why Victims Had To Go (BOSH) . 65
In Galante Garbage Investigation, Surrender Is Not An Option (AP) ... 66
NYU Whiz Kid Pleads Guilty In $7 Million Hedge Fund Scam (STAMADV/AP) ... 67
More Sex Offenders Tracked By Satellite (USAT) ... 67
Inmate Freed After 18 Years On Basis Of DNA Evidence (NYT) 68

Civil Law:

Gabelli, Justice Department Settle Suit Over Cellphone Licenses (WSJ) ... 69
Gabelli Reaches Tentative Deal On Cellphone Licenses (USAT)70
Gabelli Reaches Pact With Justice Department Over Cell Licenses (BLOOM) ... 71
DOJ Announces Settlement In Gabelli Case (AP) ... 71

Civil Rights:

Use-Of-Deadly-Force Police Shootings Ruled Justifiable (NEWSNET5) ... 71
Gay Marriage Amendment Faces Senate Defeat (AP-Y2)... 72
Marriage Measure Doomed In Senate (WT) ... 73
For Foes Of Same-Sex Marriage, It's The Thought That Counts (WP) ... 73
Same-sex 'Marriage' Splits Black Leaders (WT) ... 74
Damien, Demons And Dubya (NYT)... 75
Justice Kennedy's Culture War (WSJ)... 76
Verizon Bias Suit Deal Sets Record (WP) ... 77
Louisiana Governor Plans To Sign Anti-Abortion Law (NYT)... 78
Transsexual Discrimination Suit Enters Discovery Phase (RC) .. 78
Senate To Consider Letting Hawaiians Pursue Sovereignty (WT)79
A Chance For Justice In Hawaii (NYT) ... 80
D.C. Mayor Fires Director Of Agency For The Disabled (WP) ... 81
Comes Now No. 19 (WP)... 82
A Well Of Smiths And Xias (NYT)... 82
Georgia Has Changed For The Better, And The Voting Rights Act Should Too (HILL) ... 83
Block The Vote, Ohio Remix (NYT) ... 84

Antitrust:

A.C.L.U. Raises Surveillance As Issue In Big Phone Merger (NYT) ... 85
Telecom Firms Ask FCC To Stop AT&T-BellSouth Merger (SANANTBIZ) ... 85
AT&T/BellSouth Opponents Talk Litigation (B&C) ... 86
Microsoft's Reputation At Stake, EU Says (BLOOM)... 86
BAA Backs Ferrovial's Latest Offer (WSJ) ... 86
Airport Operator Accepts $19 Billion Spanish Bid (NYT)... 87
Street Sleuth Chirac Frowns On NYSE-Euronext (WSJ) ... 88
Struggle Over Continental Stock Exchanges Takes Political Turn (NYT) ... 89
Who Does Arcelor Belong To? (WSJ) ... 90
US Air, After Merger, Wrestles With Frequent Ire (WSJ) ... 90

Environment/Indian Affairs:

How To Say Yes To Energy (WT) ... 91
Ag Secretary Says Bird Flu Easily Found (AP)... 92
Seneca Claim To Island Rebuffed (BUFFNEWS) ... 93

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

$2.75 Million Is Poured Into War On Gangs (CLPD) ... 94
Santa Rosa Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI (KPIX-TV) 94
News In Brief From California's North Coast (MERCN) ... 95
Camden Man Sentenced In Drug/murder Operation Case (CAMCP)... 95
2 Drug Ring Leaders Sentenced (WPVI-TV)... 95
Feds Hope To 'weed Out' Local Crime (NEWS14)... 95
Guns, Drugs Are Seized In Reaids (TTNJ)... 96
1,000-plus Doses Netted In City Sweep (PPG)... 96
Killer Heroin Coursed Through Philadelphia, Too (PPG) ... 98
Police Claim Bust Slows Heroin Flow (PTR) ... 99
Heroin Overdoses Decline, New Problem Arises (KDKA)... 100
More Victims Added To Heroin OD Tally (KDKA) ... 101
Names Can Help End Drug Plague (FREEP) ... 101
Office Denies Approving Documents' Release (BSUN) ... 102
Stidham Deposition May Help Schwartz (TC) ... 103
Feds Search House Of Arizona Reliever (AP) ... 103
Diamondbacks' Grimsley Implicated In Steroids Probe (AR) ... 104
Montel To Urge N.J. On Medical Marijuana (AP) ... 105

Immigration:

Bush Confident Immigration Deal Possible (AP) ... 106
Nation Ahead Of Congress On Immigration, Bush Says (LAT). 107
Bush Turns To House In Immigration Debate (NYT)... 107
Bush Defends Planned Path To Citizenship (HC) ... 109
Bush Visits Laredo To Plug Reform Plan (SAEN) ... 110
Bush Sees Support For Immigration Plan (WT) ... 110
Bush Pushes Immigration Plan In New Mexico (WP) ... 111
Senate Candidates Choose Their Battles On Immigration Debate (HILL) ... 112
Public, Bush Split On Illegals (WT) ... 113
House GOP Threatens To 'blue-slip' Bill (HILL) ... 114
Reid Proposes Deal On Reform Bill (WT) ... 115
Arizona Governor Vetoes Illegal Immigration Bill (NYT)... 116
Poll: U.S. Public Warmer Toward Immigrants (AP-Y2) ... 116
Our Language Unites Us (USAT) ... 117
Press 2 For Pointless (USAT)... 118
Carter-Finley Workers Plead, Will Be Deported (RN&O) ... 118

Tax:

Estate Tax Showdown Is Splitting The G.O.P. (NYT) ... 119
Frist Wants Estate Tax Repeal On Agenda (AP) ... 120
How Tax Code Change Affects Overseas Workers (WSJ) ... 121

Congress-Administration:

White House Renews Push For Nominees (HILL) ... 121
A Different Judicial Battle (WSJ)... 123
Boom Of The Judicial Canon (WP)... 123
Battle Over Foreign-Aid Spending Heats Up (WSJ)... 124

DOJ_NMG_0032554

Advice Is Not Well Taken (HILL) ... 125
Democrats Guard Legislative Power (RC) ... 126
Data Theft Affected Most In Military (WP) ... 127
Stolen Computer Had Data On More Troops (USAT) ... 128
House GOP Seeks To Keep Promise On Earmarks (RC) ... 129
Senate Emphasis On Ideology Has Some In G.O.P. Anxious (NYT) ... 130
Bush Chats With Children In Twin Cities Suburb (AP) ... 131
Government Opens Drive To Offer New Hires Flexibility In Work Locations And Schedules (WP) ... 132
Hank's Likely Headaches (WP) ... 133
Rope-a-Senator (WP) ... 133

Other News:

Stocks Slide Further After Monday's Sell-Off (NYT) ... 134
Stocks Take Hit As Dow Finishes At 3-Month Low (WSJ) ... 135
Inflation Fears Mount At Fed As Poole Toughens Rate Posture (WSJ) ... 136
Pondering The Bear Necessities (WP) ... 136
Ben Bernanke: Tough Guy (WP) ... 138
Fed, Bernanke Take Blistering Flak (USAT) ... 139
Unease Over Fed Policy Has Markets In A Tizzy (USAT) ... 140
Economic Rehab (WSJ) ... 140
Realtors Lower Sales Forecast, Seek Pause In Fed Rate Increases (WSJ) ... 142
Gas Prices May Fall A Bit, But Summer Costs Still High (USAT) 142
Bilbray Close To Victory (AP) ... 143
Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger In November (LAT) ... 144
On To November (LAT) ... 147
State Elections Are A Midterm Bellwether (WP) ... 147
Senate Race '06-Tester Vs. Burns (AP) ... 148
Menendez, Kean Win Primary Elections (AP) ... 149
Menendez And Kean Sail Past Primary (NSL) ... 149
Menendez, Kean Clear Party Rivals To Face Off (PHI) ... 151
They've Been Nicked By Scandal, But No Signs Of Bleeding Yet (RC) ... 152
Technology Sharpens The Incumbents' Edge (WP) ... 154
Senate Contender In Florida Presses On (NYT) ... 155
His Support Waning, Weld Quits New York Governor's Race (NYT) ... 157
Frist Cementing Bush Alliance (RC) ... 159
Faith-Based Initiative (WP) ... 160
Harvard, Boston Hospital To Attempt Embryo Cloning (USAT) 163
Harvard Joins New U.S. Push In Stem Cells (WSJ) ... 164
2 New Efforts To Develop Stem Cell Line For Study (NYT) ... 165
Many Americans Headed For Money Struggles In Retirement (LAT) ... 166
Study: 43% Not Saving Enough To Retire Well (USAT) ... 167
New Campaign Shows Progress For Homeless (NYT) ... 167
C.I.A. Knew Where Eichmann Was Hiding, Documents Show (NYT) ... 169
CIA Ties With Ex-Nazis Shown (WP) ... 171
Health Insurance Doesn't Have To Hurt (USAT) ... 172
A Positive In Going Negative? (WP) ... 173
Bush Optimistic About Iran's Reaction To Nuke Plan (USAT) .. 174
Bush: Iran's Initial Response Positive (AP) ... 174
Proposal Would Let Iran Enrich Uranium (WP) ... 175
Diplomacy Moves To The Fore Over Iranian Nuclear Issue (LAT) ... 177
Upbeat Iran Finds "Positive Steps" In Offer (WT) ... 178
Iran To Study EU Incentive Plan On Nuclear Issue (FT) ... 178
Iran Open To Incentives On Nuclear Talks, With A Hedge (NYT) 179
U.S. Risks Political Backlash In Iran Nuclear Offer (WSJ) ... 180
Those Were The Days, When Reform Was In Flower (NYT) ... 181
Bush Worried About Instability In Somalia (AP) ... 182
Somalia's Islamic Extremists Set U.S. Back (AP) ... 183
Protesters Rally To Challenge Islamists In Somalia (NYT) ... 184
Our Failure In Somalia (WP) ... 185
Somalia, Revisited (NYT) ... 186
Abbas Extends Hamas Deadline On Israel (AP) ... 186
US Welcomes Abbas Referendum Proposal (AFP-Y2) ... 187
Abbas Delays Setting Date For Referendum (WP) ... 188
Indonesian Scolds U.S. On Terrorism Fight (NYT) ... 189
War Game Finds Two-week Capability (WT) ... 190
US Values Push Alienates Muslim Women (WT) ... 191
Peru's New President Looks To Renegotiate Trade Pact With U.S. (WSJ) ... 191
US Tries To Keep Seat From Caracas (WT) ... 192
Retail Politics In Mexican Race, 'Wal-Mart' Voters May Hold The Key (WSJ) ... 192
Oil May Grease Attitudes Toward Cuba Trade Policy (HILL) ... 195
Plan Targets African Migration (WT) ... 196

DOJ_NMG_0032555

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Won't Grill Phone Companies (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — A last-minute deal Tuesday with Vice President Cheney averted a possible confrontation between the Senate Judiciary Committee and U.S. telephone companies about the National Security Agency's database of customer calling records.

The deal was announced by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. They said Cheney, who plays a key role supervising NSA counterterrorism efforts, promised that the Bush administration would consider legislation proposed by Specter that would place a domestic surveillance program under scrutiny of a special federal court.

In return, Specter agreed to postpone indefinitely asking executives from the nation's telecommunication companies to testify about another program in which the NSA collects records of domestic calls.

If passed, Specter's legislation would give the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court power to oversee the NSA program and render an opinion on the constitutionality of conducting domestic surveillance without a warrant. The court, established by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), normally considers case-by-case requests by intelligence agencies to conduct surveillance inside the USA.

The deal prompted protests from Democratic lawmakers, who said the Republican-controlled Congress had refused to challenge the administration's expansion of presidential authority. “Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year, and the vice president will just tell the nation what laws we'll have?” said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the committee.

Specter has challenged the administration to justify the legality of intelligence programs inside the country.

After the hearing, Specter said his hand had been forced by the telephone companies' refusal to discuss classified programs. Representatives of more than one company — which ones were not specified in the meeting — agreed to appear, Specter said, but told the panel they would not talk about classified information. Hatch said President Bush “is willing to work with us as long as it doesn't detract from the president's constitutional powers.”

At least one Democrat shared Republican concerns about forcing telephone officials to discuss classified programs. “Companies that are trying to be good citizens shouldn't be held out to dry,” said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

Feinstein said there were two programs at issue: the NSA surveillance of international calls with one end in the USA and in which one participant is suspected of terrorist activity; and a program that “does not involve content” of conversations.

The surveillance program was disclosed in December by The New York Times and then acknowledged by the administration. The other program, which has not been formally acknowledged by the White House, was disclosed last month by USA TODAY. The program involves the collection of domestic calling data — the numbers and times of calls — by the NSA for use in tracking calling patterns by people suspected of terrorist activities.

In the wake of the USA TODAY story, Specter, who had proposed legislation to give the FISA court power over NSA's warrantless surveillance program, said he wanted phone company executives to testify about any involvement they had with the NSA.

Specter Won't Ask Telcos To Testify On Taps (CNN)

CNN, June 7, 2006

Senate Judiciary panel chairman backs off from questioning executives on cooperation with secret program, angering Democrats.

WASHINGTON (CNN) - Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter reversed course Tuesday, announcing he will not call on phone company executives to testify on their cooperation with the government in a secret eavesdropping program run by the National Security Agency.

The senator from Pennsylvania acknowledged his reversal was forced upon him by his Republican colleagues in a private session prior to the afternoon hearing. The announcement was promptly decried by several Democrats, who accused Specter of caving in to the Bush administration.

"We have abdicated our responsibility," shouted Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts.

DOJ_NMG_0032556

"You have given up the store," complained Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., in denouncing the move. "You're just walking away."

Democrats were unable to muster enough members to force a vote on issuing subpoenas to the telecommunications giants AT&T (Research), Verizon Communications (Research) and Bell South (Research).

The potential for a showdown over subpoenas was averted when Republicans, led by former committee chairman Orrin Hatch of Utah, outmaneuvered Specter in advance of the hearing.

Hatch disclosed he had won assurances from Vice President Cheney that the White House would at least review proposed legislation to restrict aspects of NSA surveillance programs. In exchange, the committee would not press the phone companies to divulge their cooperation with the government.

"We have a good-faith effort they'll work with us on this," Hatch said. "The offer is a good one."

"Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year and Cheney will just tell us what laws this nation will have?" fumed ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont.

"I categorically reject the idea I'm backing off," Specter replied.

In a dissent, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., announced she would oppose subpoenas for the phone companies. Feinstein, who is on the Intelligence Committee, said she had been fully briefed on the secret NSA programs and believes if the phone companies should be summoned at all, it should be from the intelligence panel, which conducts its business behind closed doors.

"The phone companies, they're just trying to be good citizens and shouldn't be held out to dry," Feinstein said.

Specter said he would continue to vigorously challenge the White House claims of executive power on several fronts.

Specter announced he had won a promise from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to testify "within the next two weeks" on a range of hotly debated issues on executive branch powers over which some Republicans and nearly all Democrats on the panel are bitterly at odds with the White House.

Justice Department officials acknowledge they are bracing for a potentially stormy hearing, but probably not as soon as Specter would like.

A senior Justice official who asked not to be identified said it was likely they would be able to arrange for Gonzales to testify before the committee "in the next two months."

Specter Won't Subpoena Telecom Executives (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, The Associated Press

AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Phone company executives won't be grilled by a Senate panel anytime soon about their roles in the Bush administration's eavesdropping program.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Tuesday he will hold off subpoenaing the telecommunications chiefs while he works with the White House on his legislation that would ask a secretive federal court to review the constitutionality of Bush's surveillance operations.

Democrats accused Specter of abdicating Congress' oversight responsibilities.

"Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year?" the committee's top Democrat, Sen. Pat Leahy of Vermont, asked sarcastically. "Vice President Cheney will just tell the nation what laws we'll have."

Bush has acknowledged that the National Security Agency monitored — without court approval — the communications of terror suspects when one person was in the United States and another was overseas. Until Bush ordered the operations shortly after 9/11, a judge had to sign off on such monitoring.

Following a report last month in USA Today, lawmakers have said the government is also using general information on Americans' telephone calls — such as the number called, and the number dialed from — to analyze calling patterns to detect and track suspected terrorist activity.

Specter had threatened to subpoena executives of the major phone companies to get them to testify about their cooperation with the NSA. But in an informal conversation, one company lawyer told Specter the executives wouldn't be able to testify about any classified information. Specter said Cheney told the committee the restriction would apply to everyone the senators want to question.

"I cannot make them talk," said Specter, who later acknowledged that the executives have access to more information than senators.

In exchange for deferring action on the phone companies, Specter said Cheney has specifically agreed to work with him on his legislation.

Specter rejected suggestions that he was letting the White House dictate the committee's agenda, and he said he plans to have Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before the committee later this month.

"I yield to no man or woman on pressing this administration on these issues," he said.

Bomb Plot Allegations Detailed In Canada (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

TORONTO, June 6 -- Suspects arrested last weekend in an alleged terrorism plot planned to storm the Canadian Parliament and hold politicians hostage, and at least one wanted to behead the prime minister if demands to withdraw Canada's troops from Afghanistan were not met, according to a summary of prosecutors' allegations read in court Tuesday.

According to authorities, the group also planned to bomb power plants in Ontario and invade the downtown Toronto studios of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., according to the written statement submitted to the court by defense attorney Gary Batasar and read into the record at his request.

The statement, which the lawyer said was a summary of the government's planned charges, indicated that the men had planned to demand the removal of Canada's 2,300 troops from Afghanistan and the release of all Muslim prisoners held in Afghanistan and Iraq. Politicians including Prime Minister Stephen Harper were to be killed if the demands were refused, according to the government allegations, Batasar told reporters outside the courthouse. Prosecutors did not comment on the statements.

The statements offered the first details of the plot that police and intelligence agencies said they disrupted in a series of raids overnight Friday. Twelve men and five youths were arrested.

Fifteen of the suspects appeared in a courthouse in suburban Brampton on Tuesday morning, shackled together and wearing prison T-shirts. Most were remanded for a bail hearing on Monday.

"The allegations are very serious, including storming and bombing of various buildings," Batasar, who represents Steven Vikash Chand, 25, told reporters outside the courthouse. "There is an allegation apparently that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada."

In the capital, Ottawa, Harper brushed aside the news with a joke. "I can live with all these threats as long as they are not from my caucus," he quipped as he walked into his office.

The reaction of other lawmakers ranged from disbelief to worry.

"There were certainly some grandiose plans being made," Joseph Cordiano, a Liberal in Ontario's provincial Parliament, told reporters. "I have serious, serious doubts about their capacity to carry it out."

"The plot was a very serious one," said Peter Van Loan, a Conservative in Parliament representing Ontario. "I don't expect this is the only threat out there. The thing we can take comfort in is that Canada's security measures worked."

The arrests, carried out by hundreds of police officers, have added tension to the issue of U.S.-Canada border security. Canadian politicians have become rankled over comments by some U.S. legislators that the charges are evidence of the danger of terrorism coming south across the long, lightly guarded border.

"I'm very concerned about the amount of play in the U.S. that the threat Canada poses as a 'gateway to terrorism,' " Parliament member Mark Holland, a Liberal representing a Toronto suburb, told CBC television. "It's certainly not true."

Batasar portrayed the sensational allegations as an attempt by the government to frighten the public.

"It appears to me that whether you are in Toronto or Ottawa or Crawford, Texas, or Washington, D.C., what is wanting to be instilled in the public is fear," he said.

Batasar said his client had not spoken to him about the charges. "He said nothing about that. My client retains the right to silence." In the packed courtroom, the accused nodded or waved to relatives, but said little on their own. Several defense attorneys protested that they had been unable to meet their clients individually and that the suspects had not been permitted to see their families.

"Counsel would like to have that right" to talk to their clients personally, not through a plexiglass shield, said defense attorney Donald McLeod.

Several women in black Islamic dress came to watch the proceedings, but would not talk to reporters outside the courthouse. Missing from the hearing was the huge presence of heavily armed police that had guarded the courthouse Saturday when the suspects made an initial appearance.

In announcing the raids, police said the arrests were the result of the largest anti-terrorism investigation in Canada since Sept. 11, 2001. They said the suspects had procured three tons of an explosive fertilizer, intending to set it off at a public target.

Prosecutors: Terror Plot Included Bombs, Beheadings (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032558

BRAMPTON, Canada — Some of the 17 men and youths arrested in a suspected terrorism plot had planned to storm the nation's Parliament, take politicians hostage and behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper unless their demands for a withdrawal of Canadian troops from Afghanistan and the release of Muslim prisoners were met, prosecutors said Tuesday.

The accusations delivered to several of the defendants' attorneys in a one-page investigation summary included no evidence to substantiate the charges, said the attorney for 25-year-old Steven Vikash Chand.

"There's an allegation, apparently, that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada," attorney Gary Batasar said of the synopsis of the crown's case against his client, which he had received just minutes before the proceedings.

Batasar complained that he had not been allowed to meet privately with Chand and later said to reporters outside the courthouse: "This is not Guantanamo, this is Toronto, Canada."

In his comments before the judge, Batasar said the prosecution was contending the defendants planned to invade the Parliament building in Ottawa and take hostages to demand that Canadian forces leave Afghanistan; about 2,300 serve under international mandate with the Kabul government's consent. The defendants, according to prosecutors, planned to demand the release of unspecified Muslim prisoners and to bomb the Parliament building and decapitate Harper and other political leaders if their demands were rejected.

The prosecution synopsis mentioned plans to seize or blow up the CBC broadcasting headquarters in Toronto, the attorney said.

Harper brushed off the purported plot against him, joking to reporters, "I can live with these threats as long as they're not from my caucus."

Batasar and two other defense lawyers protested the conditions of their clients' detention. Chand and 21-year-old Ahmad Mustafa Ghany surveyed the courtroom and smirked as the charges were read against them. Their hands were cuffed, and they were each shackled to a third defendant, an 18-year-old who was a juvenile at the time of the alleged crimes and appeared confused about the proceedings.

A chaotic parade of handcuffed and manacled defendants in white T-shirts and gray trousers was escorted into the small, packed courtroom of Judge Maurice Hudson at the Ontario Court of Justice in this Toronto suburb. Outside, hundreds of reporters swarmed lawyers and defendants' relatives, eager for details of a case that has jolted Canadians and led to criticism of the nation's liberal immigration policies.

Heeding federal prosecutor Jim Leising's appeal for maximum-security confinement, Hudson ordered the 12 adult and five juvenile defendants held in isolation.

Ghany's attorney, Rocco Galati, protested the harsh conditions, saying he had been unable to meet with his client without security guards listening in.

Bail hearings were postponed until later in the month for all 15 defendants who appeared in court. Two of the 17 charged after provincewide raids Friday and Saturday did not appear Tuesday, because they are serving sentences at an Ontario prison for trying in August to smuggle weapons into Canada across the Peace Bridge between Buffalo, N.Y., and Fort Erie.

Few details of the crown's case against the purported terrorist cell have come to light, but the specific plot to attack those in power mentioned by Batasar suggested prosecutors had either clandestinely acquired communications or had an inside source providing information, veteran national-security analyst David Harris said.

"One possibility is that they used bugs or wiretaps," said Harris, former chief of strategic planning for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and now head of a security think tank. The summary of the prosecution's case might have been deliberately vague to "leave the defense side with questions of what else the prosecutors might know," Harris said.

Hudson ordered the juveniles -- at least one as young as 16 -- held in a facility for youth offenders instead of the Maplehurst prison, where the defendants were taken after their arrests. During the raids, 400 officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and CSIS stormed homes and gathering places frequented by the suspects.

"My client is a very frightened young man," attorney Michael Block said of a 16-year-old defendant, who was not identified because of Canadian law protecting the names of those younger than 18 accused of committing crimes.

Seven of the 17 defendants are teenagers and all but two -- 43-year-old Qayyam Abdul Jamal and 30-year-old Shareef Abdelhaleen -- are 25 or younger.

All 12 adult suspects have been charged with terrorism under a December 2001 amendment to the nation's Criminal Code in reaction to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States. That charge carries a maximum sentence of 10 years.

Nine of the men are charged with training for the purpose of terrorist activity, which can bring another 10-year sentence, and six face accusations that they sought to bomb public targets, which can result in life sentences. Four, including Chand, stand accused of recruiting or training others for terrorism, an offense that also can draw a 10-year term.

DOJ_NMG_0032559

Canada Saw Plot To Seize Officials (NYT)

By Anthony DePalma

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario, June 6 — Prosecutors here assert that some of the men charged in a terror plot last week planned a series of violent attacks that included seizing Parliament and beheading Prime Minister Stephen Harper and other lawmakers if Canadian troops were not withdrawn from Afghanistan, a defense lawyer said in court Tuesday.

The accusations were part of a government summary that was given to a lawyer for one of the suspects and other defense lawyers just before preliminary hearings began. The document was not made public, but the lawyer disclosed part of its content because he said he wanted to force the government to disclose its evidence.

Jim Leising, the government prosecutor in the terror case, did not comment on the accusations in the summary.

The new accusations, if true, would disclose a startling new aspect of the case against 12 Muslim men and 5 youths. Previously, investigators have said only that the men intended to use homemade explosives to bomb unidentified targets in southern Ontario.

Although they expressed doubts about the capacity of the suspects to pull off such bold attacks, Canadians, in interviews with various news outlets, said the latest disclosures only heightened their current alarm about the possibility of violence by homegrown terrorists.

"Canadians have to understand and appreciate that we are citizens of a world where danger is everywhere," Peter Van Loan, a member of Parliament from Ontario, told the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. "We're not exempt from that, much as we might wish we were."

More than 100 journalists gathered outside the A. Grenville and William Davis Courthouse on Tuesday morning as 10 of the 12 men accused in the terrorist plot appeared in court for preliminary hearings. They were handcuffed and wore white T-shirts and gray prison pants. The five who have been charged as minors also appeared.

All the suspects asked for bail proceedings to be postponed while their lawyers prepared their defense. The bail hearings are not expected to be held for several weeks.

In the Canadian court system, prosecutors in major cases present evidence at the bail hearing as they argue against suspects being released on bail.

Two suspects did not appear in court because they are already serving prison sentences for trying to bring guns into Canada illegally.

Several lawyers complained that extraordinary security had prevented them from speaking to their clients in private. The men, all residents of Canada, have been held in isolation at a maximum-security prison since shortly after they were arrested over the weekend. They have been prohibited from talking to their families or one another.

According to court documents, all have been charged with belonging to a terrorist group. Six are accused of plotting to bomb several unidentified buildings in Canada. Others are charged with running training camps, receiving terrorist training and trying to smuggle weapons across the border from the United States.

On Tuesday, there were details for the first time about another reported plan for an attack, this one intended to cripple Canada's government and disrupt its economy. Gary Batasar, the lawyer for one of the suspects who read the accusations in court, said that if prosecutors were going to make such claims they should disclose their evidence so defense lawyers can respond adequately.

Mr. Batasar said he read the accusations for the first time when he received the government summary on Tuesday morning. He said one page of the eight-page document referred specifically to his client, Steven Vikash Chand, 25, of Toronto. Mr. Chand, who appeared in court with long black hair and a full beard, listened intently to the accusations against him, then rolled his eyes.

Mr. Chand is charged with belonging to a terrorist group and recruiting and training people to join the group. He is not charged with participating in the bomb plot.

Another suspect, Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, is the eldest of the men and is considered by the authorities to be their leader. Mr. Jamal, one of those charged with planning the bombings, could be seen directing one of the lawyers to ask the judge for special medical attention for the youth the lawyer represented.

Mr. Batasar said the government papers laid out a plot to storm the Gothic Revival buildings of Parliament in Ottawa and take hostages. The hostages would be beheaded if the terrorists' demands that Canadian troops to be pulled out of Afghanistan were not met.

DOJ_NMG_0032560

Mr. Chand was said to have remarked that he would "personally like to behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper," Mr. Batasar said. The document also said the men intended to attack power lines and news media offices, including the CBC building in Toronto.

Mr. Harper, in the main Parliament building, took the threat in stride. "I can live with these threats, as long as they're not from my caucus," he told reporters.

Jack Layton, an opposition leader in Parliament, said the terror investigation had turned up nothing to convince him that it is time to severely restrict access to government buildings or "turn an accessible institution of democracy into a bunker."

Security at Parliament Hill in Ottawa has been tightened since 9/11, but pedestrians still can walk up to most of the buildings without passing through security gates.

Investigators have said little about the evidence they have gathered against the suspects. At a news briefing on Saturday they showed a computer tower, a crude cellphone detonator and other electronic equipment they had seized. They also showed a bag of ammonium nitrate fertilizer that they said was like the three tons of material the suspects had planned to use to make bombs.

American officials, who have acknowledged being involved in the yearlong investigation, said Canadian authorities had monitored Internet chat rooms, e-mail messages and telephone conversations to learn of the activities of the suspects.

Defense Lawyers In Canada Fault Terror Case Data (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario -- Lawyers representing men arrested on terror-related charges last week complained they have been given scant information about their clients' alleged plot, which prosecutors now say included plans to storm Parliament and behead Canada's prime minister.

Lawyers for some of the 17 suspects said at a bail hearing in the Ontario Court of Justice yesterday that they were being given too little information to counter charges against their clients. Government lawyers provided few details about the alleged plot, and little information about the evidence gathered by police and security forces. Defense lawyers were given only a brief "synopsis" of the allegations, which wasn't made public.

Defense lawyers said the synopsis was sketchy and didn't give them enough material to prepare for bail hearings, which were postponed until later this month. "It's a very general document," defense attorney Gary Batasar said of the government summation. "Do they have wiretaps? Do they have video? Do they have informants? When you have bald-faced allegations such as these, obviously, hysteria mounts."

A spokesman for Canada's Department of Justice declined to comment on the complaints, noting that the case is before the court.

The synopsis of the case against Mr. Batasar's client, 25-year-old Steven Vikash Chand, includes a description of a plot to attack Ottawa's Parliament Hill and take politicians hostage in a bid to force Canada to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan and release political prisoners, Mr. Batasar said.

He said one document states that Mr. Chand "has indicated he personally would like to behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper."

Among the formal charges against six of the suspects -- issued under Canada's new antiterror laws -- is "doing anything with intent to cause an explosion of an explosive substance." The men were arrested in police raids Friday night after allegedly attempting to buy three tons of ammonium nitrate -- ostensibly to be used to build a bomb -- and security officials said the group of mostly Canadian-born young men adhered to an ideology "inspired by al Qaeda."

Other charges against the men include participating in terrorist-training activity in the countryside north of Toronto. Smuggling of guns into Canada from the U.S. was also allegedly part of the plot.

Families and friends of the men gathered outside the courtroom, talking to each other, reading the Quran and praying, while outside scores of photographers and reporters clustered around lawyers and anyone wearing a burkha.

Since the arrests, contradictory reports about the accused have surfaced, with some people who know the men and one of the mosques they attended claiming that the oldest of the suspects, Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, was an extremist who sought to influence younger men. Others in the community say they are shocked by the arrests because they knew the young men to be focused on working, studying and raising families.

Mr. Jamal and six of the men, including Zakaria Amara and Fahim Ahmad, who are among those facing explosives charges, all prayed at the Al-Rahman center in Mississauga, a bedroom community west of Toronto that is home to many of the greater Toronto area's Muslim community, which numbers more than 250,000. Messrs. Amara, Ahmad and Jamal, along with a few others, were part of a regular Saturday prayer group, said a friend of the men.

DOJ_NMG_0032561

The friend described the men as religious, funny and "very smart" -- and not interested in terrorism. Mr. Jamal, who hails from Karachi, Pakistan, "was not a violent person," he added.

Yet other community members say Mr. Jamal was known for his extremist views. "He was totally against association with any non-Muslims," said Fahim Bukhari, director of the Mississauga Muslim Center.

Mohammad Attique, who several months ago began renting his basement apartment to Mr. Chand -- the man accused of wanting to behead Prime Minister Harper -- said his tenant was "very nice," worked in a nearby restaurant and created no problems, though he acknowledged they haven't talked much. They met at the local mosque in the Scarborough area of Toronto, which was attended by several of the accused. Mr. Chand had changed his faith to Muslim from Hindu some years ago, and goes by the name Abdul Shakur, Mr. Attique said. On Saturday, the day after the suspects were detained, about 10 police cars pulled up to Mr. Attique's house and searched the basement apartment for hours, he said.

Mr. Bukhari and Tarek Fatah, a spokesman for the Muslim Canadian Congress, say their community needs to acknowledge that there are "firebrands" among them. Some mosques don't do enough research when they invite guest speakers to meet with youth and may accidentally be helping the "small fraction" of the community that holds extreme view to win more adherents, Mr. Bukhari said. "The Muslim community has failed to acknowledge or even recognize that we have radicals in our midst," he said. "We have to find out who these guys are."

Prime Minister Said To Be Target (WT/AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown, The Asociated Press

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario -- At least one member of a group of terror suspects plotted to storm Canada's parliament and behead officials, including the prime minister, if Muslim prisoners in Canada and Afghanistan were not released, according to charges made public yesterday.

Authorities also charged that Steven Vikash Chand plotted to take over media outlets such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

"There's an allegation, apparently, that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada," lawyer Gary Batasar said. "It's a very serious allegation. My client has said nothing about that."

Mr. Chand is a 25-year-old restaurant worker from Toronto. Charges were expected to be read against at least some of the other suspects yesterday.

Mr. Batasar spoke outside the courthouse, where bail hearings for 10 of the 17 suspects were postponed. He said the charges were based on fearmongering by government officials.

"It appears to me that whether you're in Ottawa or Toronto or Crawford, Texas, or Washington, D.C., what is wanting to be instilled in the public is fear," he said.

The Ontario Court of Justice in Brampton, a small city just west of Toronto, said Monday that the suspects faced charges including participating in a terrorist group, importing weapons and planning a bombing. Details of the charges were not made public until yesterday.

Police expect more arrests, and intelligence officers are probing possible ties between the Canadian suspects -- 12 men and five teenagers -- and Islamic terror cells in six nations, including the United States.

A Muslim leader who knew the oldest suspect, 43-year-old Qayyum Abdul Jamal, said his sermons at a local mosque were "filled with hate" against Canada.

"These youth were very fun-loving guys, soccer-loving guys, and then all of sudden they were not associating with guys they used to," said Faheem Bukhari, a director of the Mississauga Muslim Community Center.

He said Mr. Jamal gave hateful, intolerant sermons at a storefront mosque in Mississauga, a city near Toronto, where six of the suspects lived.

"People around him knew he was very extreme," Mr. Bukhari said, adding that Mr. Jamal once told "the audience that the Canadian forces were going to Afghanistan to rape women."

Canada has about 2,300 soldiers in southern Afghanistan to bolster Afghan reconstruction and combat Taliban militants.

The adult suspects all are charged with one count of participating in a terrorist group. Three of them also are charged with importing weapons and ammunition for the purpose of terrorist activity.

Nine face charges of receiving training from a terrorist group, while four are charged with providing training. Six are charged with intending to cause an explosion that could cause serious bodily harm or death.

No information was released on the five teenagers who were arrested, owing to privacy laws that protect minors.

New Details Of Canadian Terror Charges Come To Light (USAT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0032562

By Beth Duff-Brown, The Asociated Press

USA Today, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario — Some of the 17 Mulsim men accused of plotting terrorist bombings in Canada also planned to storm Parliament, take hostages and behead the prime minister if Muslim prisoners in Canada and Afghanistan were not released, according to charges made public Tuesday.

Authorities also alleged that Steven Vikash Chand — one of 17 suspects in the case — plotted to take over media outlets such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

The new details of the charges added a dramatic dimension to a case that already has prompted tighter security along the U.S.-Canadian border and unsettled Canada's large Muslim community.

Police say they expect more arrests, and intelligence officers are probing possible ties between the Canadian suspects — 12 men and five teenagers — and Islamic terrorist cells in six nations, including the USA.

Chand, 25, a restaurant worker from Toronto, was one of 15 suspects who made brief court appearances Tuesday. They were arrested over the weekend. Bail hearings were postponed until at least Monday.

“There's an allegation apparently that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada,” said Chand's lawyer, Gary Batasar. “My client has said nothing about that.”

Batasar said the charges were based on fear-mongering officials. He also suggested that Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who expressed happiness at the arrests, should “keep out of the case.”

The Ontario Court of Justice in Brampton, a small city west of Toronto, had said the suspects faced charges that included participating in a terrorist group, importing weapons and planning a bombing.

On Monday, Mike McDonell, deputy commissioner for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, said there are “foreign connections” but wouldn't elaborate.

A U.S. law enforcement official said investigators were looking for ties between the Canadian detainees and Islamic militants held in the USA, Britain, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Denmark and Sweden.

U.S. authorities have established that two men from the state of Georgia who were charged this year in a terrorism case had been in contact with some of the Canadian suspects via computer, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

The U.S. Border Patrol put agents on high alert along the 4,000-mile border and stepped up inspections of traffic from Canada.

The adults are charged with participating in a terrorist group. Three also are charged with importing weapons and ammunition for terrorist activity.

Nine face charges of receiving training from a terrorist group, while four are charged with providing training. Six are charged with intending to cause an explosion that could cause serious bodily harm or death. No information was released on the five teens because of privacy laws that protect minors.

Praise Canada (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

Canadians are still digesting the news of the arrest of 17 Muslims caught trying to purchase three tons of ammonium nitrate, the equivalent of three Oklahoma City bombs. Reports suggest that among their targets were the iconic CN Tower in Toronto and the parliament building in Ottawa. Police say they expect to make more arrests, and there appear to be links between the group and at least two Georgia-based U.S. Muslims.

We'll count the milliseconds before somebody tells us this is more evidence of the evils of immigration -- er, never mind, New York Republican Peter King just did that. So instead we'll point out that this terrorist cell seems to have been entirely composed of citizens and legal residents of Canada. As interesting is that the cell was identified through the work of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, which monitored Internet chat rooms frequented by Islamic extremists. This again reminds us of the crucial role electronic surveillance plays in uncovering potentially catastrophic terrorist attacks. Question: Did that surveillance require a warrant? Do you care?

No less telling is that, while 2,000 Canadian soldiers are currently deployed in Afghanistan, Ottawa was a conspicuous dissenter against the war in Iraq and the concept of regime change generally. "If we change every government we don't like in the world, where do we start?" asked then-Prime Minister Jean Chretien in March 2003. This opposition would apparently not have spared Canada from the wrath of these home-grown jihadis, yet when Spain was hit by a terrorist atrocity in 2004 its support for the Iraq war was widely described as the principal reason. Ditto for Britain and the London bombings in 2005.

Meantime, the important thing is to praise the work of Canadian authorities in foiling what could have been another 9/11. We can only hope their American counterparts are as good.

DOJ_NMG_0032563

Military Alters The Makeup Of Interrogation Advisers (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Pentagon officials said Tuesday that they would try to use only psychologists, and not psychiatrists, to help interrogators devise strategies to get information from detainees at places like Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The new policy follows by little more than two weeks an overwhelming vote by the American Psychiatric Association discouraging its members from participating in those efforts.

Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, told reporters that the new policy favoring the use of psychologists over psychiatrists was a recognition of differing positions taken by their respective professional groups.

The military had been using psychiatrists and psychologists alike on behavioral science consultation teams, called "biscuit" teams because of the acronym, to advise interrogators on how best to obtain information from prisoners.

But Dr. Steven S. Sharfstein, recent past president of the American Psychiatric Association, noted in an interview that the group adopted a policy in May unequivocally stating that its members should not be part of the teams.

The counterpart group for psychologists, the American Psychological Association, has endorsed a different policy. It said last July that its members serving as consultants to interrogations involving national security should be "mindful of factors unique to these roles and contexts that require special ethical consideration."

Stephen Behnke, director of ethics for the organization, said psychologists knew not to participate in activities that harmed detainees. But Dr. Behnke also said the group believed that helping military interrogators made a valuable contribution because it was part of an effort to prevent terrorism.

Former military interrogators at Guantánamo told The New York Times last year that some psychiatrists and psychologists had advised them on how to "break" detainees to make them more cooperative. The former interrogators said they had been counseled on how to use a detainee's fears and longings to increase distress. One example was their taking advantage of a prisoner's fear of the dark, known from his medical records.

Dr. Winkenwerder, the Pentagon official, disputed those assertions Tuesday, saying he did not believe that such counseling had occurred. He said the biscuit teams gave interrogators advice only on how to establish a positive rapport with detainees.

Pentagon Limits Medical Role In Questioning (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon on Tuesday placed new restrictions on how doctors can be involved in interrogations of detainees, but critics deplored any policy that gives medical professionals a role, saying it can lead questioners to use harsher tactics than they would without medical advice.

The military's use of medical professionals in interrogations has drawn fire from human rights groups and medical ethicists. They have charged that doctors have been used unethically at the prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to force-feed detainees on hunger strikes and provide medical advice to help interrogators.

William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of Defense for health affairs who approved the new policy, said it was written to ensure that healthcare professionals play an appropriate role. The policy attempts to draw a clear distinction between medical personnel who care for the health of detainees and mental health professionals, called "behavioral science consultants," who assist interrogators.

Winkenwerder, in a conference call with reporters, said the "consultants" did not take part in interrogations. They make psychological assessments of prisoners, he said, but are not allowed to shape interrogations with their knowledge of a subject's phobias or medical vulnerabilities.

Leonard S. Rubenstein, executive director of Physicians for Human Rights, said the military should prohibit psychologists or doctors from aiding in the questioning of detainees. "They are using their professional knowledge to hurt people," he said. "The bottom line is health professionals should not be involved in interrogations."

The guidelines are part of a policy directive for medical personnel that was originally due to be released with the Army Field Manual and another directive on the treatment of detainees.

But the Field Manual has been held up by objections from members of Congress, who are worried that it might not go far enough to ensure prisoners are treated humanely. The Times reported Monday that the Pentagon has decided to leave out a key part of the Geneva Convention that bans "humiliating and degrading treatment."

DOJ_NMG_0032564

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) on Tuesday sent a letter to President Bush, saying such an omission would "make our troops and our country less safe."

"Given the current situation in Afghanistan and Iraq," he wrote, "it is an especially bad time to send a signal to the world that we no longer abide by internationally accepted norms for the treatment of prisoners."

The medical directive released Tuesday also makes no mention of international law or treaties.

"It is outrageous that there is no reference to Geneva," said M. Gregg Bloche, a Georgetown University law professor and one of the first to disclose the work of the behavioral consultants in an article in the New England Journal of Medicine.

The most controversial of the new rules for medical personnel are likely to be those governing the "behavioral science consultants," psychologists or other experts who advise interrogators.

The American Psychiatric Assn.'s guidelines prohibit its members from taking part in interrogations. Professional guidelines for psychologists are less clear.

The new policy notes that physicians, such as psychiatrists, are not ordinarily used as behavioral consultants, "but may be so assigned" when qualified psychologists are unavailable.

Critics have said the consultants give interrogators information that helps them to increase the discomfort, stress or ill-treatment of detainees, giving tacit approval that allows harsher treatment.

Under the guidelines, the consultants are permitted to "make psychological assessments of the character, personality, social interactions, and other behavioral characteristics of detainees." They can also train military personnel on "safe and effective interrogation methods" and advise them on the "potential effects of cultural and ethnic characteristics of subjects."

The rules, however, bar them from "the use of physical or mental health information regarding any detainee in a manner that would result in inhumane treatment or not be in accordance with applicable law."

"These words speak to humane behavior," Winkenwerder said. "And if you have observed our personnel in action … I can tell you they act humanely and they act with humane principle and they are ethical people."

He said the new rules consolidated existing policies and added new details. "They reaffirm what has been a tradition that goes back decades and decades and decades," he said.

Rubenstein, with Physicians for Human Rights, said anything short of a complete ban on the use of psychologists or physicians in interrogations would result in medical personnel helping interrogators use ever-tougher tactics.

"They have adopted the same policy and dressed it up in what purports to be safeguards," he said. "Once you get sucked into interrogations, the likelihood of violating ethical obligations and hurting people is high."

Many doctors and psychologists argue it is ethical to give classes on human behavior or other general instruction to interrogators. But giving advice on how to break an individual subject and make him or her talk crosses an ethical line, they say. The new rules allow such individualized advice, if the interrogators use lawful techniques.

Stephen Xenakis, a psychiatrist and former Army brigadier general in the medical corps, has criticized the use of doctors and psychologists in interrogations. He said he once supported the kind of wall the Pentagon is trying to create between caring for detainees and aiding in their interrogation.

But he now says such a distinction will be impossible. "You are always a healthcare provider," Xenakis said. "You can't be an interrogator in one job and a doctor in another."

The new guidelines may also tighten the use of medical records. At Guantanamo Bay, there was for a time no restriction on interrogators looking at medical records. The new directive does not restrict access to records but mandates that such disclosures are recorded.

The new rules also offer guidance on force-feeding. They say that medical personnel may assist in force-feeding detainees on a hunger strike "without the consent of the detainee to prevent death or serious harm." The directive says the treatment must be medically necessary.

The International Committee on the Red Cross prohibits force-feeding.

Xenakis argues that doctors should take steps, short of force-feeding, to try to keep patients alive, or persuade them to stop hunger strikes. But he said if patients were mentally competent, and rationally decide to starve themselves, medical personnel must let them do it.

"Patients have the right to exercise autonomy and starve themselves," he said.

Winkenwerder said the new directive adhered to the policy of the Federal Bureau of Prisons: to keep anyone under detention alive.

He said healthcare was provided "with the consent of the detainees," with the exception of those who are refusing nourishment. "We have a policy that is to preserve life," he said. "That policy is an ethical policy," he said.

Md. Teacher Accused Of Aiding Terror Group (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0032565

By Matthew Barakat

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

A third-grade teacher at a Muslim school in Maryland traveled to Pakistan shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, trained with a terrorist organization there and later served as chauffeur for one of that group's leaders during his U.S. travels, prosecutors say.

Defense attorneys argue that the government has no evidence the man was ever at the terror camp and say he was in Pakistan to arrange his brother's wedding.

Tuesday morning, jurors began their first full day of deliberations in the trial of Ali Asad Chandia, 29, who is charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, an organization that supports Muslim control of the disputed Kashmir territory on the India-Pakistan border.

Prosecutors have said Lashkar was a potential gateway for Americans and others who wanted to join the Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan in its fight against U.S. troops. The U.S. government declared it a terrorist organization in December 2001.

The charges against Chandia stem from a government investigation of what prosecutors called a "Virginia jihad network," a group of young Muslim men who used paintball games in 2000 and 2001 as paramilitary training for holy war around the globe. Ten people have been convicted in that investigation, including the group's spiritual leader, Ali al-Timimi, who was sentenced to life in prison for soliciting treason and urging group members to fight U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

Prosecutors do not allege that Chandia intended to take up arms against U.S. troops, but they say he received jihad training at a Lashkar camp in late 2001. Then, after returning to the U.S. in 2002, they say he helped Lashkar by assisting one of its officers, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, in his U.S. travels.

Specifically, Chandia served as a driver for Khan and picked him up at various airports. He also helped Khan obtain and ship equipment from the United States to Pakistan, including a remote-controlled aircraft and 50,000 paintballs, according to the government.

Prosecutor John Gibbs said the defense sought to portray Khan as an eccentric, largely innocuous character.

"He is not cute. He is a terrorist," Gibbs said of Khan, who was convicted in Great Britain of supporting Lashkar and sentenced earlier this year to nine years in prison.

Defense attorney Marvin Miller said prosecutors had no evidence that Chandia attended a Lashkar camp, only testimony from a witness who reported seeing Chandia at a Lashkar office in Lahore. Miller said Chandia traveled to Pakistan to help arrange his brother's wedding there in January 2002.

Miller argued that Chandia didn't know of Khan's connections to Lashkar. Chandia only agreed to help Khan because he was asked to by a friend, Masoud Khan of Gaithersburg, Md. Masoud Khan is currently serving a life sentence for his role in the Virginia jihad group.

Prosecutor David Laufman responded by putting a sinister-looking picture of Khan in front of the jury, and ridiculing the idea that Chandia had been an unwitting dupe.

Why More Must Be Done To Protect London (FT)

By Michael Cassidy

Financial Times, June 7, 2006

New thinking is needed on how to protect the public against terrorism. The ordinary citizen is in the front line when it comes to suicide attacks. The first duty of government is to provide that protection and yet, nearly a year on from last July's attacks in London, some simple measures are being sidelined. The London Assembly report into 7/7 reveals communication shortcomings as well as equipment deficiencies and one detects a lack of urgency in responding to these types of concerns. Furthermore, coverage surrounding the arrests in east London highlights the extent to which our transport infrastructure is a prime area of vulnerability.

My own experience in this area is as one who had to deal with the aftermath of the 1993 IRA attack at Bishopsgate in the City in my capacity as chairman of the policy and resources committee at Guildhall. I apply many of the lessons learned in that period to the situation today and find part of the official response inadequate. Then, as with last July, some improvisation was -necessary and volunteer support is always impressive on the day. The police and emergency services undertake heroic efforts in difficult circumstances. Yet a residue of concern permeates one's reaction to recent terrorist incidents.

One feature of the IRA campaign on the mainland was that warnings (not always accurate) were often given. Not so the modern terrorist. The perpetrators then sought to avoid being caught; not so the modern suicide bomber. CCTV is of only limited use in today's circumstances. If you are going to die anyway, what sort of deterrent is a camera at the scene?

The City's response at the time of the IRA campaign was the so-called "ring of steel" – vehicle checks at the eight entry points into the Square Mile. This was radical in its conception, was at the edge of available technology and was in some quarters criticised as an intrusion. In fact, it has proved to be a valuable tool in solving serious crimes. With the capability of tracking and photographing a moving vehicle after an alert given only four seconds after it has passed the entry point, it is an effective and efficient system to protect our principal financial district. But today we need random pedestrian checks in addition to examining vehicles. These should be targeted at what people are carrying rather than their likely ethnic origin. The public will respond positively to sensitive use of stop-and-search powers. However, very few of these have been apparent on the streets of London since July 7.

DOJ_NMG_0032566

Most business people welcome baggage checks at stations despite objections in the media last year when we advocated them to protect rail travellers. Technology will evolve to minimise delay to passengers, so that every Underground station will have a "loop" capable of setting off an alert that can be responded to in different ways if explosives are detected. There should also be more sniffer dogs on trains.

There is no adequate reason why police officers should not be required to be in uniform when travelling free on public transport. They can wear an "off-duty" badge if they want to avoid being pestered with trivia. But the main objection is based on possible confusion with British Transport Police. Can this stand in the way of a simple and cheap measure that would reassure the public in a busy metropolis which relies on public transport?

The Chamber of Commerce is working with Scotland Yard to build ties with the Asian business community to improve the flow of information that may frustrate terrorist attacks. On the one hand, the police are showing responsiveness to crimes that particularly affect that community and, on the other, business leaders are asked to encourage a better dialogue on likely threats from terrorist sources.

We also support the idea of government grants to give smaller businesses training and advice on resilience to attack. They should be encouraged to have half-day seminars on practical and sensible measures to help swift recovery from an attack, protecting their staff and customers and sustaining their systems. Look at the potential hazards arising from a chemical or biological attack and the imposition of an exclusion zone right where a business is located. Most small business proprietors would not know where to start.

The police have a tough job and resources are limited. But it seems that the political will is lacking to implement some of these practical ideas, despite the very positive response I received at Downing Street last October when they were first mooted.

So, if the politics is not right for new thinking to be brought to bear, let me come to my final thought. We need a government department focused on what has been loosely called "homeland security". Separate this vital responsibility from the rag bag of Home Office duties, some of which involve inherent conflicts when it comes to judging how best to protect the public. That might be more fit for purpose than the present arrangement, which seems bogged down in traditional thinking and is over-reliant on the chancy business of intelligence gathering. People want to see action on the streets and, this time, before the attack and not after it.

The writer is president of the London Chamber of Commerce and Industry

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York, You're Still No. 1 (NYT)

By Michael Chertoff

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Washington

LAST week, the Department of Homeland Security announced $1.7 billion in new spending for state and local governments, including more than $700 million under our Urban Areas Security Initiative. Few readers may know it based on the news media reaction, but these 2006 grants continue a financing stream that places New York and Washington at the very top of the list in terms of money received.

The terrorists who struck us on Sept. 11, 2001, and their allies continue to view New York and Washington as among America's prime targets. Therefore we have put our money where the threat is. Since the creation of my department, the New York and Washington areas, along with Los Angeles, Chicago and the San Francisco Bay Area, have received 45 percent of overall financing from the urban areas initiative.

New York has received more than $528 million of this money, which is more than Los Angeles and Washington combined. The $124 million that New York will receive this year is 50 percent more than the next-highest area, Los Angeles, and represents almost a threefold increase over the $46 million the city received in 2004.

It is true that, in real dollar terms, New York is receiving less this year than in 2005, when it got more than $200 million. Why? In large part because Congress gave us about $600 million less for our grant programs, including approximately $125 million less for the urban areas initiative. Still, this year New York will receive just under 18 percent of the total funds in the urban areas initiative. This falls in line with the city's average over the last three years of receiving 19 percent of the program's funds.

DOJ_NMG_0032567

There is a more fundamental point about these security grants. The Urban Areas Security Initiative awards are designed as capacity building investments. We are looking to pay for new equipment and projects that increase the nation's overall preparedness. They are not for routine and recurring operating expenses like salaries and overtime.

Therefore, while New York and Washington will continue to receive the majority of the money because of the heightened threat they face, future grants will also go to other, less populated areas that have not received much help in building even basic security capacities.

Besides, when we improve the overall level of security nationwide, it helps New York, too. The 2003 blackout clearly demonstrated that loss of critical infrastructure in parts of the country outside New York can have a direct impact on the safety of city residents.

Finally, I would like to clear up two other misunderstandings. First, contrary to news media reports, significant landmarks like the Empire State Building and the Brooklyn Bridge were included in our deliberation over where money would go. It is true that they were not classified as national monuments and icons. Why? To help New York's application.

We purposely placed these structures into other categories: the Empire State Building into the large office building category and the Brooklyn Bridge into the bridges category. We did so because those categories generate a higher complete risk grade for New York's financing proposal than icons like Mount Rushmore that, while important symbolically, would have fewer human and economic consequences in case of an attack.

Second, the Homeland Security Department has made every effort to rely on measurable facts and to take politics out of the process. State and local emergency management agencies — including those in New York — selected more than 100 local homeland security directors, fire chiefs, law enforcement officials and other experts to serve as peer reviewers of applicant-proposed solutions. When surveyed, 96 percent of the local and state agencies agreed that the panels that made the spending decisions included balanced representation, and 83 percent agreed that the peer review resulted in objective scores and results.

New York, Washington and a few other major urban centers face significant risks and rightly get most of the federal investment. But they are not the only cities at risk. Because the federal government cannot equally protect every single American at every moment in every place against every threat, we must manage the risk in the most effective way possible. And while we have significant resources, they are not unlimited. We have the obligation to ensure that those resources are invested wisely and fairly across the entire nation.

Michael Chertoff is the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security.

House Blocks More Funding For New York, Other High-risk Cities (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republicans blocked a vote Tuesday on restoring millions of dollars in counterterror funds to big-city targets, including New York, refusing to bust budget targets over slashed grants to emergency first responders.

New York City-area Democrats pleaded to add $750 million to spending plans to fund the Homeland Security Department in the 2007 fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. But Republicans rejected the measure even as they vowed anew to investigate how Homeland Security could justify cutting funding to New York and Washington _ the two targets of the Sept. 11 attacks _ by 40 percent.

The House approved the overall $32 billion spending blueprint, 389-9, shortly afterward.

"Short memories," said Rep. Nita Lowey, D-Westchester. "Such a cut is unconscionable. ... Reducing funding to New York and Washington, D.C., the two targets of the Sept. 11 attacks, is a slap in the face to every first responder who rushed to the emergency scene that morning and every individual living in those regions."

But Republicans worried about increasing the federal deficit noted that the Democratic plan would have only applied to spending in the 2007 fiscal year beginning in October and would not help this year. Still, they joined Democrats in promising to investigate how Homeland Security divided $710 million among 46 high-threat urban areas nationwide. The department's grant program took a $829 million cut from 2005, although some smaller cities, like Omaha, Neb., saw their funding increase.

"It's tough to understand, considering New York City remains the highest target for terrorism," said Rep. John Sweeney, R-Clifton Park. Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., who chairs the House Appropriations panel that oversees homeland security spending, told lawmakers he supported efforts to "further look into the matter."

Addressing another Homeland Security controversy, lawmakers agreed to shift $4.2 million from a department contract with a limousine company to fund firefighting grants. The owner of Shirlington Limousine has numerous felony convictions, and other clients used the Virginia-based company to chauffeur people to poker parties attended by House members, CIA officials and, allegedly, prostitutes.

DOJ_NMG_0032568

In all, the House bill would give Homeland Security $1.8 billion more in 2007 than this year. It bolsters protections at seaports by $448 million more than in 2006, adds 1,200 Border Patrol agents and boosts the Hurricane Katrina-beleagured Federal Emergency Management Agency by $6.5 billion for disaster preparedness.

For the second straight year, the bill also eliminates a $1.3 billion administration plan to raise fees for airline passengers.

The Senate has yet to write a similar bill.

City Will Not Change Its Strategy For Dealing With Terror (NYT)

By Sewell Chan And Winnie Hu

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that the city would not alter its strategy in future applications for federal antiterror money to comply with the Department of Homeland Security's preference for semipermanent safeguards like new technology over recurring costs like police overtime.

"We're not here to change our strategy to suit anybody," the mayorsaid. "We're going to do what we think is right, and if the burden falls solely on the taxpayers of New York City, that's not good. But in the end, our No. 1 priority is to provide security, and I would argue that the level of expertise in the city, in all of the different first-responder agencies, is as good as anyplace you'll find in the world."

While expressing disappointment about the 40 percent cut in annual antiterror money for the city announced last week, Mr. Bloomberg has made it clear since Sunday that he does not expect Washington to change its mind. "We have a very different philosophy than what the federal government does," he said in a news conference on Staten Island.

"While technology is important," he added, "it's really shoe leather that counts" in fighting crime and terrorism. "And so a very big portion of the monies that we always ask for are to cover labor costs, which typically the federal government does not do," he said. "We think they're wrong in that."

Last night, the House of Representatives approved an appropriations bill for the Department of Homeland Security for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, after Republicans blocked a vote on a proposal to restore $115 million in grants for New York City and $40 million for Washington, according to The Associated Press.

In a related development, the city's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, which has received about $14 million in federal funds for health and bioterrorism preparedness, said yesterday that the reduction in federal aid could hurt those efforts.

"This cut is likely to have an effect on our planning for radiation events, including subway detection and response projects, as well as on critical emergency response information systems," the deputy commissioner for disease control, Dr. Isaac B. Weisfuse, said at a budget hearing before the City Council.

He said that the department's request, as part of the city's grant application, included more than $5 million for radiation monitoring, $4.5 million for emergency response computer technology and $1 million on preparations for distributing vaccinations or treatments.

At the hearing, Dr. Weisfuse told Councilman David I. Weprin of Queens that the ultimate effect of the cuts was not yet certain. "Since this has happened relatively recently, we need to regroup and look at all our projects and see how we can attempt to fund them," Dr. Weisfuse said.

Despite Mr. Bloomberg's position, some New York politicians continued to push for the Bush administration to reconsider the grant allocation to New York.

Representative Vito J. Fossella of Staten Island, the only Republican to represent New York City in Congress, said yesterday that he had spoken with the White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, and urged President Bush to intervene.

"One, it's the right policy to do in the short term," Mr. Fossella said, "but over the long term I think the president really needs to set the example that when it comes to allocating homeland security funding it is going to be truly risk-based, it's going to be threat-based."

Mr. Fossella said that Mr. Bolten had called him in response to a letter the congressman wrote to President Bush on Thursday.

Mr. Bloomberg, however, stopped short of calling for the president to step in, saying, "I've dealt with the secretary, and I think that's the level that I should be dealing with."

Mr. Bloomberg said that the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, had promised to help the city to maximize the money that was awarded. The city still needs to document the proper use of the money before it can receive it.

The under secretary for preparedness, George W. Foresman, will try to expedite the process of securing the grant money, said Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0032569

Katrina Displaced 400,000, Study Says (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Hurricane Katrina displaced more than 400,000 people from the New Orleans area and the Mississippi Gulf Coast, according to a Census Bureau report to be released today, one of the most comprehensive looks at the hurricane-induced migration.

The figures show that the New Orleans metropolitan area, and not just the city, remains vastly shrunken in population four months after the storm, having lost 378,000 people, and that those who remained were more prosperous and were far more likely to be white.

Whereas the population of the New Orleans region was 54 percent non-Hispanic white before the storm, that proportion had grown to 68 percent in the months after the storm, the figures show.

"We knew the city was becoming whiter and less poor, but now we know the entire New Orleans region was," said William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution who analyzed the new figures. "This is the first real numbers on this. Everything else has been guesswork."

The figures show that the Gulfport-Biloxi region lost 41,000 people from before Katrina to January, ranking it second among metropolitan areas for population loss.

But in contrast to the New Orleans region, the Mississippi coast has become less white, the figures show. The proportion of non-Hispanic blacks in Mississippi's coastal counties has risen from 17 percent to 27 percent.

Exactly how many people have returned to the hurricane-ravaged areas and who they are has been a matter of intense speculation among public officials and businesses planning the rebuilding effort.

The new figures will not end the debate, however.

Census officials warned that some of the figures are subject to larger than normal margins of error and, moreover, that the figures are already at least five months old.

"The population estimates were from back in January, and back then the situation was a lot more volatile," said David Bowman, a researcher for the Louisiana Recovery Authority.

His estimates suggest that the population of New Orleans has grown from 156,000 in January to 192,000 in May. About 450,000 people lived there before Katrina.

The recovery has been far slower than many had expected, and the new figures only underscored the vast challenges ahead.

"Those who sit and speculate that the city will have 350,000 people next year are doing it on certain innate beliefs -- that people want to return, that there will be jobs," said Rob Couhig, one of the leaders of a rebuilding commission arranged by Mayor C. Ray Nagin.

Couhig said he expects that many who have left will never return.

Storms Also Shifted Demographics, Census Finds (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — In the four months following Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the population of the New Orleans metropolitan area became substantially whiter, older and less poor, and it shrank to less than half its size, according to statistics released today by the Census Bureau.

The figures were drawn from estimates of the hurricane-affected areas along the Gulf Coast as of Jan. 1, and cover 117 counties initially designated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for individual or public assistance. Separate data from the Census Bureau's 2005 American Community Survey, or ACS, analyzed demographic, socioeconomic and housing characteristics of the population in those counties.

Census officials and demographers said the new statistics provided the most comprehensive post-Katrina population and demographic figures to date.

"The data from the ACS provides the first quantitative data in support of anecdotal stories we have read and seen on television for the past nine months," said Lisa Blumerman, deputy chief of the ACS, which typically produces annual estimates of population and housing characteristics after a full year of data collection. This time, however, ACS divided the 2005 data into an eight-month period before Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and a four-month period after the storms.

DOJ_NMG_0032570

Census officials acknowledged that because of the survey's shorter time period, and the smaller sample size because of difficulties in conducting interviews immediately after the storms in flood-ravaged areas such as Orleans and St. Bernard parishes, "the reliability of the estimates is reduced."

Parishes and counties were combined into metropolitan statistical areas, and the margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The biggest population loss was experienced in metropolitan New Orleans, which includes seven parishes, and in the Mississippi Gulf Coast counties of Harrison and Hancock, and part of the Gulfport-Biloxi area also in Mississippi.

The population of Orleans fell from 437,186 in July 2005 to 158,353 after the storms. Nearby St. Bernard Parish lost 95% of its residents.

The New Orleans metro area's population was 37% black between January and August 2005 and fell to 22% between September and December 2005. The percentage of white residents grew from 60% to 73%. Households earning between $10,000 and $14,999 annually dropped from 8.3% to 6.5%; while those with a yearly income of between $75,000 and $99,999 rose from 10.5% to 11.4%.

"It's become substantially whiter, less poor, and there is a greater percentage of the area's people who have high-valued homes, or who are paying higher values of rent," said William H. Frey, a demographer and visiting fellow at Washington's Brookings Institution Metropolitan Policy Program, which analyzed the new census figures. "The changes also tend to impact the family structure and household. There is a decline in poverty."

Frey added that the disproportionate out-migration of lower-income and black residents to destinations farther away from New Orleans had likely slowed the return of such residents, because they lacked the finances, did not own their property, or if they did, the property might have been destroyed.

The percentage of households that were renters dropped from 36% to 27%, Frey said.

While population numbers have drastically decreased in Orleans and St. Bernard parishes, a dramatic rise has occurred in cities such as Houston and Baton Rouge, which absorbed large numbers of displaced people.

Harris County, where Houston is located, gained some 92,000 people in the last six months of 2005, according to the Brookings analysis of the census data. East Baton Rouge saw a population spike of about 4% in four months.

"Blacks tended to move to where they had relatives and friends or where they were first evacuated to," Frey said. People who relocated to nearby towns such as Baton Rouge tended to be middle class and own cars.

Blumerman, the census official, said other significant findings for the New Orleans area in the four months after Katrina included: The number of people who were living in a different home rose from 13% a year ago to 21% in January; the median age of residents had increased from 38 to 42; and, in Louisiana's federally designated hurricane-related assistance zones, the number of people in need of food stamps went from 12% to 31%.

Louisiana state officials said that while the data was useful, it was just "a snapshot."

"It's a partial picture of the changes," said Karen Paterson, a demographer at the Louisiana State Census Data Center.

Katrina's Unlearned Lessons (WP)

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

LAST WEEK the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers admitted responsibility for much of the destruction of New Orleans. It was not true, as the Corps initially had claimed, that its defenses failed because Congress had authorized only Category 3 protection, with the result that Hurricane Katrina overtopped the city's floodwalls. Rather, Katrina was no stronger than a Category 2 storm by the time it came ashore, and many of the floodwalls let water in because they collapsed, not because they weren't high enough. As the Corps' own inquiry found, the agency committed numerous mistakes of design: Its network of pumps, walls and levees was "a system in name only"; it failed to take into account the gradual sinking of the local soil; it closed its ears when people pointed out these problems. The result was a national tragedy.

You might think that the Corps' mea culpa would fuel efforts to reform the agency. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) are pushing a measure that would do just that, requiring that future Corps proposals be subject to technical review by an independent agency. But the stronger current in Congress goes in the opposite direction. A measure urged by Louisiana senators and written by Sens. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) and Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) would loosen oversight of the Corps. Billions of dollars may be spent in ways that ignore the most basic lessons from Katrina.

Congress has already passed laws with language directing the Corps to design a new flood-protection plan for Louisiana. The language encourages the construction of Category 5 protections for the whole state, a project that could cost tens of billions of dollars; it advertises its own profligacy by laying down that the flood-protection plan should be exempt from cost-benefit analysis. The new measure, which is reportedly part of a revised version of a water projects bill that will be unveiled shortly, would lower the bar for congressional approval of whatever Louisiana defenses the Corps sees fit to propose. Rather than requiring full votes in both chambers of Congress, the Corps' plan could be authorized by votes in two committees that tend to rubber-stamp such projects.

DOJ_NMG_0032571

In the wake of Katrina, this is almost beyond belief. The Corps' admission of its own technical shortcomings points to the need for tougher oversight, not less. And the New Orleans disaster has illustrated the folly of building flood defenses for vulnerable low land: Some of the worst-hit areas would not have been developed in the first place if the Corps hadn't decided to build "protections" for them. Encouraging the Army Corps of Engineers to build Category 5 defenses for all of Louisiana, including parts that are sparsely populated for good reason, would not merely cost billions that would be better spent on defending urban areas. It would encourage settlement of more flood-prone land and set the stage for the next tragedy.

Hurricane Forecasts: Good Headlines, Bad Science (USAT)

By Debora Wilson

USA Today, June 7, 2006

The 2005 hurricane season was clearly unprecedented and took a huge toll on our country and those whose lives and livelihoods were impacted. The only silver lining was raising the level of awareness among consumers, the news media and policymakers as well as local, state and federal governments.

One byproduct of this growing awareness is a much higher degree of interest among the general public in understanding and predicting what's going to happen this year. Unfortunately, this is spawning a new wave of individuals and organizations who bill themselves as experts, publicly issuing predictions that not only speculate on the number of hurricanes the USA will experience this season but also the specific regions where the storms will make landfall.

The news media love pre-season predictions, but they provide a misdirected focus. The question should not be "How many?" but, instead, "Are you prepared?"

Predictions are fraught with inaccuracy. While there is skill in forecasting whether a particular season will be active overall, there are no definitive scientific methods for predicting the exact number of hurricanes that will form during a particular year. Despite claims to the contrary, no verified means exist to pinpoint an area or region a hurricane will impact. For example, one prediction made shortly before Hurricanes Katrina and Rita devastated the central Gulf Coast claimed the East Coast would be the region most threatened during the peak of the hurricane season.

New predictions

In the past few weeks, another prediction that the Northeast is likely to be hit by a strong hurricane has garnered national headlines. Is the Northeast due for one? Absolutely. In fact, The Weather Channel recently highlighted the possible fallout from a Category 3 hurricane striking Manhattan in an episode of It Could Happen Tomorrow. But acknowledging that a potentially disastrous scenario exists is far different from predicting the timing of it.

Although these unfounded predictions do raise awareness in the forecasted areas, they also lull residents in other coastal regions into a false sense of security. None of these claims would pass as legitimate peer-reviewed research in the scientific community.

Is there a way to predict where a hurricane will make landfall?

According to our experts, steering patterns for major hurricane landfalls persist in multiple consecutive years and even tend to be predominant throughout a particular decade, leading to multiple regional strikes — such as the Florida Peninsula in the 1920s and '40s, the East Coast in the '50s, and the western and central Gulf Coast in the '10s and '60s. This would suggest that perhaps, continuing from 2004 and '05, Florida and the central-eastern Gulf Coast are the ones "staring down the barrel of a gun" once again.

Fickle patterns

Nonetheless, hurricanes do not always stick to one particular pattern or region. In the 1930s, hurricanes made landfall in locations spread widely from New England all the way to South Texas.

This is why experts should never jump on the bandwagon to issue seasonal hurricane forecasts. The fact is that nobody knows at this juncture what regions, states and communities will get hit this year. The same logic can be applied to recent claims that global warming is linked to the increased number of hurricanes. Until scientists can study additional hurricane seasons, it is impossible to validate these claims.

So the bottom line for the East Coast, the Gulf Coast and all coastal residents: Until science makes a lot more progress and enables us to credibly home in on who is going to get hit — months in advance — be equally prepared everywhere every year. Period.

Debora Wilson is president of The Weather Channel.

Are Hurricanes Uninsurable? (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0032572

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

It wasn't so long ago that insurers were pronouncing terrorism "uninsurable." But ask any insurer: Aon's Paul Bassett recently noted that the global war on terror had greatly reduced the threat of megaplots on the scale of Sept. 11, 2001.

Yes, suicide bombers and car bombs remain a threat, but not to the industry's capital base. Hurricanes are the new "uninsurable" now.

Here's a complicated story that only begins with warming ocean temperatures thought to justify an expectation of increased hurricanes. One risk modeler, Risk Management Solutions Inc., chucked out 100 years of hurricane data and brought together four climate scientists who probably wouldn't agree about much else but agreed that the next five years would see a higher-than-average number of hurricanes. Presto, a risk model employed by many insurers to set rates suddenly implies a 40% hike for Gulf Coast property owners.

A second factor: More hurricanes meet more people and property. Regionally speaking, Katrina came ashore in a low-rent neighborhood. Florida, a hurricane highway, represents an agglomeration of coastal property worth $2 trillion. New York City and Long Island offer a similar target. The Texas coast represents about $750 billion worth of bowling pins.

These scenic vicinities experienced building booms in the '70s and '80s, when hurricane activity was at low ebb. Beginning in the early 1990s, a series of devastating storms swept through, especially in Florida. Enter factor three: The willingness of the federal government to rush in with rebuilding aid far above even the billions in subsidized flood insurance already provided to coastal homeowners. Coastal development only quickened when it should have slowed.

Upping the ante were 9/11 and Katrina, which demonstrated to high rollers the federal government was incapable of not shelling out infinite sums to ease personal tragedies when bad things happen on a large scale (if you lose your house or loved one in an everyday mishap, of course, you're still on your own).

As anyone might have predicted, this dynamic is now unraveling the insurance industry's ability to help society control its risk-taking by properly pricing risk. Lloyd's Julian James put it this way late last year: "It seems to me that with $400,000 per family [paid out in the wake of the terrorist attacks and Katrina], if the government hands out checks, do people need insurance?"

In olden times, robber barons built their seaside mansions a safe distance from the ocean. Today's yuppies build their palaces right on the beach: FEMA reckons that a quarter of coastal dwellings will be destroyed in the next half century. The solution seems obvious: Restore the incentive for yuppies to behave responsibly like the robber barons.

This assumes two things: Insurers would have to be free to charge realistic rates, which is problematic given that rates in most states are approved by elected or appointed insurance commissioners, most of whom have their eyes on higher office.

It also assumes state courts will uphold insurance contracts -- a principle being tested in Mississippi, where Attorney General Jim Hood likens insurers to "Nazis in lockstep" and is pursuing civil and criminal complaints against them for refusing to pay for flood damage explicitly not covered in the policies they sold to homeowners.

The riskiest assumption of all is that property owners would be willing to pay "actuarially sound" rates rather than just skipping insurance and relying on a federal bailout in the wake of a big storm. Here's the real crux of the claim by some industry watchers that hurricanes have become effectively uninsurable.

In this camp is Robert Litan, a Brookings Institution economist who says bailouts have become politically mandatory and property owners expect them. So the only rational course now is to fund them in advance, with taxes borne mainly by those who benefit. Coming to a similar conclusion is Allstate CEO Ed Liddy, a one-man band who's been trying to drum up enthusiasm for a federal disaster insurance program.

He was a voice alone but lately has acquired allies in the form of State Farm and a few others. Mr. Liddy lays out an approach that, he claims, would tap all business and property owners in Florida who presumably benefit from coastal development even if their own property is inland. Folks in Peoria and Dubuque wouldn't be milked, as they are now, to subsidize the lifestyle of beach dwellers.

He also says his plan would mandate realistic insurance rates and impose damage mitigation measures to reduce the cost of hurricanes and discourage high-risk development.

Don't hold your breath for this part. Federal flood insurance was instituted in 1968 with the same good intentions -- to make property owners bear the cost of their own recurrent bailouts. Instead it became a subsidy to increased risk-taking. That program today is $21 billion in the hole, its shortfalls financed by taxpayers in Peoria and Dubuque.

Where's Al Gore when you need him? Mr. Liddy's plan may be a defensible concession to political realities, i.e., the inevitability of the federal government continuing to pay people to rebuild what storms knock down (see New Orleans). But it also makes an undesirable peace with over-development of coastal areas. The harder road of imposing market insurance rates on coastal property owners and ending taxpayer handouts would mean a lot of coastal development would come to a halt -- as it should.

DOJ_NMG_0032573

In any case, all agree the debate won't be settled in an election year, and probably not until another hurricane forces the country to face up to how the rest of us have been taxed again and again to subsidize the high-risk lifestyles of those who plant themselves in the paths of hurricanes.

WAR NEWS:

Senate To Hold Hearings On Iraq Massacre (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 6, 2006

The Senate will hold hearings soon into an alleged Marine massacre of Iraqi civilians, a committee chairman said Tuesday as Republicans and Democrats voiced serious concerns about the accusations.

"We've got our duty and we'll do it. We'll go wherever the facts lead," Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), the Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, said of the allegations that U.S. Marines killed up to 24 Iraqi civilians last November in the town of Haditha without cause and then engaged in a cover-up.

The Virginia Republican told reporters he wanted to hold the first of what he expected to be a series of hearings on the allegations as soon as Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell finishes his investigation into whether military personnel lied about what occurred at Haditha. Warner said Bargewell likely would be the first witness called.

Congressional aides say Bargewell's report could be completed within the week but that the military's separate criminal investigation is not expected to be finished anytime soon.

In a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Tuesday, Warner requested the Pentagon tell him "the earliest possible date that the department could provide witnesses" for the first hearing. Warner stressed that delaying the results of such investigations will mean that "a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain."

"We must do everything possible to prevent our military personnel, and indeed the values of all our military services, from being judged on unofficial information in the court of public opinion prior to the conclusion of official investigations," Warner wrote.

His counterpart in the House, Rep. Duncan Hunter (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., also has pledged to hold hearings in the House Armed Services Committee. But he, too, has said he wants to wait until the military completes its investigations to ensure Congress doesn't interfere with potential criminal proceedings.

Over the past week, more details have emerged about the November incident and a senior U.S. defense official said military investigators have evidence that points toward unprovoked murders by Marines.

Politically, the alleged murders in Haditha — as well as unsubstantiated claims of unprovoked civilian deaths by U.S. troops elsewhere in Iraq — threaten to further drag down support for the Iraq war and could turn into a political problem for President Bush and Republicans five months before congressional elections. Polls show voters increasingly uncomfortable with the direction of the war as well as more inclined to see Democrats leading Congress.

Returning to Washington after a weeklong Memorial Day break, lawmakers expressed grave concerns about Haditha and said the allegations could further tarnish the U.S. image abroad and hurt efforts to curb terrorism worldwide.

But Republicans and Democrats alike in both the House and the Senate also urged caution, saying that Congress and the public still didn't have all the facts and shouldn't prejudge the outcome of the military investigations.

"While it's too early to pass judgment on what happened, things don't look good," said Sen. James Inhofe (news, bio, voting record), R-Okla.

Added Sen. Ben Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Neb.: "If the initial reports are true ... clearly it's an atrocity."

"What we do know is pretty ugly stuff," said Rep. Adam Putnam (news, bio, voting record), R-Fla., who returned from Iraq just days ago. "I fear that Haditha can have even greater negative consequences in perception than Abu Ghraib," where U.S. soldiers abused Iraqi prisoners in 2004.

Rep. C.A. "Dutch" Ruppersberger, D-Md., who also recently returned from Iraq, said that if substantiated, what happened at Haditha "hurts our reputation in the world."

Rumsfeld Pressed To Disclose Findings Of Haditha Probe (AFP)

AFP, June 6, 2006

The top US senator on military affairs pressed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to quickly make public the findings of a probe into the alleged killing of Iraqi civilians by US Marines.

DOJ_NMG_0032574

Senate Armed Services Committee chairman John Warner, in a letter to the defense secretary, also vowed to hold a "series of hearings" on the alleged atrocities in the Iraqi town of Haditha on November 19.

"Congress and the American people are entitled to a timely disclosure of the official findings and recommendations of these inquiries," the influential Republican wrote in the June 6 letter.

"Delays in getting out the official findings of fact due to a protracted review process will mean a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain," he said.

"Given the alleged seriousness of these events ... these hearings are the first priority of our committee," the senator wrote.

The Pentagon is investigating whether US Marines killed 24 civilians in Haditha, a town northwest of Baghdad, after a marine was killed by a roadside bomb.

A separate inquiry is looking into whether there was a military coverup of the killings.

Pentagon officials have said the investigations are nearing completion but not given an indication when findings will be released.

Senators Press Pentagon On Haditha Hearings (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Eric Schmitt

New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee told the Pentagon on Tuesday that he planned to hold hearings "at the earliest possible date" into the reports of killings of civilians by marines in Haditha, Iraq. Other senators complained that the Defense Department had been slow to share details about the case.

In a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the chairman, John W. Warner of Virginia, asked the Pentagon to make available Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell, the Army general who is conducting one of two investigations into the incident. The inquiries are expected to find that marines killed at least some of the 24 civilians slain without provocation after a roadside bomb killed a lance corporal in their squad.

Democrats on the committee expressed growing frustration that the Pentagon was not sharing details about the inquiries since Time magazine published an article in March challenging the military's explanation of the deaths.

"They were very slow in notifying the committee, just like they were very slow in doing everything else," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the committee's senior Democrat. He added that military officials in Iraq "knew there was something amiss" but did not start the two investigations until March 9.

In his letter, Mr. Warner warned Mr. Rumsfeld not to delay making witnesses available to Congress. "Delays in getting out the official findings of fact due to a protracted review process will mean a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain," Mr. Warner wrote.

Speaking to reporters after dedicating a new Islamic prayer center at the Marine base in Quantico, Va., the deputy defense secretary, Gordon R. England, and the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, pledged thorough inquiries. "If we find people who have violated our standards, they'll be held accountable," General Hagee said.

General Bargewell's inquiry is expected to be sent to the second-ranking general in Iraq within the next few days, said a House Republican who received a briefing on Saturday from the officer in Baghdad.

Representative John Kline, a Minnesota Republican and a former marine, said in a telephone interview that he and three other lawmakers were told by the officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, that General Bargewell's inquiry was voluminous and "virtually completed."

But General Chiarelli told the lawmakers that before he approved the inquiry's conclusions, he wanted to ensure that it contained any major findings from the criminal inquiry.

Quantico Islamic Center Dedicated (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In the official speeches, no one mentioned Haditha. But as the Islamic Prayer Center was dedicated yesterday at the Marine Corps Base in Quantico, recent violence in Iraq, including the killing of 24 civilians in the western Iraqi town, allegedly by Marines, was on the mind of some.

Aisha Greenleaf Abdul-Mateen sat in a folding chair behind rows of other folding chairs, listening as Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England and Gen. Michael W. Hagee, commandant of the Marine Corps, spoke about the significance of the day -- the first Muslim prayer center for the Marines. She sat there as they pointed to the small white building behind them as a symbol of America's religious tolerance. And she remained there after they finished their speeches, took off their shoes and walked inside the center with a gaggle of journalists in tow.

DOJ_NMG_0032575

"If they would have asked someone like me to say something, they would have got the truth," said Abdul-Mateen, a Muslim and wife of a veteran.

She would have stood at the podium and said that the Islamic Prayer Center was a "beautiful, beautiful thing" but long overdue. She would have said that it shows "equality" and "justice" and "respect," but that those qualities were being lost in the bigger picture of the Iraq war. That the leaders weren't following what God wants.

"If they were," she said, "we wouldn't be in Iraq doing what we're doing -- hurting innocent people, having them take their clothes off and siccing dogs on them, and even what they're doing in Cuba."

Yesterday's ceremony marked the dedication of the building that has been in use by the base's Muslim community since the end of last year. The plan is to build a larger facility by 2009 to serve as a religious activities and family support center. Several who attended the ceremony described it as a positive step in relations with the Muslim community in the United States after a series of reported missteps recently in Iraq, such as the alleged atrocity in Haditha.

"The event was timely," said Ghayth Nur Kashif, an imam who served in the Korean war. "It's not going to be enough, but it's a start."

Lt. Abuhena Saifulislam, a U.S. Navy chaplain and religious adviser to the U.S. Marines, said the idea for the center came last July when he was assigned to the base. Muslim service members and international students came to him for help.

"They started asking me, 'Can we get a place to pray?' " he said, adding that they had been going off the base to Woodbridge and Stafford.

Saifulislam estimates that 30 people use the center, but he's confident that the number will grow.

"As it is known, they will come," he said.

England said 4,000 Muslim Americans are serving in all branches of the U.S. military. He said the center will be not only a space for them but also a place to educate people about Islam. Inside the center, which is mostly a large, empty room, the walls are decorated with educational posters topped with such questions as "Who is Allah?" and "What do Muslims believe?"

"At the end of the day, we are all brothers and sisters," England said.

Hagee said he believes that everyone shares the basic values of respect for human life, for the truth and for personal property.

"The Islamic Prayer center is really an extension of our ethos, this ethos we take care of one another," he said. "We are a family."

Even those at yesterday's ceremony who did not agree with the war and were solemn when talking about recent events under investigation in Haditha agreed that the center was a positive symbol of religious respect.

"This couldn't happen in any other country except America. It wouldn't happen in the Middle East," said Christopher Bell, a Vietnam veteran who started the Muslim-American Veteran Association. "We have our problems, but this is the greatest country as far as freedom goes."

Rumsfeld Is Correct - The Truth Will Get Out (NYT/IHT)

By Roger Cohen

New York Times/International Herald Tribune, June 7, 2006

NEW YORK "Ultimately the truth gets out, notwithstanding people's efforts to the contrary."

This sentence was uttered last week by Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. defense secretary, during a visit to Singapore. He was irritated at the time, as he often is, by what he regarded as a boneheaded question from a journalist about whether the Pentagon was too obsessed with Iraq to watch China's military.

But of course the words have a wider relevance to the Rumsfeldian universe. Indeed, in the mouth of their author they amount to a gem. The defense secretary, by design or despite himself, and more often the latter, is a master of the bon mot. Alas, he is not a master of self-criticism.

This, after all, is the same man who, back in 2002, tried to argue that the absence of evidence for Iraqi weapons of mass destruction needed some perspective. "Simply because you do not have evidence that something exists does not mean that you have evidence that it doesn't exist," he declared.

Or, as he put it in attempting to elaborate: "Absence of evidence is not evidence of absence." Or, trying again: "There are things we know that we know. There are known unknowns; that is to say there are things that we now know we don't know. But there are also unknown unknowns. There are things we do not know we don't know."

It seems Rumsfeld has a French side. Where is Descartes when you need him?

Unraveling all this was never simple. The unknown unknown: that's deep. But ultimately the truth gets out and lends itself to a simple declarative sentence. There were no Iraqi weapons of mass destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0032576

This is also the man who responded to the wholesale looting in the wake of Saddam Hussein's downfall in 2003 by saying, "Freedom's untidy, and free people are free to make mistakes and commit crimes and do bad things." Or, in a more succinct exegesis: "Stuff happens."

Yes, stuff does, and ultimately the truth gets out.

The truth, in this case, that Rumsfeld was so focused on the plan of attack in Iraq and securing Saddam's overthrow with a lean force, he had no time for any plan for the aftermath. So there was no post-invasion plan worth its name, to stop looting or a gathering insurgency.

Nor did Rumsfeld have time for the senior commander who questioned his nonplan. General Eric Shinseki, the former chief of staff of the army, was humiliated after suggesting "several hundred thousand troops" would be needed to secure Iraq. Rumsfeld didn't even bother to attend his retirement ceremony.

All this braggadocio ended up leaving the troops on the ground in Iraq exposed. Staff Sergeant Christopher Bush told me patrols in 2003 were known as "suicide runs." Humvees had no armor or turret shields.

Bush would remove the fiberglass doors so that it was easier to shoot; the doors were useless anyway. "Nobody told us to expect or prepare for that warfare," Bush said.

Least of all the defense secretary, whose lapidary comment was: "As you know, you go to war with the army you have, not the army you might want or wish to have at a later time."

But ultimately the truth gets out. You go to a war of choice, when you are the U.S. military, in the strength you opt to deploy, and if your calculation of that deployment - its nature, challenges and duration - is erroneous, you pay the price in the form of more than 2,400 dead Americans.

Or, as marine Lieutenant General Gregory Newbold, one of the retired generals who called for Rumsfeld's departure earlier this year, put it: decisions were made "with a casualness and swagger that are the special province of those who have never had to execute these missions - or bury the results."

On the subject of such burials, by the way, Rumsfeld has another bon mot: "Death has a tendency to encourage a depressing view of war."

Yes, Mr. Secretary, it does.

Another truth about death is now coming out. It concerns what happened on Nov. 19, 2005, in the farming town of Haditha, in Iraq's troubled Anbar Province. On that day, 24 Iraqi civilians were killed, as first reported by Time magazine.

An initial statement from the marines said 15 had been killed by a roadside bomb, and others by marines returning fire when their convoy was attacked.

It now appears, on the contrary, that a military investigation will confirm that, as Representative John Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, has said, "Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood."

Stuff happens. People lose it on Los Angeles freeways or in the New York subway. They lose it more often, and more devastatingly, when they're in a war against a shadowy enemy moving seamlessly through a sympathetic civilian population. We all remember My Lai.

Haditha is not My Lai. But it may resemble it at least in this respect: the suggestion of a cover-up in the aftermath of the killing is strong. Rumsfeld is promising clarity: "There's an investigation going on as to what took place. There's an investigation going as to what took place after whatever took place."

That French side, again.

I don't doubt Rumsfeld wants a thorough investigation. But there's a problem: when swagger and cavalier lack of preparation and disregard for facts have been your hallmarks, things tend to happen in your image. That's a truth Rumsfeld may ultimately have to face.

He said something else in Singapore, about Iraq. "Suddenly they are going to have a constitution - a piece of paper - that's going to have to hold the country together; not repression by a vicious dictator, but a piece of paper. And that is a big thing."

It sure is. And it needed more nurturing than Rumsfeld had patience for. Which is not a reason to cut and run now. Ultimately the truth gets out.

"Lawfare" Over Haditha (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The unfolding investigation of last November's events in Haditha reveals much more about the Bush administration's critics than it does about the U.S. armed forces. Although the inquiry is ongoing, it appears that 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians were deliberately murdered, allegedly by American Marines seeking revenge for a fallen comrade. If true, the episode was a war crime, something that must be -- and no doubt will be -- severely punished. However, the administration's critics are already cynically leveraging the Haditha killings as a means of undercutting the president, heedless of the effect this may have on American national interests.

DOJ_NMG_0032577

Here is an outline of the emerging anti-Bush thesis: Haditha was the fault not of a handful of Marines, but of an administration that has refused to honor international law. As support, critics point to the administration's refusal to grant Geneva Convention rights to al Qaeda or the Taliban, to the use of aggressive interrogation techniques to obtain intelligence from terrorist detainees, and to a determination not to treat these individuals as ordinary criminal defendants. All of this is claimed despite the fact that the most fundamental aspects of administration policy -- that the U.S. is at war, that individuals captured in this war can be held without trial as "enemy combatants" or tried by a military commission -- have been vindicated so far by the courts.

Nevertheless, the killings at Haditha and a handful of other incidents in which U.S. troops have violated the laws of war (and are in the process of being punished) are already being cited as evidence of a systematic problem with American forces abroad and American leadership at home. In fact, although scores of atrocities have been alleged in Iraq and Afghanistan, the vast majority have been false claims. Most recently, for example, charges that U.S. forces executed civilians during a March 15 night-time raid on an al Qaeda safe house in Ishaqi proved to be groundless.

To put things in perspective, it is worth noting that abuses and violations of the laws of war have occurred in every armed conflict in human history, regardless of how well-led or disciplined were the troops involved. Indeed, by the standards of past conflicts, U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan have behaved in exemplary fashion, using force in combat with unprecedented precision, minimizing collateral damage and civilian deaths -- often at risk to themselves and to their mission. In Iraq, this has been the case even though American forces are fighting in the toughest possible urban insurgency environment.

Overall, all U.S. forces, including the Marines, have used deadly force in a proportionate and discriminate manner, fully in accord with the laws and customs of war. By contrast, our enemies engage in war crimes on a daily basis as a matter of policy. For them, targeting civilians is not the exception but the rule -- it is the essence of the "asymmetrical" warfare they practice.

Throughout history, irregular forces have used the surrounding civilian population in two distinct ways. First, guerrilla fighters do not wear uniforms or carry their arms openly -- critical elements of lawful warfare -- so as to hide among the civilian population. In effect, they use civilians as shields. Second, like the insurgents in Iraq, they seek to goad opponents into mistakenly, or deliberately, attacking civilians -- as a means of mobilizing the population against the regulars. The killings at Haditha show how this strategy can work.

However, the advent of modern media coverage -- coupled with a growing and valid concern among democracies about humanitarian norms during warfare -- has provided a new tactical innovation, increasingly known as "lawfare." Al Qaeda and the Iraqi insurgents thus routinely claim that American forces systematically violate the laws of war by targeting civilians and abusing prisoners. These claims are not targeted at the Iraqi people (although similar claims regarding insults to Islamic believers are so directed) but at public and, especially, elite opinion in the U.S. and other democracies. With Vietnam as its model, the Iraqi insurgency well understands that it can win only by undermining America's political will to win, and the center of gravity in this conflict lies in Washington, not Baghdad or the Sunni Triangle.

These lawfare tactics have several other important consequences. If the Pentagon's investigation of Haditha was delayed, it was most likely because similar massacre allegations are made virtually every time American forces take to the field. The fact that, in Iraq, IED explosions are so often followed by insurgent attacks launched from civilian structures also clearly gave credence to the initial -- and evidently incorrect -- reports from Haditha. When civilian buildings are used in insurgent operations, civilians often are killed in the crossfire, and so the report that a number of civilians had been killed by small arms in Haditha would not have appeared exceptional to the U.S. commanders.

Ultimately, the Haditha incident must remind American policy makers -- and the American people -- of the challenges of modern warfare. Although the individual actions of U.S. forces on that day may have been exceptional, the surrounding circumstances are not -- and our enemies will look more and more to such irregular tactics. The Pentagon's emphasis on exhaustively training American troops in the laws of war is a good first step. U.S. forces already are the best equipped and trained in history, and it is only through a constant emphasis on duty, discipline and American values that our armed forces will prevail in Iraq and similar conflicts.

At the same time, should the Haditha incident mature into a full-fledged war crimes drama prompting a premature U.S. withdrawal, the damage would not be limited to Iraq. If the U.S. cannot fight and win against a brutal urban insurgency in Iraq today, its ability to defeat any determined foe willing to sacrifice the civilian population in irregular warfare will be in question. This can only benefit the most vicious regimes and movements. The Bush administration's critics should pause a moment, and reflect, on whether this would really be worth it.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey, lawyers in Washington, served in the Justice Department under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0032578

Torture As Defined By The Media (WT)

By Douglas MacKinnon

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

In case you have been the least bit curious as to why al Qaeda and other Islamist terrorist organizations are convinced -- beyond a mushroom-cloud shadow of a doubt -- that they can defeat the United States, the evidence is no further away than your newspaper, radio, network or cable news outlet. If all else fails, the twisted leadership of these evil terrorist organizations know they can always count on the liberals in the mainstream media, as well as the liberals in Congress and Europe, to act as their unquestioning propaganda ministers. To prove that what we once believed to be up is now down, and what we thought to be right is now wrong, we have several examples that embolden al Qaeda with every news report or printed word.

First, is the case of Army Sgt. Santos A. Cardona. Don't recognize the name of this very honorable man? Maybe it will ring a bell if I said he was the "dog handler" recently found guilty of using a dog to unlawfully threaten a former high-ranking Baath Party member. Or, as some liberals in the press have maintained, found guilty of "torture." How hard must murderer Abu Musab Zarqawi be laughing with that news. He brutally beheads Nicholas Berg and then reads that some in our country equate a distinguished soldier holding a barking dog in front of a prisoner with "torture." Of course, let us not forget why Nicholas Berg was killed. Zarqawi said it was to avenge the "abuse" of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison. A story that CBS News proudly broke with apparently no thoughts as to the consequences of its action. Would Nick Berg be alive today had CBS not run the story? No one will ever know. But as a Pentagon source told me with regard to Abu Ghraib, "the liberal media turned what was really nothing more than a fraternity prank gone bad into 'torture,' and as an instrument to dishonor the U.S. military."

Next on the list of "torture" as defined by the liberals in the media, Congress and Europe is something called "waterboarding." Not familiar with this brand of "torture"? It's a method that may be employed by the CIA in which terrorists who harbor information about future attacks against the U.S. or U.S. forces are strapped to a board and dunked into water so as to prod their faulty memories.

To say the New York Times, The Washington Post, the major networks, and every other liberal news organization is outraged by this alleged treatment of terrorists would be an understatement. Never mind that such tactics may save thousands of lives in the U.S. or hundreds of U.S. troops. As far as the liberals are concerned, it is an evil beyond comprehension.

Again, if dunking a known terrorist into water for a few seconds is "torture," what word would the Times, Post or networks use to describe what the insurgents do to the young Iraqi policemen they capture? Young men who are only trying to feed their families and help their nation. Young men who, before they are shot to death or beheaded, have their teeth ripped out with pliers, have their fingernails torn out, are burned with cigarettes, have their fingers sliced off, and are electrocuted. The liberals in the media don't seem too worked up about this real torture.

Don't take my word for it. Do an online search and compare how many words the New York Times and Washington Post use to condemn our nation and "waterboarding," as opposed to the unthinkable torture these young Iraqi policemen endure.

Finally, we have the case of Haditha -- a town in Iraq where U.S. Marines may have knowingly killed innocent civilians. If in fact this happened, it's a disgrace and those guilty must pay the highest price possible. That said, these Marines are U.S. citizens who deserve every right granted to them under our laws--innocent until proven guilty being paramount.

Of course, as far as the left-of-center media is concerned, these Marines are already war criminals. And, if truth be told, the media could care less about their guilt or innocence. The media are just grateful that they have the Haditha case with which to hammer the Bush administration and tarnish the 99.9 percent of U.S. soldiers who have not only served honorably, but many of whom have lost their lives to save Iraqi civilians. The liberals in the media understand that with each news report on the new My Lai, each case where a U.S. soldier is punished for letting a dog bark in the face of a war prisoner, with every story that equates dunking a terrorist in water with chopping off a human head, they tell these Islamist terrorists that political correctness is weakening our foreign policy and military and robbing us of our will to prosecute the war or defend our nation. They know but don't care. For them, the real enemy is Mr. Bush and conservative beliefs.

Down is now up. Wrong is now right. And the terrorists are not only grateful, but on the way.

Douglas MacKinnon served as press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole and as a White House and Pentagon official.

Iraqi To Release Detainees In Bid To Ease Tensions (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 6 — Iraq's new government said Tuesday that it would release 2,500 detainees, nearly 10 percent of those held in Iraqi and American detention centers, and that it would adopt a "national reconciliation" plan to reintegrate former members of Saddam Hussein's ruling Baath Party into society.

DOJ_NMG_0032579

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said the first 500 detainees would be released Wednesday, with others following in the next few days. An American military spokesman said the decision to free the detainees, the largest group to be released in the 38 months since the American-led invasion, had been agreed to in a joint review by Iraqi and American officials. He said those freed would not include any deemed "guilty of serious crimes such as bombings, torture, kidnapping and murder."

Mr. Maliki, in his third week in office, gave few details of the reconciliation program. But he compared it to South Africa's "truth and reconciliation" process in the 1990's, which, he said, "sent some criminals to the courts and reinstated other people in society after promising not to try and rebuild" the country's apartheid system. The Iraqi leader said his government's plan, like South Africa's, would involve a national commission, and others in Iraq's 18 provinces, that would work to "an agreed timetable and program."

At a news conference here, the 56-year-old prime minister drove home the carrot-and-stick approach he outlined in a visit last week to the southern oil city of Basra. There, he vowed to use "an iron fist" to crush Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias terrorizing Basra, but promised that his government would rule in ways that would make a priority of rebuilding Iraq on the basis of justice for the communities of Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds now engaged in a bitter struggle for economic and political power.

On Tuesday, Mr. Maliki's focus was on the Sunni Arab minority that was the mainstay of Mr. Hussein's rule. "We are ready to turn a new page with those who so desire it, and we will respond with force to those who want to pursue violence," he said. "Those who want to end the bitterness of the past have the way open through the process of national reconciliation, but those who choose bloodshed will find us ready to deal with them."

The detainee release, though sweeping, seemed likely to fall far short of the demands of Sunni politicians who have joined in the uneasy partnership with the dominant Shiites in the new government, the first with a full, four-year tenure since Mr. Hussein's overthrow. The Interior Ministry said Tuesday that a total of 27,800 people were being held in Iraqi and American prisons across the country — a figure that included criminals and former Baathists as well as insurgents and members of their support network.

A spokesman for the American military command, Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, said there were about 14,500 detainees in the detention centers run by the American-led forces, including several thousand at Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad.

Colonel Curry said the terms of the detainees' release included a pledge to renounce violence "and to be good citizens of Iraq." He added, "All of these detainees selected for release have been found to be relatively low threats."

Similar pledges have been made by other detainees released since Iraq resumed sovereignty after the formal period of American occupation ended two years ago, including a group of nearly 1,000 men who were freed from Abu Ghraib last August. Some of those have since been killed in clashes with American and Iraqi troops, or rearrested on suspicion of involvement in the insurgency. The August release was ordered as a concession to Sunni Arab leaders then engaged in tense negotiations with Shiite and Kurdish leaders over the new Constitution.

Mr. Maliki's message on Tuesday offered assurances to Shiites and Kurds who were Mr. Hussein's principal victims, and, implicitly, to American and Iraqi troops, who with Shiites have borne the brunt of the Sunni-led insurgency that has gripped the heartland of Iraq.

The detainees being freed, he said, "are not Saddamists, terrorists or people with the blood of the Iraqi people on their hands, but people who have committed certain mistakes, cooperated in a certain manner or played some kind of role" in Mr. Hussein's repression and what has followed.

But the Iraqi leader's emphasis on reconciliation, and the detainee releases, seemed to signal a breakthrough for American officials, who have been pressing hard for new measures to placate the Sunni Arab minority. In effect, Mr. Maliki's announcements signaled to Shiites, whose religious parties secured a dominant role in the government after last December's election, that there needs to be a softening in the "de-Baathification" process that has marginalized thousands of Sunni Arabs who worked in Mr. Hussein's government and armed forces.

Strongly backed by Shiite leaders, the process won eager backing from the American occupation authority after the 2003 invasion. But American officials have all but disavowed the process now, seeing it as one of the prime causes of Sunni discontent that feeds the insurgency.

"We know that there are a lot of Baathists who want to put the heavy burden of having joined this ugly party behind them," Mr. Maliki said, and the mechanism for their doing so would lie in the reconciliations commissions and the opportunity to pledge "not to return to the party and rejoin society."

In a move that underscored the tide of violence that has many Iraqis saying they preferred life under Mr. Hussein's harsh dictatorship, the Health Ministry confirmed figures on Tuesday that showed 6,002 bodies, most victims of violence, were delivered to Baghdad's main morgue in the first five months of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0032580

The figure for May, 1,375, was more than double the figure for May last year. Morgue officials have said that as many as 20 of the daily average of more than 40 bodies that arrive every day, many of them blindfolded, with tied wrists and showing signs of torture, remain unclaimed.

On Tuesday, police reported at least 25 new victims, most of them in Baghdad and in Diyala Province, east and north of the capital, which has been the center of some of the most brutal sectarian killings involving Sunnis and Shiites in recent weeks.

The death toll in one of the most grisly recent attacks, in the village of Hadid, near the Diyala provincial capital of Baquba, rose to 17 on Tuesday when the police delivered nine severed heads to the Baquba morgue in the fruit boxes in which they were found in the village.

On Saturday, eight other heads were found in the village. Notes found with the bodies indicated that the victims were Sunnis killed in retaliation for the killings of five Shiites, four of them doctors, in a earlier attack.

On Sunday, 20 people traveling in two minibuses and a car were stopped on a highway near Baquba, pulled from their vehicles and shot. The victims included seven students on their way to final exams in the city. Mr. Maliki, at his news conference, spoke angrily of the "flood of blood" that had been spilled in similar attacks in and around Baghdad since he came to office.

He said his government had approved a plan for a security crackdown by Iraqi and American troops that would concentrate on Baghdad and Diyala, which he described as "a launching pad for terrorists and former regime elements," meaning Baathists, who use the province as a base for attacks in Baghdad.

His comments tallied with those of American military commanders, who have identified Baghdad, Diyala and Anbar Province, to the west of the capital, and particularly the provincial capital of Ramadi, where insurgents have mounted some of their boldest attacks of the war in the past month, as priorities in the next phase of the war.

Mr. Maliki's first weeks as Iraq's leader have been burdened by his failure to win approval from rival factions in the government for nominees to the cabinet's top security posts.

He told reporters that he would try again at a meeting of Parliament on Thursday, and that he would be submitting the same names — Farouk al-Araji, a Shiite who was an officer in Mr. Hussein's army until 1993, as interior minister, and Gen. Abdel Qader Mohammed Jassim, a Sunni who is a commander in the new army, as defense minister. Their names were to have been put to Parliament on Sunday, but disagreement within the government caused the session to be canceled.

Iraq's Premier Planning To Free 2,500 Detainees (WP)

By Omar Fekeiki And Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 6 -- The Iraqi prime minister announced Tuesday that he would release 2,500 detainees from jail in an effort to calm tensions between Iraq's sectarian and ethnic groups and head off spreading violence.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called the move a "positive message and a chance for those who want to rethink their strategy." He specifically excluded detainees connected to violent attacks and supporters of the former government of Saddam Hussein from his amnesty.

The people to be released "are not Saddamists or terrorists," Maliki said at a news conference. "They weren't involved in the bloodshed or imposing the sectarian mentality and cleansing. They are people who made mistakes."

The first group of 500 detainees will be released Wednesday, Maliki said. About 28,700 detainees are being held at U.S. and Iraqi detention facilities in Iraq, according to a U.N. human rights report issued last month.

Iraq's Interior Ministry, which controls the police force, holds about 5,000 of those detainees, even though the ministry is not supposed to keep detainees in custody for a long time. Sunni Arabs critical of the Shiite-dominated police force have regularly demanded the release of detainees, saying they are often tortured in police custody. The U.N. report also reported the accusations.

Leaders of the Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential Sunni Arab organization, said Monday that they wouldn't participate in a broad-based national reconciliation conference on June 20 unless all detainees were released. The Arab League, which is organizing the conference, hopes to attract a broad range of political, religious and tribal leaders, as well as some leaders of armed groups willing to lay down their arms.

Maliki said the planned release of the 2,500 detainees wasn't an answer to the Sunni association's demands. But he said it proved the government's commitment to moving ahead with Iraq's future by creating "a positive environment" for peace.

"It is not a compromise," Maliki said. "Whoever wants to reconcile shouldn't make conditions. They should come to discuss and talk. Conversation is the main factor for reconciliation."

Maliki said the move did not mean Iraq was changing its strategy for dealing with an epidemic of violence that has escalated since his government was formed 2 1/2 weeks ago.

DOJ_NMG_0032581

"There is no change," Maliki said. "Using force against the terrorists will continue. Releasing detainees who weren't involved in the shedding of Iraqi blood will continue. And the national reconciliation process will continue."

So far, however, Maliki's government has been hamstrung by his inability to gain a consensus on who should run three security ministries with control of the police and army. At the news conference, he said the candidates will be presented at the next session of parliament; a session scheduled for last Sunday was postponed because of last-minute bickering.

"The government alone cannot deal with the security issue," Maliki said. "The role of the people is very important in maintaining security."

Meanwhile, military authorities reported Tuesday night that a bomb killed a U.S. soldier of the 49th Military Police Brigade on Monday. Iraqi police and news services also reported the deaths of more than 30 Iraqis, including nine whose severed heads were discovered in Diyala province, north of Baghdad.

Iraq's Tougher Stance Toward US (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

Christian Science Monitor, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Abu Ghraib prison scandal was a contentious topic when Iyad Allawi became Iraq's interim prime minister in June 2004. But Mr. Allawi, appointed by the occupying power, resisted domestic pressure to conduct an Iraqi investigation.

Now, amid charges of violence by US troops against Iraqi civilians, including an alleged massacre in the Sunni village of Haditha, elected Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is showing no such reticence. A critic of the US occupation before taking office, he has charged that such violence by coalition forces is a "daily phenomenon" and "a terrible crime," and demanded that the US turn over to Iraqis information on the Haditha case.

Mr. Maliki's tough stance suggests a new assertion of sovereignty by the Iraqi government, something that actually works to the US's favor. But the allegations, coming as the new government tries to demonstrate control, are likely to complicate both US-Iraq relations and Maliki's task of leading the Iraqi people.

Already, some Sunni religious and political leaders, in particular, are criticizing Maliki, a Shiite, for not being strong enough with the Americans. If his response falls short in their eyes, political relations with the minority Sunni population, already fragile, could become more difficult - and anti-American sentiment could intensify.

"Maliki is being hammered by the Sunnis. He has to worry about the rising fortunes of people like [radical Shiite cleric Moqtada] al-Sadr. So he needs to be able to show some sovereignty," says Iraq expert Henri Barkey, a former State Department analyst now at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa. "The trick for the US is to boost this guy, because there may not be another one after him."

A year ago, a minority of members in Iraq's interim national assembly sought a timetable for US troop withdrawal. In the new parliament, Mr. Sadr's supporters are even stronger. That, coupled with the parliamentary presence of a Sunni bloc, has added to pressure for a US withdrawal.

Maliki has a "soft spot" for that viewpoint, says one Iraqi former official who refused to be named because of the sensitive nature of US-Iraq relations. But the prime minister also knows he needs US troops to cope with a worsening security situation in Baghdad and other areas of Iraq, the former official says. As a result, Maliki is likely to seek compromise measures short of withdrawal - including establishing zones that are off limits to US troops and requiring joint US-Iraqi patrols - to try to placate public concerns.

Incidents like the one alleged in Haditha, which can feed Iraqi resentment about living in insecurity, only make Maliki's task harder, some experts say.

"Incidents like Haditha have the effect of widening the gap further between the people and the government, because they leave them feeling like they are totally on their own," says Juan Cole, an Iraq expert at the University of Michigan. Iraqis see their new elected officials operating from inside Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, he says, while they remain "outside" in the crossfire of a counterinsurgency battle and a "civil war."

In that environment, threats to civilians are not uniquely or primarily from US forces. Just this week, more than 50 civilians were kidnapped midday just north of the Green Zone. A Sunni political group accused militias associated with the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry of carrying out the operation.

On Tuesday, Maliki pledged to implement a new security plan for Baghdad that he said will address mounting sectarian and militia-generated violence.

With such worries, Maliki can't be too tough with the Americans, Mr. Cole says. "The government is in a difficult position because it's not able to tell the Americans to leave or what to do, but at the same time it needs to mollify a public that accuses it of letting American troops operate around the country marauding at will."

DOJ_NMG_0032582

Simply "demanding the Haditha file" from the US "is a symbolic gesture that only reveals his dependence on the American side," Cole says. What could begin to remedy that is a formal status of forces agreement, or SOFA, between the US and Iraq that would lay out the functions and limits of US forces, he adds.

"The problem is they have what is essentially a hung parliament" - unable to fill the key defense and interior minister positions - "and that hardly puts them in a position to demand a SOFA," Cole says.

If the Iraqi public comes to see its government as weak or atrophied, that would spell trouble ahead, especially as officials begin to tackle major constitutional issues.

Divisive matters - including the formation of autonomous regions, the dividing of oil revenues, and the status of the northern oil-rich hub of Kirkuk - are slated to be settled by the end of the year. Resolving them was supposed to be facilitated by the inclusion of Sunnis in the new parliament and government, but mounting Sunni criticism of Maliki is just one indication of how difficult progress will be to achieve.

For one thing, Maliki - and his US backers - are discovering that the proudly proclaimed "national unity government" that represents all major population groups may actually be more unwieldy and less able to act.

In a recent report, Iraq expert Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies notes: "Rising participation did not reflect acceptance of the new government or political process, it reflected a steady sharpening of political division along sectarian and ethnic lines."

Some experts calculate that Maliki has fewer than 120 supporters in a 275-seat parliament. "If the Maliki government does not make real headway on security and the constitutional issues," says the former Iraqi official, "then it could go down."

Another Grisly Discovery In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — When they saw the boxes in the street, villagers feared the worst: bombs or props for an ambush. The boxes' content, however, was grisly, not explosive. Inside, officers found the decomposing heads of nine men, each inside a black plastic bag.

The discovery Tuesday was the second of its kind near the city of Baqubah in recent days, according to police.

As Iraqi politicians have continued to bicker over who should be named to the new government's top security jobs, killings and brutality have escalated across the country, claiming thousands of lives since December elections.

In Baqubah, a mixed city north of the capital, slayings and attacks against Iraqi security forces have recently soared. On Saturday, eight other heads were found in banana crates near the city. One of the heads was wrapped like a present. None of the bodies have been found.

But Baghdad continues to be the epicenter of violence.

On Tuesday, authorities reported that a car bomb went off near a funeral in a southwestern neighborhood, killing six people and injuring 18. In a different part of town, a roadside bomb exploded at a bus stop, killing one woman and wounding two men.

Earlier in the day, the principal of Hamza primary school, Amer Azzawi, a Sunni Muslim, was driving with his Shiite Muslim assistant, Suaad Rubaie, when a drive-by gunman killed them. They were slain in the vast Shiite slum of Sadr City in the eastern part of the capital.

On the west side of Baghdad, police found the body of a young woman who had been shot several times.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military announced that an American soldier with the 49th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday evening when insurgents attacked his convoy with an improvised explosive device in the capital.

In a news conference Tuesday, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki promised to implement a new security plan for Baghdad soon but refused to provide details. Maliki instead focused on the release of 2,500 detainees from Iraqi- and U.S.-run prisons as part of a campaign of "national reconciliation."

However, the country has seemingly continued to splinter since the parliamentary elections.

Basra, a key port city in the south close to the Iranian and Kuwaiti borders, has recently become a problem area, with violence exploding between competing Shiite factions. After a recent visit, Maliki imposed a monthlong state of emergency in the city.

West of Baghdad, in Ramadi, described as the "philosophical heart of the insurgency" by U.S. commanders, insurgents continue to attack U.S. troops on a daily basis. Several neighborhoods are controlled by insurgents, according to residents. The U.S. military recently deployed 1,500 additional troops to Al Anbar province, of which Ramadi is the capital.

On Tuesday, the U.S. military announced that Iraqi soldiers had taken over from American troops in Habbaniya, a town in Al Anbar province between Fallouja and Ramadi.

It was the first division-level transfer of authority in the western province, according to the military.

DOJ_NMG_0032583

However, there as elsewhere, American-led troops will continue to provide logistical aid to the Iraqi soldiers, including medical evacuation and aerial support.

Basra's Descent Bodes Poorly For Allied Mission In Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, June 7, 2006

As Basra goes, so goes Iraq?

It certainly, and worryingly, seems that way.

Three years ago, as the initial military victory in Iraq teetered into chaos, the southern, mainly Shiite city of Basra stood out as a hopeful symbol of how the country could recover. The British, who controlled it, put decades of colonial know-how to work.

They made friends with local leaders, patrolled on foot without helmets and fixed problems on the spot.

It seemed to work. Basra was touted as a hopeful showcase for coaxing Iraq into a stable democracy.

Three years later, what's happening in Basra is far more ominous. The British occupiers are no longer so welcome or as much in control. Rival militias duke it out on the streets. There has been ethnic cleansing of Sunnis, who held power when Saddam Hussein was in charge.

Last week, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki imposed a state of emergency there — but to little effect. Violence since then has included a weekend car bombing that left 28 dead and more than 60 injured.

Major Rob Yuill, a British official who trains Basra's police, told The (London) Times the city was becoming like sectarian Bosnia, and "we're stuck in the middle." Though security forces are being trained, most are loyal to one of the militias.

What happens in Basra could well set the agenda for the rest of the country. The city of 1.3 million people is Iraq's main port and center for the country's 60% Shiite majority. It sits on large oil reserves. Some Shiites want to form a quasi-independent superstate with Basra at its center. They want to abandon the minority Sunnis, leaving them with no oil.

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a revered Shiite cleric, has tried to hold Iraq together and ethnic bloodshed down, but his influence has seemed to wane lately. The elected unity government in Baghdad — the last best hope for quelling the insurgency and a slide into civil war — is so weak it hasn't even managed to appoint ministers of interior and defense, the two most important posts.

The situation in Basra raises a question: Does it make more sense to stay to try to quell increasing sectarian and terrorist violence, or leave and let Iraqis fight it out? British officials have talked of drawing down troops soon — while insisting that their mission has been more success than failure.

Their decision is likely to foreshadow the U.S. endgame in Iraq. Perhaps some uneasy calm can first be achieved. But right now, Basra seems more to reinforce Lawrence of Arabia's cautionary words in 1920 about British involvement in Iraq. Mesopotamia (as Iraq used to be known) was, Lawrence said, "a trap from which it will be hard to escape with dignity and honor."

Salvaging Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

Washington Post, June 7, 2006

The images from Iraq are of hell on earth: On Sunday 12 Iraqi students traveling to Baqubah to take their final exams were dragged from a bus and killed because they practiced the wrong religion. The next day gunmen dressed in police uniforms kidnapped 56 people near the bus station in central Baghdad and hauled them off in pickup trucks.

This is an Iraqi nightmare, and America seems powerless to stop it. What would you think if you were the parent of one of those dead Iraqi children? You would want the United States, the nation that broke the fragile bonds that once held Iraq together, to act more effectively to control this violence. And you would want Iraq's so-called government of national unity to behave like one and stop the killers who are devouring the decent people of Iraq. And if neither the Americans nor the Iraqi government could protect your children, you would turn to the militias.

The American project in Iraq is unraveling. The president continues to talk about staying the course, and the White House still issues upbeat predictions of victory, but the course we are on is not working. The election of Iraq's first permanent government in December was the last good chance to put the pieces together. Nearly seven months after the elections, Iraqi politicians still can't agree on who should run the two key ministries, defense and interior.

An American friend wrote me this week from Iraq: "The civil war rages in Baghdad, regardless of what the PC word currently being used in Washington to describe the killing is these days. Each morning when the sun comes up, the bodies of the killings from the night before are gathered up and sent to the hospitals where they try to figure out who they are. While the new government, all of the ministries, the coalition and the bloated embassy bureaucracy all sit frozen in the Green Zone, this civil war rages on just outside the wire and concrete barriers."

DOJ_NMG_0032584

A devastating summary of America's mistakes is contained in the latest installment of the Pentagon's quarterly report to Congress, "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq." In every part of the country, fewer people than a year ago think the situation is better now than before the war. In the Baghdad area, pollsters found the percentage of optimists had fallen by half since March 2005, to about 30 percent.

And the violence grinds on: The rate of insurgent attacks is higher now than it was in 2004, with an average of more than 600 a week since the new government took over in February. U.S. military commanders talk of their success in splitting the Sunni insurgency, but the attack numbers don't reflect any lessening of its lethality. Meanwhile, the Shiites are fighting back with equal viciousness, and the Pentagon numbers show a sharp rise in sectarian killings over the past year.

What we're seeing in Iraq is a mismatch between ends and means: between a political strategy of unity and the reality of feuding factional leaders; between a military strategy of "clear, hold and build" counterinsurgency and the reality that most American soldiers remain hunkered down every day; between the goal of stabilizing the country and the daily reality of physical intimidation.

What can America do to mitigate the Iraq disaster? Certainly it doesn't need more strategy papers. The political and military strategies now in place talk the right language of unity and counterinsurgency, but this is still mostly Green Zone talk. Marine Capt. Scott A. Cuomo argues in the June edition of Marine Corps Gazette that the U.S. military should make "embedded training teams," living and fighting with the Iraqi security forces, its main effort. He says frankly of his own combat experience in Iraq: "We did very little to truly help indigenous security forces protect the populace from the insurgency."

A bold proposal comes from my friend in Iraq, who knows the security situation there intimately. He argues that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki should move his government's 27 ministries, which increasingly are operating in the Green Zone, out into the city. The Iraqi army would protect each outpost of the government, aided by U.S. teams. "The population needs to see there is a government that has the courage to reclaim the city, one district at a time."

My friend likens the current frantic pace in the Green Zone to people in socks trying to run on a slick linoleum floor. "There is a lot of activity, but very little forward motion," he writes. "Hope is not a strategic plan, and the status quo is unacceptable."

Donors Accused Of Spending Aid Outside Iraq (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, June 7, 2006

Foreign donors spend too much of their aid to Iraq outside the country and ordinary Iraqis do not feel they are being helped by the international community, the country's new minister of planning has told the Financial Times.

Ali Baban said he would push for a comprehensive review of the way aid to Iraq was being spent. He also warned against pressure from the likes of the International Monetary Fund on his country to scrap subsidies on oil products and food, which currently run at $8bn (€6bn, £4bn) annually.

In one of his first salvos since taking office just over two weeks ago, Mr Baban said: "The donor countries must listen to Iraqi needs and to the views of Iraqi officials."

But he also committed his ministry – responsible for development aid and investment – to creating a special division to woo foreign investors. "We will give them all the guarantees they need," he said in Baghdad.

Some 40 to 50 per cent of all foreign aid ends up outside Iraq, says Mr Baban. He accused donor countries of spending the money on foreign advisers and security personnel "usually from the same country that makes the donation. Iraqi people receive very little."

The donor community has long been familiar with the complaint. But one foreign official in Baghdad said that under the current security situation it was inevitable that much training was done outside the country. Similarly, it could not be helped that every infrastructure project has to spend 30 per cent of its budget on security.

Mr Baban warned that the economy could only improve if the security situation was tackled first. But the security situation alone did not account for the "ineffective" way the aid was being spent, he said. Donors put too much emphasis on training courses and capacity building. "When the Iraqi government and the ministries give a list of their needs and requirements, of equipment, buildings, hardware, often this list will be neglected."

The US, with a current aid programme of more than $18bn, has been responsible for most of the larger infrastructure-related projects. But of the more than $10bn that has already been spent, the largest single outlay has been on security and law enforcement, which has been more than $4bn, according to the Washington-based Brookings Institution.

Donors other than the US had pledged $14bn to Iraq, as of December 2005, notes the report. Of this, just over $3bn has been disbursed.

International institutions, meanwhile, thought the country would need $56bn in reconstruction and stabilisation aid from 2004 to 2007, a number that Brookings says is probably too low.

DOJ_NMG_0032585

But rebuilding the country's infrastructure was ultimately up to the Iraqis, said the aid official in Baghdad, noting that the country was potentially very rich. "They have to get their own house in order, with the allocation of oil resources and the priorities for their ministries."

Mr Baban warned that Iraq might not be able to enact economic reform soon, or reduce subsidies as envisioned by the International Monetary Fund.

"I hope the IMF will take into consideration the situation in Iraq and not pressure us to do what will be hard for our people, especially cancelling subsidies," he said.

Iraq spends large amounts on subsidies for oil products and food that is still distributed through a state network.

Mr Baban said that lifting these subsidies now would undermine confidence in the government.

He was worried about the impact on foreign investment of provisions in the country's new federalist constitution that allocate oil resources to regional authorities. "It will make foreign companies hesitate to invest a dollar in new Iraqi fields," he said. He feared it might threaten the future of the Iraqi petroleum industry. The constitution would have to be amended, he said.

'We Have Your Husband' (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

LaPORTE, Ind. -- A sign stands outside the KarMel Coffee House.

NEW HOURS

7 AM--5 PM

TUNA SALAD

$4.25

PRAY FOR

JEFF AKE

Jeffrey J. Ake is 48 now, if he is alive. He is also a husband and son and the father of four children who miss him terribly. He is a storyteller, a Rotarian and a small-business owner who thrived in distant capitals.

He traveled to Iraq, tools in hand, on a private contract to repair machines at a water-bottling plant. Early one morning in April 2005, the telephone rang at a lakeside rambler in LaPorte, 80 miles east of Chicago. An Iraqi man, talking fast in poor English, told Liliana Ake, "We have your husband."

Fourteen months later, nothing is known about his whereabouts, while his family waits and neighbors wonder what to expect after so much silence. No American has been held captive longer in Iraq and come out alive.

Many other kidnappings in Iraq carried political motivations, but the Iraqi man who called LaPorte demanded only money. He said he wanted $1 million and he wanted it the very next day, in Baghdad.

Liliana Ake pleaded for Jeff's life.

"Don't cry, lady," he said. "Everything is fine."

She reacted quickly enough to ask questions that only Jeff -- in Iraq for just three days when he was seized -- could answer, including one about his dog. The man called back with the right answers. But three weeks later, the telephone stopped ringing.

"Nothing at all. For over a year, we haven't heard anything," Liliana Ake explained in her first newspaper interview since her husband's abduction. "We pray every night. My little boy says, 'Bad people in Iraq have my dad. It's not fair.' "

She believes he is alive, perhaps because she must. At the same time, she is bothered by the sense in LaPorte, where people have been supporting her and rooting for her husband, that Jeff is becoming mostly a memory. Signs like the one at the KarMel are fewer. It is as though Jeff Ake is slipping away.

"I pray for his faith, that he is in God's hands and he will be back when it's time," she said. "Maybe he was killed a year ago and we will not find him for 15 years. But if you let yourself ask these questions, there is no hope. These are very practical, cynical questions. I know he will be back."

More than 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since the war began in March 2003. Among the most famous, Christian Science Monitor reporter Jill Carroll made it out. So did Roy Hallums, a U.S. contractor who escaped after 10 months. Job seeker Nick Berg did not. His beheading was shown on television.

At last count, at least 13 Americans, including Ake, were among 42 foreigners still missing, their fate unknown. U.S. authorities continue to look for clues, a State Department spokesman said.

When the first call came, Liliana Ake could barely believe her ears. Jeff was the smooth and gregarious world traveler she had met 12 years ago while studying in Chicago, the Midwestern businessman who had willingly moved to her native Russia to be with her and her daughter. When he left for Baghdad, he had carried crayons and coloring books for the children of Iraqi workers.

DOJ_NMG_0032586

Al-Jazeera broadcast video images of Ake controlled by men carrying assault rifles. Television crews began to camp outside the family's modest house in LaPorte, population 22,000. Gov. Mitch Daniels (R) helped Liliana's mother come from Kamchatka. Neighbors brought food. Strangers offered to baby-sit.

The churches in town began to prepare a joint prayer vigil, which Mayor Leigh Morris said would be a "community outpouring." But he said the Akes passed word to keep a lower profile lest the kidnappers conclude Jeff Ake was a prominent citizen and raise the stakes.

Morris said, "We didn't want to do anything that could have been disadvantageous to Jeff."

Meanwhile, U.S. investigators were working the case in Baghdad and in LaPorte, focusing on the telephone calls to the Akes' house. As Liliana pleaded for time, a kidnapper, in no mood for delay, named a Baghdad hotel where he expected to collect the money.

"We said, 'We have the money. Just tell us how to get it there,' " said James Ake, Jeff's father, who also lives in LaPorte. "He said, 'That's your problem.' "

Within an hour of the abduction in Taji, 12 miles north of Baghdad, the U.S. Hostage Working Group was alerted. A team escorted by a U.S. Army patrol interviewed workers at the bottling plant. Group coordinator Dan O'Shea went to Ake's hotel to talk with the staff and gather his belongings.

"We assumed Jeff's kidnapping was criminally motivated by money and not political," O'Shea wrote in an e-mail interview. "There is a hostage-trading market for kidnap victims who are sold up the chain to insurgent groups who are going after significant sums of money or to send a political message. In Jeff's case, the information just went cold relatively early in the case."

The Akes continued to lie low, waiting for word. Following the advice of FBI negotiators, they chose not to speak to the media, contrary to the approach used by Carroll's parents and Hallums's family.

Earlier this year, the Ake family agreed to the posting of fliers in Iraq, offering a $280,000 reward for information. Still nothing.

"You just have to rely on the advice that they're giving you, which is what we did," said James Ake, who said it is "harder and harder to believe" Jeff will return. "Just think of trying to find someone in Chicago who didn't want to be found."

Loretta Ake, Jeff's stepmother, said the youngest Ake son joined the army and recently received deployment orders for Iraq.

"He just told us he was going," she said. "I told him the only good thing to come out of it: Find Jeff."

Morris begins every meeting of the city council and the board of public works with a prayer for Ake. He looks each day at notepaper in a box. One each sheet, his wife has written a date and the corresponding number of days Ake has been missing. The total has passed 400. There are 545 sheets in the box.

"We're hoping to throw many of them away unused," said Morris, who called his fellow Rotarian "just an all-around solid person." He acknowledged that, after so many months, Ake's captivity is "not a front-burner, constant conversational item," but he is not surrendering hope.

"The fact that we have had no definitive bad news may be good news in itself," Morris said. "At least we would prayerfully hope so."

A sign at a LaPorte laundromat still reads "God Bless Jeff Ake and His Family." At the Temple News Agency, a coffee shop, Angela Stone believes Ake is "always in the back of people's minds."

"This is a small town. Nobody is used to having anyone in the national spotlight," Stone said. "It makes people not know how to react. The protocol is really up in the air."

At the KarMel Coffee House, Dianne Allen said the "Pray for Jeff Ake" sign stays out during the week, as a measure of warmth and respect for Liliana, a regular often called Lilly. Customers sometimes ask if there is any fresh news.

"I think the customers are wanting to know something so they can continue their prayers or just move on," Allen said. "People say, 'Because we haven't heard anything in so long, he's gone.' Our thoughts are, 'Well, nobody knows that.' If Lilly knew how much the community cared, she might give a public comment in the paper or a news conference and announce he's still with us or he's not."

Ake said she would give information if she had it.

"The people who know me understand that I don't have any information, except I truly believe Jeff is alive," she said. "I know he's alive. It can be a matter of time."

She follows other cases closely and traded e-mails with Carroll's twin sister.

"When she was released," she said, "I cried with joy."

DOJ_NMG_0032587

While she waits, Ake does her best to manage the water-bottling-equipment firm and to pay the bills. She takes strength from fellow parishioners at LaPorte Missionary Church and generous volunteers from the Service League and Rotary Club. She has slept through the night only twice in nearly 14 months, typically waking up in fear at 1 a.m. and not falling asleep again until 5:30. She often sees Jeff in her dreams, where "he is always different, more quiet."

"I don't feel isolated, just that life is going on and it becomes a side issue [for others]. For me, it intensifies. I don't want to cry," Ake said, tears forming. "I'm trying to be strong, but you can't always be strong. I do feel sorry for myself many times. I'm without my husband, and my kids are without their father."

Ake shuttles her children to their grandparents' house and an array of activities, including dance and piano lessons. She says she wants Jeff to be proud of his children when he sees them again. She keeps a big plastic tub for him, packed with articles about his kidnapping and cards sent by well-wishers.

"Unfortunately, there are not many more cards coming," she said. "Time goes by."

Ake wears a bracelet, given to her by the sister of a fellow church member who died of cancer. It says "Miracles happen."

Baghdad's Wealthy Are Careful To Hide Their Riches (PHI)

By Nancy A. Youssef

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Baghdad's al-Rashid Street, one of the city's oldest, was once full of intellectual and commercial life. Poets and scholars traded ideas over tea in small cafes where men played dominoes. Young men shopped for affordable fashions.

Now, it's desolate, and shops such as Abu Haider's are empty. Most of his customers have fled the country; the rest are afraid to be seen in his shop, where fine suits hang. Walking out could make one susceptible to kidnapping. Only the rich shop there, the kidnappers might conclude.

Indeed, in a country whose populace is undeniably richer now than during Saddam Hussein's regime, keeping up with the Joneses means not showing wealth because kidnapping has become so rampant. Those who can afford the best have replaced their nice cars for clunkers, don plain clothes, carry second-rate cell phones and no longer wear gold jewelry.

"The rich man pays the cost of what he owns," said Abu Haider, who declined to give his full name, instead offering a name he's known by. Abu Haider knows. He commutes to his shop by motorcycle, because only the poorest ride them.

According to police estimates, at least 60 people are kidnapped in Baghdad every day, often by thugs seeking ransom. But paying thousands of dollars doesn't guarantee one's release; many bodies are found daily in alleys and fields, some beheaded. Most were kidnapped.

In a flagrant move even by current standards, about 50 people were kidnapped Monday in central Baghdad, pulled from their cars or off the streets by armed men who everyone suspects were police. Witnesses said those who appeared wealthy were the ones snatched.

Saad al-Qasi, 27, owns a cell phone shop. But he washes the shop's windows himself and helps workers at neighboring shops carry in merchandise so that no one will figure out that he's the owner. Outside his shop sits a beat-up Toyota Corona.

"The kidnappers base how rich you are on your phone and car," al-Qasi said.

Al-Qasi, who comes from an upper-class family, said he knows of 15 people who've been kidnapped, including his father-in-law. All were released, but none for less than $30,000. Because of that, his family worries about him if he isn't home by 7:30 p.m.

Car dealers, such as Ali Nawar, 48, have traded in their BMWs and Mercedes-Benzes for less ostentatious models, and they have customers who've done the same.

Nawar said he bought six cell phones - one for each member of his family, including his young children - so he could keep track of everyone.

"We call each other every hour," said Nawar, who has decided to move his family out of the country in July, when school lets out.

Middle-class parents fear that someone will nab their children for money. Enrollment at some of the more expensive kindergartens, such as the Children of Iraq School in east Baghdad, has dropped because parents fear their children will be snatched. Who else but Baghdad's wealthy would spend $50 a month on school?

Instead, they enroll their children in schools such as Noor Kindergarten, which charges $30 a month.

Shamar Faraj is the Noor headmistress. She wears simple clothes and no gold. Her school is equally modest. All around the neighborhood, there are checkpoints, in part to prevent kidnappings. She said some parents have come to her school out of fear. Despite all the security measures, she can't promise them that their children are safer at her school.

"I am scared to tell them one thing and then something happens. It's a big responsibility," Faraj said.

DOJ_NMG_0032588

Mohammed Hassan al-Kazzaz, chairman of the Iraqi Chamber of Commerce, used to buy a new car every six months and sport fancy clothes. But after a group of men stole his car at gunpoint, he switched to a 1992 Volkswagen. Because he can't resist, he keeps one Mercedes hidden in the garage. His best suits come out only for important meetings. Often, he changes in the car on the way.

"If someone sees me in my nice clothes, they will kill my guards and kidnap me," he said.

Shops in the Baghdad neighborhood of Arasat once served the country's wealthiest, among them Saddam's son Odai, for whom the area was a favorite. Today, most shops are closed, and the others are struggling.

Some shop owners have started selling more conservative clothing or slashing prices. But they said the biggest challenge is getting people to walk through their doors.

At the Simma women's clothing shop, a woman who wanted to be identified only as Umm Ali said she sometimes sells only three pieces of clothing a week. She said she stopped sending her son to school after kidnappers learned she was a shop owner. They kidnapped his friend by mistake.

A few weeks later, a man walked in and demanded money. "I couldn't give him any because I simply didn't have any," she said.

Instead of fretting about his inability to live the good life here, al-Qasi said he's planning a month-long trip to Syria. He said he would rent the best car - maybe a sports car - and buy the best clothes. When he runs out of money, he'll return to Iraq, sans his new purchases. He'll keep them in Syria instead.

"I just want to buy," al-Qasi said.

Al-Kazzaz, whose family lives outside of Iraq, said he remains in the country despite having the resources to leave - and the pleas of his family - for a reason:

"I prefer to stay in my country. Eventually, it will improve. It has to."

Knight Ridder Newspapers special correspondents Huda Ahmed, Shatha al Awsy and Mohammed al Awsy contributed to this report.

Afghanistan: Roadside Blast Kills 2 G.I.'s (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Two American soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing in Nangarhar Province, east of Kabul, a United States military spokeswoman said. A third soldier and an Afghan interpreter were wounded in the blast, she said. The military also said three American soldiers were wounded in a car bombing south of Kabul.

Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Thousands of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan may be risking permanent brain damage by returning to combat with relatively minor but undiagnosed concussions, often caused by bomb blasts, military researchers say.

Doctors say they are only now understanding the scope of the problem. Researchers screening returning soldiers and Marines at four military bases found that about 10% suffered at least a minor brain injury during combat. About 20% of troops in front-line infantry units suffered such injuries.

The injuries frequently go undiagnosed because troops have no visible wounds or may not know they suffered a concussion, doctors say. Medics and field doctors often aren't aware of what happened during fighting.

More than 500,000 soldiers and Marines have served in or near Iraq and Afghanistan since Sept. 11, 2001, sometimes more than once.

“This blast group is going to be potentially huge,” says Angela Drake, a neuropsychologist with the Defense and Veterans Brain Injury Center, a research arm of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Pentagon. “We're looking at thousands of potential patients.”

Military doctors describe brain injuries as a signature wound of these wars. That's because advances in body armor save soldiers who might have died in previous conflicts, but blast waves from roadside bombs can cause brain damage.

U.S. troops in Iraq are exposed to hundreds of bombings each month. “We've seen patients who have had three deployments and have had some (head) injury on every single one,” Drake says.

The damage from multiple concussions can be irreversible. “Repeated concussions can be quite serious and even lethal,” says Air Force Maj. Gerald Grant, a neurosurgeon who treated troops in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0032589

The Brain Injury Center is urging the military to track the number of concussions troops suffer. A handful of military bases use the screening procedures developed by the center, but the Pentagon has declined to mandate the survey.

Pentagon health official Michael Kilpatrick questioned the accuracy of the screening and whether soldiers even remember information they're asked for: "Most people, when they get knocked out, don't really know it."

Military researchers, however, say the two-question survey has proved highly accurate.

"I think they're afraid," Drake says of the Pentagon's decision not to screen for concussions. "The sheer numbers are overwhelming. This is a worrisome thing. It's like opening a can of worms."

The Pentagon is developing a simple mental exam that medics can use on troops who may have suffered a brain injury. If the test shows evidence of a mild concussion, a servicemember could be kept from combat until the injury heals. Kilpatrick says this test could be used in Iraq within a few months.

Even Mild Injuries To Brain Add Up (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 7, 2006

After a land mine exploded under his armored vehicle last October in Barwana, Iraq, Marine Sgt. Devon Bradley remembers a deafening noise and a flash. Then nothing.

Seconds later, when he came to, Bradley grabbed his weapon and went back into the fight. He led his team for the next two months in efforts to clear insurgents from Barwana.

"We're hard dogs, and I kept pushing to be with my Marines," says Bradley, 29, who was on his third combat tour.

But something was wrong. In the weeks that followed the blast, he began forgetting what other Marines had just told him. He struggled to handle more than one task at once. Taste and smell disappeared. Worst of all, so did the name of his soon-to-be-born daughter, Addison. Bradley says he had to dig through letters from home to remember it.

He was eventually flown to a battlefield hospital where he was diagnosed with a concussion — his second in the Iraq war and the third of his life. Bradley learned that what he thought was post-nasal drip was actually leaking spinal fluid. By January, he was back at Camp Pendleton in California. Doctors told him his brain may never fully recover, and his career in the Marine Corps is in doubt.

After more than three years of war in Iraq, where bombs are the biggest threat to U.S. troops, military doctors are seeing a growing number of brain injuries among soldiers and Marines caught too close to a blast. The vast majority are mild concussions that cannot be detected even with a CT scan or MRI.

Mild brain injuries can heal in days or even months. Additional concussions can cause permanent damage. "This is a real issue, and people are … taking it very seriously," says Deborah Warden, director of the Defense and Veterans Brain Injury Center, a research arm of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Pentagon.

The ramifications are broad. How do field surgeons and medics diagnose a wound they can't see? What can be done when soldiers and Marines try to shake off the blast effects, unaware of the concussion, and keep fighting? Should the Pentagon keep tabs on how many concussions each servicemember suffers? And if so, how many concussions is too many before someone is kept from combat?

"We're not at the Star Trek point where we can run a phaser over everybody and determine their exact problem. Closed-head injuries are very hard to assess," says Michael Kilpatrick, deputy director of deployment health support for the Pentagon.

The number of concussions keeps rising. Almost 30% of the patients admitted to Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., have brain injuries.

Doctors fear that thousands of others go undiagnosed. A two-question survey developed by the Brain Injury Center shows that about 10% of troops returning from Iraq and Afghanistan suffered a concussion during their combat tour. About half still had symptoms that could be related to a concussion, including slowed thinking, headaches, memory loss, sleep disturbance, attention and concentration deficits, and irritability, says Air Force Lt. Col. Michael Jaffee, a neurologist with the center. More than 500,000 soldiers and Marines have served in combat since Sept. 11, 2001, many more than once.

During the screening, troops are first asked whether they were hurt in a blast, fall or vehicle accident. Then they are asked whether they felt dazed, were confused or saw "stars" afterward; do not remember what happened; or lost consciousness. If any of those symptoms occurred, the servicemember probably suffered a concussion, Warden says.

The screening offers a way to document brain injuries. The ability to count the injuries also has prompted disagreement about what to do with the information.

Warden urges that all returning troops be screened to build a concussion database. But today the screenings — which began about two years ago — are done at only a few military installations, including the Marine Corps' Camp Pendleton and the Army's Fort Carson in Colorado, Fort Bragg in North Carolina and Fort Irwin in California.

DOJ_NMG_0032590

Kilpatrick, the Pentagon official, questions the accuracy of the screening. “Multiple head injuries can lead to permanent brain damage that is irreversible, and you want to avoid that,” he says. “But we don't have any criteria today that if you get X number of concussions, that you can't serve anymore.”

Neurologist Jaffee says settling on one number that applies to every servicemember is impossible because of the many variables, among them the size of the blast and the severity of the concussion. That's why concussion histories and better battlefield diagnoses are needed, he says.

The military is developing ways to diagnose with tests that examine short-term memory, reaction time and attention deficit, key indicators of concussion. The tests are similar to those used on athletes who suffer head injuries. The Brain Injury Center is also creating a short exam Kilpatrick says could soon be introduced into war zones.

Computerized testing programs, used to monitor combat troops at Fort Bragg, are being tested for the battlefield. In April, the military approved a battlefield study by Air Force neurologist Gerald Grant for developing an online test for troops in Iraq.

During preliminary field tests, about 60 soldiers and Marines exposed to blasts were examined. In one case, a 25-year-old man caught near a roadside bomb struggled to process information and quickly answer questions. Two weeks later, before returning to combat, he continued to score below average or worse in both areas.

A second man, age 37, took the exam 15 hours after a rocket exploded on the other side of the wall from where he was standing guard. He showed attention-deficit problems and scored poorly in short-term memory.

“We need a field test to be able to practically assess the safety of sending people back to duty,” Grant says.

Marine Sgt. Bradley says he suffered his first concussion in high school sports. His second concussion came during a rocket-propelled grenade attack in Iraq. After his third brain injury, doctors told him a fourth could kill him. He and his wife, Megan, have three young daughters and say they face an uncertain future leaving the military. Bradley still experiences dizzy spells, bad headaches and back problems.

“Most of them are pretty much every day,” he says. “I have one right now.”

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC: Investigations Into Options A Concern (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

SEC Chair: Widening Investigations of Possible Options Backdating Cause for Concern

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The growing number of public companies under investigation for possible backdating of stock options to boost top executives' compensation is a matter of "serious concern" to the Securities and Exchange Commission, its chairman said Tuesday.

The number of public companies being investigated by the SEC or federal prosecutors has grown to more than 30 and executives at several companies have been fired in recent weeks.

"We've already learned that the problems are more than episodic," the SEC Chairman Christopher Cox told The Associated Press in response to questions. "The apparently widespread nature of the problems is of serious concern" to the agency.

Among the companies that have disclosed receiving subpoenas or SEC requests for documents are big, well-known names like UnitedHealthGroup Inc. and Caremark Rx Inc.

Many are from the high-tech world, where stock options have long been a prized perk and incentive for executives and employees alike: Affiliated Computer Services Inc., Juniper Networks Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp., OpenWave Systems Inc., Vitesse Semiconductor Corp., McAfee Inc., Quest Software Inc., Rambus Inc., Sycamore Networks Inc. and others.

The SEC investigations have been ongoing for several months, and subpoenas have been issued by U.S. attorneys' offices in several cities, including New York.

At issue is whether company insiders manipulated the timing of stock option grants to bring big payoffs to executives by improperly backdating the grants to coincide with low points in stock prices.

Stock options become more valuable as the market price rises above the exercise price, so backdating widens the spread -- and executives' payoff when they eventually sell shares.

Lawmakers Criticize Former Fannie Mae CEO (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032591

WASHINGTON — The ousted former chief executive of Fannie Mae, Franklin Raines, was criticized by lawmakers and a federal regulator on Tuesday as a House panel aired government allegations of a six-year accounting fraud at the mortgage giant.

The regulator who oversees Fannie Mae blamed Raines and other senior company officials for the massive accounting failures and alleged manipulations designed to enrich executives. And the chairman of the subcommittee holding Tuesday's hearing, Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., contended that Raines probably lied to Congress when he testified about the debacle in October 2004.

Lawmakers, some of whom had been beneficiaries of Fannie Mae's campaign money, denounced the accounting misconduct, likened the company to Enron Corp. and urged legislative action to tighten the government's hand over Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac.

As a huge housing finance company chartered by Congress, "Fannie Mae has a special mandate and position of public trust. The previous management team, led by chairman and chief executive officer Franklin Raines, violated that trust," James B. Lockhart, acting director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, testified. "By encouraging rapid growth, unconstrained by proper internal controls, risk management and other systems, they did serious harm to Fannie Mae while enriching themselves through earnings manipulation."

Fannie Mae is the largest U.S. buyer and guarantor of home mortgages.

A blistering report issued by the OFHEO examiners last month, the product of a three-year investigation, details what the agency describes as an arrogant and unethical corporate culture, calling the image of company prestige and excellence at Fannie Mae a sham. It said Fannie Mae employees manipulated accounting so senior executives could collect tens of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

Baker, referring to Raines' 2004 testimony before the panel, the House Financial Services subcommittee on capital markets, said Tuesday, "There seems to be clear evidence to my mind that Mr. Raines perjured himself."

Raines' attorney, Robert Barnett, declined to comment. After the OFHEO report was released last month, Barnett said that "Mr. Raines has repeatedly stated that he never authorized, encouraged or was aware of violations of generally accepted accounting principles at Fannie Mae for the purpose of smoothing earnings, reaching bonus targets or for any other improper reason. The facts on the record and conclusions from previous reports support this statement."

Raines, a prominent Washington figure who was a White House budget director in the Clinton administration, is one of 30 current and former Fannie Mae executives and employees who are being reviewed for possible disciplinary action, termination or forfeiture of their bonuses. Also being reviewed is the current president and CEO, Daniel Mudd.

The OFHEO regulators in September 2004 first brought to light Fannie Mae's accounting-rule violations and alleged earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets - disclosures that stunned the financial markets. That December, the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the company to restate its earnings back to 2001 - a correction expected to reach $11 billion. The Justice Department has been pursuing a criminal investigation.

In last month's action, Washington-based Fannie Mae was fined $400 million by OFHEO and the SEC_ one of the biggest penalties ever in an accounting fraud case, according to the SEC. The company also agreed to limit the growth of its multibillion-dollar mortgage holdings, at least temporarily, capping them at $727 billion, and to make top-to-bottom changes in its corporate culture, accounting procedures and ways of managing risk.

"Senior management manipulated accounting, reaped maximum, undeserved bonuses and prevented the rest of the world from knowing about it," Lockhart said at Tuesday's hearing. "They co-opted their internal auditors and other managers. They stonewalled OFHEO. The executive compensation program at Fannie Mae sent senior executives the message to focus on increasing earnings rather than controlling risk."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Silence Angers Judiciary Panel (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Senior Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sharply criticized a Justice Department official yesterday for refusing to say whether the Bush administration has ever considered prosecuting journalists for publishing leaked national security information.

The senators also bristled when Deputy U.S. Attorney Matthew W. Friedrich declined to answer questions about the rationale for the FBI's attempts to review the papers of the late columnist Jack Anderson.

DOJ_NMG_0032592

"You're basically taking what would be called a testifying Fifth Amendment. You should be ashamed of yourself, or your superiors should be ashamed of themselves," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) told Friedrich after he declined to answer questions from committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

The purpose of the hearing, Specter said in opening the session, was to examine Justice Department efforts to control leaks, explore suggestions that newspapers and their reporters can be prosecuted under the 1917 Espionage Act and take comment on legislation that would protect reporters through a shield law. The law would provide an exception if national security matters were involved.

Friedrich, in his opening statement, confirmed that the Justice Department was prepared to investigate and prosecute leaks, but referred to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's recent statement that the "primary focus is on the leakers of classified information, as opposed to the press."

When Friedrich confirmed that the department thought that journalists or "anyone" could be prosecuted under the Espionage Act for publishing classified information, Specter asked specifically about whether the law could be applied to reporter James Risen of the New York Times, the newspaper that published an article in December about the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program.

"Obviously, Senator, I can't comment as to any particular case or specific matter," Friedrich said. He added that espionage laws "do not exempt . . . any class of professional, including reporters, from their reach."

Specter then asked, without specifying a particular case, whether the department, under Gonzales or former attorney general John D. Ashcroft, ever considered prosecuting a newspaper or reporter for publishing leaked classified information.

"I don't think it would be appropriate for me to give an indication one way or another, and I hope people don't read anything into my answer one way or another," Friedrich said. But after a short lecture from Specter, he added that it was his "understanding" that there were historical examples of officials considering whether to prosecute journalists.

"I'm not interested in history this morning," Specter responded. "I'm interested in current events."

Grassley sought to follow up on questions he had posed to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III at a hearing last month about the bureau's attempts to access Anderson's files. Friedrich declined to answer but said that "hopefully the bureau will be submitting some type of factual submission to you on that."

Grassley responded: "I would think that the department would send somebody here to testify that could answer our questions if they [had] any respect for this committee whatsoever."

Friedrich told Specter that the department is studying a policy on issuing subpoenas for documents from the estate of a deceased reporter such as Anderson. He also said that Justice continues to maintain that no new legislation is needed to protect reporters, but said he will "take a closer look" at a bill now before the committee that would shift the decision to subpoena journalists from the executive branch to a judge.

Yesterday afternoon, Specter also put off a vote on issuing subpoenas for executives of three telephone companies to testify on whether they cooperated in the NSA warrantless surveillance program by providing records of millions of phone calls.

Senators Question Bush Administration's Openness (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Ely Portillo

Knight Ridder, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - Professor Mark Feldstein was stunned when two FBI agents came to his house in March hoping to rummage through files that once belonged to deceased journalist Jack Anderson.

The agents left empty-handed, but the aborted search was one of several incidents that have raised concerns about the Bush administration's efforts to stamp out government leaks. At a Senate hearing Tuesday, administration critics accused the Justice Department of trampling press freedom in its zeal to protect secrets.

At stake is the public's right to know what its government is doing versus the need for secrecy to protect national security. The tension between these principles is as old as the republic.

Senators from both parties vented frustration over the administration's lack of openness. Tensions erupted at the Judiciary Committee hearing when Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff of the Justice Department's criminal division, declined to answer questions about the effort to search Anderson's old files.

"I would think the department would send somebody up here to testify that could answer our questions, if they had any respect for this committee," complained Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa.

"They don't have any respect for this committee," Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said to Friedrich. "Why on earth were you sent up here? ... Is there any question you're allowed to answer?"

DOJ_NMG_0032593

Friedrich said he couldn't discuss the matter because doing so could hinder efforts to prosecute Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, pro-Israel lobbyists who have been accused of passing classified information to an Israeli diplomat and a journalist. Their indictment focused on activities from April 1999 to August 2004.

The FBI agents told Feldstein they wanted to look for evidence that Rosen and Weissman had supplied classified documents to Anderson, a muckraking journalist who died in December at age 83.

The explanation made little sense to Feldstein, a George Washington University professor who's writing a book about Anderson, because Anderson scaled back his reporting after he was diagnosed with Parkinson's in 1986. Most of his notable work had been published in previous decades. He relied on assistants to provide fodder for his nationally syndicated column, which was published until July 2004. He donated his files to the university at Feldstein's urging before he died.

"As bizarre as it sounded, I could only conclude that the Justice Department had decided that it wanted to prosecute people who might have whispered national security secrets decades ago to a reporter who is now dead," Feldstein testified.

Kevin Anderson, the columnist's son, said some of his father's sources had expressed fears that their exposure "would result in political, financial and even physical harm."

To Feldstein and other critics, the FBI's interest was part of an administration pattern of intimidating journalists and government whistleblowers. They cited other developments that trouble them:

-Attorney General Alberto Gonzales suggested last month that the government could prosecute journalists for publishing classified information. Friedrich declined to say whether the department is planning any prosecutions, but said "our primary focus is on the leakers themselves."

-New York Times reporter Judith Miller spent 85 days in jail last year for refusing to reveal the identity of then-confidential source I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney. She was freed when Libby released her from their agreement, clearing the way for her testimony in an investigation into a leak that disclosed the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame.

-CIA analyst Mary O. McCarthy was fired in April because she allegedly had unauthorized contacts with the news media and disclosed classified information.

-Last month, the Supreme Court ruled that the First Amendment doesn't protect government employees who are punished for exposing wrongdoing.

"By itself, what happened with the Anderson papers is a small and I think extreme case," Feldstein said. "But it is troubling because it appears to be part of a larger effort by the government to crack down on the media and the public's right to know."

Not everyone shares that view.

Gabriel Schoenfeld, editor of Commentary magazine, which bills itself as "the intellectual home of the neoconservative movement," said the Justice Department should charge reporters who revealed classified information with espionage.

He called for prosecuting the New York Times reporters who exposed the Bush administration's warrantless eavesdropping.

"It is imperative that our government and our intelligence agencies preserve the ability to conduct counterterrorism operations in secret," Schoenfeld told the committee. "The First Amendment is not a suicide pact."

Anderson, sitting next to Schoenfeld, said he'd rather go to jail than give his father's files to the FBI.

Feldstein said the agents who came to his house offered no clues as to their next move. "We're still waiting in fear to see if they come back," he said.

US Lawmakers Concerned About FBI Probes Of Journalists (VOA)

By Deborah Tate

Voice of America, June 7, 2006

U.S. lawmakers, concerned about recent federal investigations of journalists who publish classified information, are considering legislation to protect reporters from revealing information learned under the promise of confidentiality. The Senate Judiciary Committee is holding a series of hearings on the issue. On Tuesday, the panel focused on the case of the late investigative reporter Jack Anderson, whose archive of papers is being sought by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Jack Anderson spent his career exposing corrupt politicians and government scandals, from a CIA plan to assassinate Fidel Castro to the Reagan administration's secret arms-for-hostages deal with Iran.

The FBI has long sought Anderson's papers, saying that any documents that contain classified information belong to the government. Their effort has continued, even after Anderson's death last December at the age of 83.

The FBI probe comes as the federal government is threatening to prosecute journalists who publish classified information and refuse to reveal their sources. The Justice Department is investigating several leaks that led to the publication of a CIA officer's name and news reports that the National Security Agency is wiretapping communications between people in the United States and suspected terrorists overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0032594

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff for the criminal division at the Justice Department, defended his agency's actions: "Our primary focus is on prosecuting the leakers as opposed to other options, and our much preferred path would be to attempt to work with reporters voluntarily to convince them not to publish classified information, which could lead to compromise of our most sensitive technologies, harm our young men and women who serve in the service of our country, and cause damage," he said.

But Friedrich refused to discuss the Anderson case, to the anger of Republican and Democratic senators alike.

Senators made their frustration over that refusal clear.

"I would think the department would send somebody here to testify that could answer our questions if they had any respect for this committee whatsoever," said Senator Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican.

"That basically answers it. They do not have any respect for this committee. Why in heaven's name were you sent up here?," said Senator Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat.

Friedrich said the Senate panel was notified that he would not be able to respond directly to the Anderson probe before the hearing began, but said the FBI is preparing to answer the committee's questions.

Anderson's son Kevin, who is a lawyer in Utah, also testified before the committee. "Dad often said that documents that came across his desk were classified as national security secrets, but he characterized them as really political security secrets. They showed the misdeeds and manipulations of government employees who had abused the public trust, and then tried to sweep the evidence under the secrecy stamp. Such information should not be hidden from the people. Ours is a government of the people. Dad taught us that the people are sovereign. Those who work in government are our servants," he said.

He said he and his mother are prepared to face contempt charges if the FBI's effort to search the papers produces a subpoena or is upheld in court.

Mark Feldstein, the director of the Journalism Program at George Washington University who is writing a book about Jack Anderson, says FBI agents came to his home in search of some 200 boxes containing Anderson's papers on grounds of national security.

Allowing the FBI access to the records, he says, would have what he calls a chilling effect on both journalists and academics. "For journalists, the concern would be that their source notes, confidential sources, would be revealed to law enforcement authorities, and that that would produce a chilling effect, making other whistleblowers reluctant to come forward out of fear that their identities would become known. For academics, historians are always very concerned about trying to keep historical archives in order and not have them rifled through, because often order matters, and also it may discourage people from donating their papers in the future," he said.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Republican Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, acknowledged that national security must be protected, but he expressed concern about the federal probes of journalists. "The national security interests are enormous. They have to be balanced with the constitutional rights. But when you have a criminal statute where you can send people to jail and have a chilling effect on newspapers, it is really the congressional role to define it, and to establish standards. I think clearly the ball is in our court [the issue is the responsibility of Congress]," he said.

Specter has introduced legislation that would protect journalists and their employers from having to reveal information that a journalist learns under the promise of confidentiality.

Under the bill, a federal prosecutor in a criminal case could not compel a journalist to reveal protected information unless certain criteria are met, including that a court finds clear and convincing evidence that the prosecutor has exhausted alternative sources and that the public interest favors disclosure. The measure would require a journalist to disclose any information that would be needed to prevent an act of terrorism or harm to national security. E-mail This Article

Senators Seek Answers In Probe Of Reporter (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Judiciary Committee gave the Bush administration a new lashing Tuesday over its use of executive power, citing the FBI's posthumous probe of columnist Jack Anderson and questioning the notion that espionage laws might allow the prosecution of journalists who publish classified information.

"It's highly doubtful in my mind that that was ever the intent of Congress," Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said.

The World War I-era espionage laws, countered Justice Department criminal division chief Matthew Friedrich, "do not exempt any class of professionals, including reporters, from their reach."

DOJ_NMG_0032595

"I believe that's an invitation to Congress to legislate on the subject," replied Specter, R-Pa. "Clearly, the ball is in our court."

Friedrich refused to comment on the Anderson case, in which the FBI is seeking 50 years' worth of papers from the investigative journalist who exposed government scandals and earned a place on President Nixon's "enemies list."

Friedrich's response echoed deferrals by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other Justice Department officials in previous hearings on the administration's domestic wiretapping, phone tapping and other policies. Specter and other committee members grew exasperated.

"Why in heaven's name were you sent up here?" ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont fumed. "Are there any questions you guys are allowed to answer other than your title, time of day?"

Friedrich responded that Judiciary Committee was advised of this limit before the hearing opened. He added that the FBI was preparing answers to the committee's questions about the Anderson case.

With the administration considering prosecuting journalists who publish classified information and refuse to reveal their sources, the committee wants the full story of the effort to obtain Anderson's archive months after his death at age 83.

Anderson's son Kevin, a lawyer, told the panel that he and his mother are prepared to face contempt charges if the FBI's effort to search the papers ever produces a subpoena or is upheld in court.

"The family has met and decided that we would not abide by a subpoena if one were issued by the FBI," Anderson said.

Specter asked if Anderson would risk a contempt citation.

"I would and I've spoken with my mother and she would as well," Anderson said.

"It's not an irrelevant question," Specter observed.

Anderson and Mark Feldstein, a former investigative reporter who is writing a book about Anderson, say FBI agents have appeared at their homes seeking the roughly 200 boxes of Anderson's papers to which the family had granted Feldstein access. The agents, Feldstein has said, cited national security concerns.

The FBI has said that if the papers contain classified information, they belong to the government.

The FBI had long sought Anderson's papers after he published stories exposing the Keating Five, a CIA plan to assassinate Fidel Castro and details of the Iran-Contra affair.

Anderson's son said the FBI contacted his mother shortly after his father's funeral, expressing interest in documents that would aid the government's case against two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee who have been charged with disclosing classified information.

In addition, the agents told the family they planned to remove from the columnist's archive — which had yet to be catalogued — any document they came across that was stamped "secret" or "confidential," or was otherwise classified.

The family refused.

"They flashed their badges and said they needed access to the papers," said Feldstein. Anderson donated his papers to the university, but the family had not yet formally signed them over.

FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko, a spokesman in Washington, said in an April interview that the bureau wants to search the Anderson archive and remove classified materials before they are made available to the public. "It has been determined that, among the papers, there are a number of U.S. government documents containing classified information," Kolko said, declining to say how the FBI knows.

The documents contain information about sources and methods used by U.S. intelligence agencies, he said.

U. Political Scientist Calls Probe 'fishing Expedition' (SLT)

The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, June 7, 2006

University of Utah political scientist Tim Chambless, who years ago cataloged 85 boxes of Jack Anderson's papers for use in his research, calls the FBI's demands "a fishing exped- ition." The documents he reviewed included some that "were politically embarrassing to a few people." But he said, "There was nothing in there with regard to national security." Chambless also wonders how much trolling the government has done in Anderson-related documents that had been in the public domain. When he was in Maryland recently, Chambless spent two days at the National Archives looking through declassified documents dealing with Anderson. He said he was concerned to find a number that had been removed from the file. "No reason was given as to why the documents were pulled, no date was given as to when they were pulled or by what agency or individual. This is very troubling to me," Chambless said Tuesday. "I asked specifically [who removed the documents], and that information was not provided to me." He declined to speculate whether the missing papers were part of a seven-year-old secret program, disclosed in news reports earlier this year, to reclassify thousands of documents at the National Archives. The New York Times reported the effort by the CIA and five other agencies had removed from public access more than 55,000 previously declassified pages. - Robert Gehrke

DOJ_NMG_0032596

Getting Stonewalled: Administration Out To Keep Us In The Dark (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, June 7, 2006

There are two ways to succeed in government. Do the right thing. Don't let the people know you've done the wrong thing.

In the case of the Bush administration, it is difficult to know if it is doing the right thing or the wrong thing. That's because it is working very hard to make sure we don't know anything.

This desire to sit on the details about what the government is doing does not apply only to the controversial things the Bush administration is up to today. It reaches beyond current questions of secret prisons, indefinite detentions, torture, wiretapping and data mining.

It reaches back about half a century, through CIA plots to kill Fidel Castro, Watergate and the Iran-Contra affair. Those are just a few of the juicy tidbits that would be found in the archives of the late Jack Anderson, investigative reporter extraordinare, papers which the FBI has tried to bully Anderson's blood and literary heirs into surrendering.

Tuesday, when appropriate members of the U.S. Senate wanted to know the reason why, they were thoroughly stonewalled by one of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' assistants who, as Sen. Patrick Leahy was heard to fume, wasn't allowed to answer questions any more sensitive than his title and the time of day.

Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, is just as frustrated as Chairman Arlen Specter by the Justice Department's maddening refrain that it is keeping within the law but that we will just have to take their word for that. Any meaningful questions asked by senators, representatives or anyone else are turned away with the excuse that it would compromise anti-terror intelligence operations.

Advertisement

This is the same argument Gonzales has used to suggest that reporters who performed their constitutional duty by telling the American people about secret prisons, unwarranted wiretaps and the like are potentially subject to prosecution under the 1917 Espionage Act. But Gonzales is way off base, and we can only hope that the Congress will rein him in.

It is espionage to steal secrets and keep them for your own advantage. It is freedom to expose dirty secrets and tell the American people what your government is doing, in your name and with your money.

Documents Point To Bribes Of Nigerian By Congressman (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — The Federal Bureau of Investigation raided the Maryland home of the vice president of Nigeria last summer in search of bribe money that the bureau believed had been paid to him by Representative William Jefferson, according to documents released on Tuesday.

The documents included an affidavit signed by an F.B.I. agent who said that the Nigerian vice president, Atiku Abubakar, now a candidate for president of that oil-rich West African nation, asked for at least half of the profits of a technology company controlled by Mr. Jefferson that was seeking to do business in Nigeria.

About the same time last year, the documents said, Mr. Jefferson told colleagues of his plans to bribe Nigerian officials, including Mr. Abubakar, in exchange for their help in winning business in Nigeria, and that Mr. Abubakar would be paid as much as $500,000 in cash.

The F.B.I. affidavit, which was dated Aug. 2, and other documents were made public over the objections of Mr. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who is the target of a wide-ranging corruption investigation. He has denied wrongdoing and has said the information in the court papers would unfairly damage his reputation.

In the affidavit, an F.B.I. agent, Edward S. Cooper, said cellphone records suggested that Mr. Jefferson visited a home owned by Mr. Abubakar and his wife in Potomac, Md., an affluent suburb of Washington, around midnight last July 31 with the intention of delivering money to the Nigerian leader while he was on a visit to the United States. The next day, the F.B.I. said, Mr. Jefferson told a confidential informant that he had delivered "African art" — which the agent described as code for a cash payment — and that Mr. Abubakar "was very pleased."

The documents, which were released by a federal court in Greenbelt, Md., do not show what was seized by F.B.I. in the search of the Maryland home, nor do they show if the Nigerian leader ever received any money from Mr. Jefferson. A separate search of Mr. Jefferson's home in Washington in August turned up $90,000 in cash that, F.B.I. documents suggest, had been intended for the Nigerian leader. A bureau affidavit stated that the money had been hidden by Mr. Jefferson in his home freezer.

The Nigerian Embassy in Washington had no comment Tuesday on the disclosures in the documents about Mr. Abubakar, whose name had emerged previously in news reports about the investigation of Mr. Jefferson. The Associated Press quoted a spokesman for Mr. Abubakar in Abuja, the Nigerian capital, as declining comment Tuesday "until we have seen these reports or allegations." Mr. Jefferson's Congressional office referred questions to his lawyer, who has not returned repeated phone calls seeking comment.

Bush administration officials have been reluctant to speculate publicly about the effect of the investigation of Mr. Jefferson on American relations with Nigeria, which is one of largest exporters of oil to the United States.

Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term House member whose district includes most of New Orleans, has refused to discuss the detailed accusations against him in earlier court filings, including why so much money was in his home freezer.

The documents suggest that Mr. Jefferson was aggressive in seeking to lobby officials in Nigeria and other West African nations to promote business for a small technology company in which his family had a stake. A former top aide and the founder of the technology company have already pleaded guilty to criminal charges.

"With regard to the Nigerian business venture, Jefferson has discussed the making of payments to high-ranking government officials there, including the vice president of Nigeria," Mr. Cooper wrote in the affidavit last August intended to persuade a judge to allow the search of Mr. Abubakar's Maryland home.

"The vice president agreed to help secure the necessary approvals for the participants in the Nigerian business venture" in exchange for "at least 50 percent of the profits," it continued, adding that Mr. Jefferson had also discussed "the payment of a substantial monetary sum" to Mr. Abubakar "in the range of up to $500,000."

Affidavit Outlines Alleged Scheme In Jefferson Case (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), the target of a federal bribery probe, told an FBI informant that the vice president of Nigeria wanted at least $500,000 upfront and a stake in a lucrative technology venture in that country in order to help it gain approval, according to newly released documents in the investigation.

Jefferson's alleged statements help explain why FBI agents were so eager last summer to search the residence of the congressman and a Potomac, Md., mansion owned by the wife of Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar. Atiku, who visits the United States frequently, had been staying at the Potomac residence and allegedly met with Jefferson there to discuss the deal.

The congressman, who has insisted he is innocent of accepting bribes, allegedly told the FBI informant that in order to secure the Nigerian official's help with the technology project, Jefferson needed to deliver an upfront payment of $100,000 to Atiku while he was in the United States.

Some time after that, the informant provided Jefferson with the cash in a briefcase, according to one of the documents, an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Edward S. Cooper. The congressman later indicated that he had delivered the cash to Atiku on a late-night visit to the Potomac house, Cooper's affidavit said.

"Ah, I gave him the African art that you gave me, and he was very pleased," Jefferson told the informant, according to Cooper's affidavit. In his 39-page affidavit, Cooper said that "African art" was code for the cash payoff. The FBI has said the informant, a Virginia businesswoman, was wearing a microphone.

The affidavit was unsealed Monday by the federal court in Greenbelt, Md., and was made available Tuesday by the Justice Department.

A Washington lawyer for Atiku on Tuesday strongly denied wrongdoing by his client, who is running for president of Nigeria.

"There is no relationship between the vice president and Congressman Jefferson other than meetings occasioned by the professional courtesy a public official extends to another public official through diplomatic channels," the lawyer, Edward Weidenfeld, said.

"The vice president has done nothing wrong, and we've been cooperating with the Justice Department and the FBI from the beginning" of the long-running investigation, Weidenfeld said.

In one of his conversations with the FBI informant, Jefferson said Atiku had "more deals going than the goddamn man in the moon," the affidavit said. "Jefferson then said, 'He's a very, well, the word might be … corrupt.' "

The affidavit contained extensive new details of the alleged plot by Jefferson to win the Nigerian government's approval of a plan to provide new telecommunications services in the oil-rich African nation. It is alleged that the congressman would have had a large but hidden financial stake in the project.

The informant was described in court documents as a northern Virginia businesswoman identified by law enforcement officials as Lori Mody. Authorities said she went to the FBI in March 2005 when she decided Jefferson and others were defrauding her on the business deal.

During one meeting with Mody, Jefferson allegedly estimated that the telecommunications venture could earn as much as $200 million annually by its fifth year.

It was not clear from the affidavit whether any of the $100,000 in the briefcase had been delivered to the vice president's home, or whether Atiku had engaged in negotiations for a piece of the deal. FBI officials have said, in fact, that nearly all of the $100,000 was subsequently found during a search of Jefferson's home, stashed in his freezer.

But the FBI agent said that Jefferson's cellphone records suggested he had gone to the Nigerian official's home the night he said he had dropped off the cash.

Cooper also said that security cameras at the Potomac mansion probably would have recorded a visit by Jefferson on the night in question, but the affidavit did not say whether agents were successful in obtaining such camera footage.

In a new twist in the case, Cooper said that the security camera was observed by an undercover FBI agent who was posing as Jefferson's driver on one trip to the house.

Some sections of the affidavit remained sealed, and it did not mention Atiku by name. But the document identified the Potomac residence as being owned by Jennifer E. Douglas, Atiku's wife. And Atiku's lawyer confirmed that he was the Nigerian official cited in the court filing. Douglas could not be reached for comment.

Jefferson has said that he never benefited personally from any corrupt deals. But the affidavit suggested that he had taken pains to distance himself from any illegal transactions in part by having payments go to his children.

Jefferson and the informant negotiated what kind of compensation he should receive if the deal were to go through, the affidavit said. At one point, he wrote down a "c," and then said, "the 'c' is like for children," the affidavit said. "I wouldn't show up in there."

"Say that again. I'm sorry," the informant responded, knowing that the conversation was being taped.

"I make a deal for my children. It wouldn't be me," the affidavit said Jefferson replied.

Atiku's involvement began when Jefferson wrote a letter to him dated June 21, 2005, alerting him to "a U.S. company" that wanted to invest $50 million to provide high-speed Internet access in Nigeria using Nigerian telecom company Nitel's lines.

Atiku then met with Jefferson July 18 in Potomac and, according to the congressman, "agreed to help secure the necessary approvals." But in return, he said, Abubakar wanted at least $500,000 for himself.

Jefferson, who represents most of New Orleans, has served in Congress since 1990 and is head of an Africa trade task force.

Rep. Accused Of Trying To Bribe Nigerian (AP)

By Stephen Manning

AP, June 6, 2006

Rep. William Jefferson called the package he allegedly delivered at midnight to the suburban Maryland home of Nigeria's vice president "African art." Authorities say the "art" was meant to be cash — lots of it.

Court documents filed in the bribery probe of the Louisiana Democrat allege that Jefferson told an FBI informant he took the "art," which authorities believe was code for $100,000 in $100 bills, to the Potomac home of Atiku Abubakar on July 31.

The money was allegedly part of $500,000 the Nigerian vice president sought in return for helping smooth the way for a technology venture in Nigeria that was arranged by Jefferson. Abubakar also reportedly wanted a large stake of the profits from the new business.

The day after he was to have delivered the money, provided by an FBI informant, Jefferson was recorded telling the informant: "I gave him the African art that you gave me and he was very pleased."

The conversation and details of the alleged deal were included in an affidavit filed in August in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt to secure a warrant to search Abubakar's house. The affidavit was unsealed Monday.

It is unclear whether any money was given to Abubakar, who is identified only as "the vice president of Nigeria" in the affidavit.

According to another search warrant affidavit for Jefferson's congressional office, released last month in Washington, $90,000 in cash was found in a freezer at Jefferson's Washington home. A briefcase similar to the one Jefferson is alleged to have used to carry the money was found in a later search of his New Orleans home, according to federal court documents filed there.

DOJ_NMG_0032599

The 39-page affidavit released Monday in Maryland, some sections of which remain sealed, identifies the Potomac home as the residence of Jennifer Douglas, Abubakar's wife. Although the search of the residence was mentioned in documents previously released by the courts, names and titles were blacked out to keep them secret.

A lawyer for Abubakar, who is running for president of Nigeria, said Abubakar is cooperating with authorities. Edward L. Weidenfeld said Abubakar's relationship with Jefferson did not extend beyond standard diplomatic meetings.

"There is no relationship or any kind of arrangement of any sort between them," Weidenfeld said.

In Nigeria, where Abubakar kicked off his campaign last week, his spokesman Mohammed Yakubu said they have yet to see details of the allegations. "We don't have anything to say until we have seen these reports or allegations," he said by telephone from Abuja.

Jefferson has strongly denied wrongdoing in the alleged scheme.

The informant was a northern Virginia businesswoman identified by law enforcement officials as Lori Mody. She is said to have gone to the FBI when she believed Jefferson and others were defrauding her on the business deal. Jefferson discussed with her the "payment of bribes to high-ranking foreign government officials," including Abubakar, according to the affidavit.

Jefferson approached Abubakar, claiming he wanted to help an American firm invest $50 million to run Internet services over the wires of Nigerian telecom company Nitel. The venture was to include Mody, a Kentucky telecommunications company called iGate Inc., and the Nigerian firm Rosecom.Net.

The affidavit states Jefferson wanted a stake of 5 percent to 7 percent in the Nigerian venture for his five daughters and one of them, lawyer Jamila Jefferson, to be retained to help set it up.

The congressman met July 18 with Abubakar in Potomac and the vice president "agreed to help secure the necessary approvals" for iGate to begin work in Nigeria, Jefferson said. In return, Abubakar wanted at least 50 percent of the profits from Rosecom.Net and a payment of up to $500,000 before the deal was completed, the documents alleged.

Jefferson, who represents most of New Orleans, has served in Congress since 1990. The raid on his Capitol Hill office sparked outrage from congressional leaders who claimed the Bush administration was violating the separation of powers doctrine. President Bush later sealed FBI files on the raid for 45 days.

Former Jefferson aide Brett Pfeffer has pleaded guilty and was given an eight-year term for his role in the bribery scandal. He is cooperating with authorities. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate, also pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to Jefferson.

Gonzales Defends Jefferson Office Search (AP-Y2)

By M.r. Kropko

AP2, June 6, 2006

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday defended the FBI's search of a congressman's office last month, saying it was an "unusual step" but a necessary one.

Gonzales compared the May 20-21 search of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record)'s office to past investigations of federal lawmakers and searches of their homes and vehicles.

The late-night search, part of a months-long bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat, was the first time in the history of Congress that a search warrant had been executed on a House member's Washington office.

"There have been searches before by the executive branch of the legislative branch," Gonzales said. "We've searched before the homes of members of Congress. We've searched before the cars of members of Congress, even when they are parked in the garage on Capitol Hill."

Among the lawmakers most recently served with search warrants were then-Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., in connection with the United Nations oil-for-food program, and then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican whose homes and boat were searched. In August, the FBI raided Jefferson's homes in Washington and New Orleans, and his personal vehicle.

Last month's search of Jefferson's Capitol Hill office sparked outrage from congressional leaders, who claimed the Bush administration was violating the separation of powers doctrine. President Bush ordered the documents sealed until mid-July to allow congressional leaders and the Justice Department to discuss what to do with them.

Gonzales, in Cleveland to award an anti-gang grant, said the search did not violate the Constitution because there was evidence of a crime in Jefferson's office and FBI agents had obtained a court-issued search warrant.

"I understand this was an unusual step that was taken, but it was an unusual step taken in response to an unusual set of circumstances," Gonzales said. Investigators tried for months to get the evidence in other ways, he said, "and we ultimately concluded that this was something that we needed to do."

DOJ_NMG_0032600

FBI agents carted away computer and other records in their pursuit of evidence that Jefferson accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa. Jefferson, who represents most of New Orleans, has denied any wrongdoing.

"I understand the sensitivities," Gonzales said. "We anticipated that this would create some concerns. We worked hard to allay those concerns in the way the search was conducted."

Hoyer Backs Pelosi, Smacks Rep. Jefferson (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 7, 2006

The chances that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) will keep his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee grew slimmer yesterday as House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) issued a stinging assessment of the embattled Louisianan's legal situation.

"He sits on a tax-writing committee, and he had $90,000 found in his freezer. I think he's got a tax problem if nothing else," Hoyer said, responding to reporters' questions about whether Democrats would seek to oust Jefferson forcibly from the panel even though he has yet to be charged with a crime.

Jefferson pointedly declined a recent request from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) for him to step down, reasserting his innocence and implying that she should ask the same of Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) who has faced ethics questions about earmarks he obtained on the Appropriations Committee.

"If members are to be treated equally, I think Mr. Mollohan has an appropriations problem," a Democratic aide sympathetic to Jefferson fumed.

Last night, members of the House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee were expected to discuss Jefferson's dilemma at a members-only meeting. If Pelosi were to remove Jefferson forcibly, she would first have to put the issue to a vote of that body, which has jurisdiction over Democrats' committee assignments. That vote was not expected to occur last night, but she could pursue it at a later date.

Last night's meeting was convened to discuss Democratic message crafting, with Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) acting as chairman. Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) typically chairs meetings in which committee assignments are decided.

Hoyer said yesterday that he hoped the committee would seek to oust Jefferson.

"I personally believe that Mr. Jefferson should step down from the Ways and Means Committee, and if he doesn't step down our caucus should take action."

If Democratic leaders do put the issue to a vote, Jefferson will have few allies on the committee. It is stocked with Pelosi loyalists.

Even among the committee's 10 members from the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), Jefferson would be hard-pressed for friends. Reps. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), chairman of the Democratic caucus, and Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), senior Democrat on Ways and Means, have not rushed to his aid.

Several more junior CBC members, however, may speak out on his behalf. Rep. Donald Payne (D-N.J.) has been supportive, even though he occupies one of the 15 slots appointed by Pelosi on the steering committee.

Rep. Gregory Meeks (D-N.Y.) sits on the panel as a regional representative. He may harbor some lingering ill will against Pelosi because she backed Rep. Mike Honda (D-Calif.) when the two were vying to become a vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

A spokesperson for Meeks could not immediately comment.

Hoyer's call for Jefferson to step aside marks only the latest time he has vociferously supported a Pelosi decision. The whip has at times been at odds with Pelosi, his onetime leadership rival. Pelosi bested Hoyer in a race for Democratic whip in 2002.

These days, however, Hoyer says he has only unalloyed endorsements for the minority leader and her ability to unify the caucus.

"Nancy has worked harder in my opinion than anybody I have seen in my 26 years in Congress," Hoyer averred yesterday. "[Former Minority Leader] Dick Gephardt [D-Mo.] I thought was the hardest worker I could find. Nancy works harder than Dick. She travels more. She raises more money. She works harder than message. She's doing a wonderful job.

"If we lose, it will not be Nancy Pelosi's fault. She's done everything she possibly could to insure our victory. ... Win, lose or draw, she's going to be our leader."

Hoyer was responding to a recent report that Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, may mount a challenge to Pelosi if Democrats fall short of taking control of the House.

Emanuel said, "Congresswoman Pelosi is the leader. I'm not interested in [challenging her], and I support her."

In a moment of levity, Hoyer quipped that the question may be a “moot point.”

“If we don’t take back the House after the situation we’re in now, we’re all going to shoot ourselves in the head!” he quipped, then added, “I didn’t mean it literally. Put your hopes aside.”

Pelosi is virtually assured of becoming Speaker unopposed if Democrats take control. Despite some concerns among Democrats that she is a poor spokeswoman for the party, the caucus is unlikely to miss the chance to elect the first female Speaker or to reward her for ending a dozen years in the political doldrums.

Even if Democrats do fall short of taking power, it is unclear who would challenge Pelosi. Hoyer has said time and again that he has no desire to take her on again. Emanuel, while seen as hardworking, smart and effective, has little seniority and has engendered ill will in some factions of the caucus with his colorful and direct language.

Separation Hypocrisy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

CONGRESS CAN BE PERSNICKETY about its prerogatives, real and imagined. But its reverence for the separation of powers, so flagrantly on display in its continuing snit over the FBI's search of a House member's offices, goes by the wayside when it's Congress trespassing on someone else's turf.

Take the repeated attempts by Congress to micromanage the work of the federal courts. Conservatives have tried without success to strip courts of jurisdiction over hot-button issues such as same-sex marriage and the constitutionality of a federal law against it. More recently, some members have threatened to prohibit the Supreme Court from citing the decisions of foreign courts in its opinions.

Fortunately, a member of the court who might be expected to welcome the last proposal has come out against it. Justice Antonin Scalia recently delivered a lecture on the separation of powers that applies to other misguided initiatives in Congress.

"No one is more opposed to using foreign law than I am," Scalia told a Capitol Hill luncheon last month. "But I'm darned if I think it's up to Congress to direct the Supreme Court how to make its decisions." He asked Congress to "let us make our mistakes, just as we let you make yours."

Congressional dissatisfaction with the judicial branch is old news in Washington. It ranges from complaints voiced by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that the court has questioned Congress' "method of reasoning" to griping by other members of Congress about requests for judicial pay raises. The latest attempt to muscle the courts is a proposal by Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) to create an inspector general for the judiciary who would watchdog judicial ethics at all levels. A similar House bill by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) would apply only to lower-court judges. The inspector general idea would unnecessarily entangle the legislative branch in the day-to-day supervision of the judiciary.

The Supreme Court is not above criticism, and Congress has the authority to define the jurisdiction of various federal courts, to decide how much money should be appropriated for their operation and even to impeach and remove judges who abuse their public trust. Congress also is free to regulate or even outlaw some of the practices that have given rise to the inspector general idea — such as the attendance by judges at lavish "seminars" paid for by foundations linked to special-interest groups.

But even in areas in which Congress can set rules for the judicial branch, it's the better part of wisdom for legislators to tread softly. Conservatives in Congress have dismissed that advice when it has come from "good government" groups and liberal lawyers; maybe it will sink in when it comes from their hero, Justice Scalia.

Lobbyist Says Client Paid Half The Cost Of Town House (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — A former top aide to the House defense appropriations subcommittee acknowledged Tuesday that the president of a military contractor had paid half the cost of a $1 million town house that they bought 11 months after she left the Congressional job.

The former aide, Letitia Hoadley White, now a prominent lobbyist, is already under scrutiny by federal prosecutors investigating the possibility that lawmakers and members of their staffs directed federal money to contractors in exchange for illicit payments. A spokesman for Ms. White said the purchase was a private arrangement between close friends.

Ms. White was for many years the top aide in charge of inserting pet projects, known as earmarks, into spending bills for Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California, when he led the House defense appropriations subcommittee.

The person who paid $500,000 toward the purchase of her house was Nicholas Karangelen, president of Trident Systems Inc., one of many companies that benefited from earmarks. In 2002, for example, the company received part of an $8 million joint contract for technology to survey battlefields.

DOJ_NMG_0032602

Ms. White left Capitol Hill in January 2003 for a partnership in the lobbying firm of Copeland Lowery Jacques Denton & White. Trident retained her as a lobbyist the next month, and she bought the house with Mr. Karangelen in December of that year. Ms. White reported that Trident paid her firm $80,000 in fees for the year, and the firm continued to receive earmarked money.

If Mr. Karangelen's $500,000 contribution to the house benefited Ms. White as compensation for her services, lobbying laws would require her to disclose his contribution.

Patrick Dorton, a spokesman for Ms. White, said: "She purchased the house as a private citizen. She went in 50-50 with a friend. And it is absolutely not connected to any fee arrangement or work for Trident."

Mr. Karangelen and a Trident spokeswoman did not return calls seeking comment.

The federal prosecutors looking at Ms. White's work are investigating possible ties between Mr. Lewis, her former boss, and Bill Lowery, her lobbying partner. Mr. Lowery's firm represents many clients who have received money earmarked by the defense subcommittee, and the firm and its clients account for a large part of Mr. Lewis's campaign fund-raising.

Mr. Karangelen and other Trident executives are major contributors to Republicans, to Mr. Lewis and to other members of the House Appropriations Committee.

Friends of Ms. White say she sometimes stays in the town house and uses it for fund-raisers and events related to her lobbying business. A political action committee that Mr. Karangelen runs, Small Biz Tech Pac, also lists the town house as its address.

On Tuesday, a researcher for the liberal Web site Talking Points Memo turned up a deed showing Mr. Karangelen as a second owner of the town house.

Retirement Account Of DeLay's Wife Traced (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

A registered lobbyist opened a retirement account in the late 1990s for the wife of then-House Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and contributed thousands of dollars to it while also paying her a salary to work for him from her home in Texas, according to sources, documents and DeLay's attorney, Richard Cullen.

The account represents a small portion of the income that DeLay's family received from entities at least partly controlled by lobbyist Edwin A. Buckham. But the disclosure of its origin adds to what was previously known about the benefits DeLay's family received from its association with Buckham, and it brings the total over the past seven years to about half a million dollars.

Buckham was DeLay's chief of staff before he became a lobbyist at the end of 1998, shortly before the account was opened and the flow of funds began. He has come under scrutiny from federal investigators because his lobbying firm received hundreds of thousands of dollars in revenue from clients of indicted Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Buckham's financial ties to DeLay's family -- and the retirement account in particular -- have recently attracted the interest of FBI agents and others in the federal task force probing public corruption by lawmakers and lobbyists, according to a source who was questioned in the course of the government's investigation.

Cullen said the retirement account was required for Buckham's employees under Internal Revenue Service rules. But investigators are looking at Buckham's role in establishing the account and at whether the lawmaker may have performed official acts in return for any of the income arranged by Buckham, according to the source. DeLay denies any wrongdoing.

Another lawmaker, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), has similarly come under Justice Department scrutiny in the past year because of fees paid to his wife's consulting firm -- in that instance as compensation for soliciting corporate campaign contributions.

Abramoff, who was friendly with both DeLay and Doolittle, put Julie Doolittle's firm on his lobbying firm's payroll to plan a fundraising event for a nonprofit group he created. A nonprofit organization that Buckham created also hired her firm to keep its books; the organization subsidized a $28,000 trip to South Korea by DeLay and his wife.

Laura Blackann, a spokeswoman for John Doolittle, confirmed that a grand jury investigating Abramoff's lobbying activities subpoenaed Julie Doolittle's firm in 2004 to obtain some of its records. In February, the FBI subpoenaed another nonprofit group created by Buckham, seeking records of any dealings with DeLay, his wife and his daughter, according to a copy of the subpoena.

From 1998 until recently, Buckham, an evangelical minister, met regularly with DeLay, occasionally attended staff meetings in his office, made scheduling recommendations or decisions for the office, and served as DeLay's chief political and spiritual adviser, even though he was not formally employed by him. At the time, Buckham's clients included a host of companies with regulatory and legislative business before Congress, and whose interests DeLay supported.

DOJ_NMG_0032603

Under congressional ethics rules, lobbyists such as Buckham are barred from providing gifts or gratuities with a total value exceeding $50 to lawmakers in a single year. No similar prohibition exists for payments to a lawmaker's family members, but the pay must be a reasonable wage for real work and not be meant to influence a lawmaker's votes. Nothing in pending House and Senate lobbying reform legislation addresses the issue of such lobbyist payments to lawmaker's families.

DeLay, who was indicted in October 2005 on charges of money laundering related to the 2002 elections in Texas, announced in April that he would resign from Congress on June 9. He stepped down as House majority leader after the indictment, relinquishing a post he held from 2002 to 2005. DeLay has not disclosed his future employment plans but has said he plans to continue to promote conservative causes in Washington.

Buckham, who co-owned his lobbying firm with his wife, initially opened the retirement account for Christine DeLay at First Union bank. In 2001, he transferred it to the Charles Schwab & Co. office near his home in Frederick, according to a source with direct knowledge of the matter. From 1999 to 2000, DeLay listed the account as a spousal asset on his financial disclosure forms without specifying its value.

In his 2001 disclosure, DeLay said for the first time that the account was valued at between $15,000 and $50,000. Beginning in 2003, he listed it as a joint asset, though Cullen said in an interview that it remained in Christine DeLay's name and that such a listing was not required. "I believe the IRA has remained in Christine's name since the inception and that [the joint] designation must have been an error," Cullen said.

DeLay's salary from the House during this period ranged from $136,700 to $180,100. He will receive a pension starting at about $56,000 annually, and he is eligible for a defined-contribution retirement program, according to the National Taxpayers Union.

Cullen said that the Schwab account was a routine way for Buckham to contribute to an employee's retirement needs and that Christine DeLay, like others who worked at Buckham's now-defunct lobbying firm, received funds for the account as a percentage of her income during her employment. Charles Wm. McIntyre, a colleague of Cullen's at the McGuireWoods law firm, said DeLay and his office are unaware of any particular interest in the retirement account by federal investigators.

Besides financing the retirement account, Buckham played a role in two other streams of income that indirectly benefited DeLay.

One involved payments to DeLay's family by his principal political action committee, Americans for a Republican Majority (ARMPAC), which drew its largest donations from corporations. Three former DeLay staffers with firsthand knowledge of Buckham's activities have described him as a decision maker for the group, even though it was formally run by its executive director.

An arm of the group paid Buckham a monthly consulting fee, and Buckham in turn employed its executive director as a consultant to his lobbying firm. The two of them shared a single office on the top floor of a townhouse owned by a nonprofit organization that Buckham created and directed. Buckham's role is relevant because from 2001 to Jan. 31, 2006, ARMPAC paid Christine DeLay; DeLay's daughter, Dani DeLay Ferro; and Ferro's Texas firm a total of $350,304 in political consulting fees and expenses, according to public records.

The Washington Post previously disclosed that from 1998 to 2002, Buckham's lobbying firm, Alexander Strategy Group, paid Christine DeLay a monthly salary averaging between $3,200 and $3,400. Cullen initially said the payments were for telephone calls she made periodically to the offices of certain members of Congress seeking the names of their favorite charities. Christine DeLay then forwarded that information to Buckham, along with some information about those charities.

Last week, Cullen said the payments were also for general political consulting Christine DeLay provided to her husband. Cullen said he does not have complete records of the salary payments or the dates when Christine DeLay performed the work from the couple's home in Sugar Land, Tex. But a source familiar with the pay records said the total she received from the Alexander Strategy Group was about $115,000.

Together with the retirement account worth about $25,000, this means the family's total financial benefits from entities at least partly controlled by Buckham exceeded $490,300.

Before being paid by ARMPAC for political consulting, Christine DeLay, a homemaker and advocate for foster care, had not done paid work of that type. That circumstance has figured in government investigations of payments to other lawmakers' spouses, on the grounds that, if the compensation began after a lawmaker's election, it might have been meant to influence official acts.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a group that has criticized payments to lawmakers' spouses, said that "the real scandal in Washington is what is legal."

"This is a prime example of that," she said. "But there is a distinction between what is legal and what is right. . . . What was DeLay doing for all that money? Even Ed Buckham was not paying DeLay and his family out of the goodness of his heart."

DOJ_NMG_0032604

Buckham's lobbying clients during the period in question included Enron, AT&T, the American Bankers Association, the National Association of Convenience Stores, Freddie Mac, Nextel, United Parcel Service, Time Warner, Microsoft, BellSouth, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America and the Coalition to Preserve Dietary Supplements.

Several groups represented by Buckham also helped sponsor lavish overseas travel by DeLay and his family.

"Tom DeLay has never taken an official act that was not based on his strongly held principles," Cullen said. Buckham and his attorney did not return several telephone calls seeking comment.

DeLay: GOP's 'panic, Depression' Risk Losing Elections (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former House majority leader Tom DeLay said he's "disappointed" in three ex-associates who pleaded guilty in a federal probe of political corruption, but he said their admissions "doesn't mean I knew" of their efforts to bribe Congress.

The Texas Republican, who is resigning his House seat Friday, told USA TODAY that he was surprised by revelations that Tony Rudy, a former top aide, and Jack Abramoff, a former lobbyist and longtime political supporter, tried to buy influence with lawmakers.

"The Tony Rudy and Jack Abramoff I'm reading about in the papers are not the people I knew," DeLay said Tuesday. His former press secretary, Michael Scanlon, also pleaded guilty.

Nicknamed "The Hammer" for his hard-charging style, DeLay is leaving Congress with more of a bang than a whimper.

The former No. 2 House leader criticized his Republican colleagues for "panic, depression and woe-is-me-ism," and predicted they will lose control in November "if they continue the attitude they have right now."

DeLay's career embodies the GOP's ascendancy. He was swept into Congress by President Reagan's second-term landslide in 1984 and was a member of the leadership team in 1995 when the GOP took control of the House for the first time in 40 years.

DeLay said the Justice Department has not questioned him in the corruption probe, and he has offered to cooperate.

He blamed his political exit on Ronnie Earle, the Austin district attorney who indicted DeLay on charges of violating state campaign-finance laws. DeLay insists he did nothing wrong, but said Earle, a Democrat, indicted him to force him out of House leadership.

"Their campaign of character assassination and criminalization of politics was effective," he said. Earle denies partisanship.

DeLay, 59, said his plans include establishing a private legal defense fund — unsupervised by the Federal Election Commission — to help pay his lawyers. He said he owes more than $2.5 million. He can also use political contributions to defray the debt. As of March 31, DeLay had $1.4 million in his campaign treasury.

McKinney Deal May Be In Works Lawyer Rejects Talk Of Any Negotiations (AJC)

By Bob Kemper, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal prosecutors investigating the confrontation between Rep. Cynthia McKinney of Georgia and a Capitol police officer have been talking privately with McKinney's office in hopes of resolving the case without the spectacle of an indictment and trial, officials familiar with the talks say.

Prosecutors for several weeks have been carrying on confidential discussions with the DeKalb County Democrat in what they characterized as an effort to reach a plea agreement, even as they were presenting evidence in the March 29 incident to a grand jury, said the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The grand jury has not yet decided whether McKinney should be charged, an official familiar with the proceedings said, and no decision is expected this week. The prosecutors have subpoenaed at least six witnesses to appear before the jury over the last two months.

McKinney's office rejected claims that there have been discussions of a plea agreement, saying the congresswoman has not been charged with anything and may never be, so there's no plea to negotiate.

"At this time, I have no comment as I am unaware of any 'legal case' regarding Ms. McKinney and [the] March 29 incident," William Moffitt, one of McKinney's lawyers, said in an e-mailed statement.

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney Ken Wainstein's office and a Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on the talks or even confirm they were occurring.

DOJ_NMG_0032605

Negotiated settlements in cases as controversial and politically sensitive as McKinney's are common, according to former federal prosecutors and lawyers with experience in Washington's Superior Court. They said there is often pressure on the prosecutors from higher-ups at the Justice Department and possibly the White House to resolve such cases quickly and quietly.

The Justice Department declined to comment on McKinney's case. A White House spokesman said he had no information on whether McKinney's case had been discussed in the West Wing.

Capitol Hill police said they were dismayed that the investigation into McKinney's confrontation with the police officer is taking so long to resolve. They said failure to charge McKinney would send the message that it is all right to hit a police officer.

The incident occurred as McKinney was entering a House office building and started to skirt a security checkpoint, as members of Congress and their aides are allowed to do. When a police officer who did not recognize McKinney tried to stop her McKinney, struck him in the chest with her fist, according to the police report.

McKinney was not wearing a special lapel pin that would have identified her as a congresswoman, but House members are not required to wear the pins. She also had changed her hairstyle since posing for her official House photo, which guards can consult to confirm her identity.

McKinney and her lawyers said she was acting in self-defense after the officer touched her inappropriately. After the incident, McKinney held a news conference in which she said she was the victim of racial profiling by Capitol police, stopped only because she was a "female, black congresswoman."

Under pressure from fellow Democrats and black lawmakers, McKinney eventually apologized for the incident on the House floor.

— Scott MacFarlane of Cox Broadcasting contributed to this article.

Gambino Captain Convicted Of Racketeering (AP)

By Larry Neumeister

AP, June 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- A Gambino family captain done in by the testimony of an undercover FBI agent and hours of government tapes was convicted Tuesday of racketeering _ a verdict his lawyer said almost guarantees he will die in prison.

Gregory DePalma, 74, had an oxygen tube in his nose and gauze on his face because of a weekend biopsy as the verdict was read in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

The verdict resulted from a government assault on what remains of the Gambino crime family after the Gotti era appeared to end with the death of John Gotti in 2002 and prosecutions of his brother, Peter Gotti, and son, John "Junior" Gotti.

Joaquin Garcia, an FBI agent who posed as "Big Jack" Falcone, had cozied up to DePalma and recorded thousands of hours of conversations that helped land the mobster.

The FBI planted a cell phone on DePalma that picked up conversations even when it was off. Defense lawyer Martin Geduldig said after the verdict that it "was just too difficult to overcome all of these tapes."

Sentencing was set for Aug. 29. Geduldig said he doubted DePalma would live beyond five years, so anything more would be a life sentence.

Prosecutors depicted DePalma as an energetic hustler from 2003 to 2005, when he extorted restaurants, construction companies and a topless nightclub where he was introduced to the undercover agent.

DePalma called in favors from anyone who feared his mob muscle. He described getting a former manager for Liza Minnelli to finance a $12,000 trip for mob wives to Las Vegas.

The jury also heard him boast that he made a restaurant owner get an $11,000 bottle of wine and provide as much as $4,000 in free food for two dozen Gambino guests.

U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein had rejected defense requests that DePalma rest at trial on a gurney or wheelchair because of his missing lung, heart problems, cancer and diabetes.

Prosecutors told jurors he had boasted after a 1999 racketeering guilty plea that he had duped the judge with an illness act worthy of an Academy Award.

They played tapes of him bragging that he wore an oxygen mask and did not shave for a week before sentencing, leading the judge to say he had never sentenced a man so sick.

Fat Lip Gets Mobster Life (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, June 7, 2006

He talked too much.

DOJ_NMG_0032606

Motor-mouth mobster Greg DePalma blabbed his way into a life prison sentence yesterday after a jury convicted him of racketeering charges based on hours of incriminating government tapes.

The verdict ended a three-week trial highlighted by the testimony of an undercover FBI agent who got so cozy with the ailing 74-year-old Gambino capo that he earned an invitation to join the Mafia.

DePalma's foul mouth filled more than 5,000 hours of tapes and his trial featured "Sopranos"-like scenes, including grub-gorging goodfellas, bloody beatings and whining wiseguy wives.

As the verdict was read, DePalma, hooked throughout the trial to an oxygen tank, groused about the FBI agents who took him down. He was found guilty on 27 of 36 counts, many involving violent extortion.

"Maybe instead of them buying TVs from P.C. Richards, they should go out and get some terrorists," he told lawyer John Meringolo.

It was a reference to the six "stolen" wide-screen sets given to him by FBI agent Joaquin Garcia, the undercover veteran DePalma was introduced to in the fall of 2002 as Miami jewelry fence "Jack Falcone."

DePalma kept one and passed the others to mob bosses.

Considering his criminal history and failing health, "any sentence of five years or more is probably a life sentence," said Martin Geduldig, another defense lawyer.

DePalma's ghostly pale figure in court was in stark contrast to that of the carefully coiffed man who had Frank Sinatra's arm draped over his shoulder in an infamous 1976 photo.

Garcia was DePalma's constant companion for two years and played such a convincing role that the veteran gangster wanted to put him up for membership in the mob family once headed by the Dapper Don, John Gotti.

Using Gambino family muscle as leverage, DePalma forced the owner of Valbella's, a Greenwich, Conn., restaurant which has attracted the likes of Joe Torre and Regis Philbin, to pick up the tab so two dozen of his mob pals could belly up to a multicourse meal.

Prosecutors say DePalma forced Gary Labriola, Liza Minnelli's former manager, to pay for a $12,000 spending spree at Las Vegas' Venetian Hotel for the wives of his mob bosses in 2003.

And DePalma put the arm on contractors big and small for weekly protection payments of $500 or more as well as a Christmas "tribute." He forced one to buy poorly made suits from a tailor friend and to purchase signed Leroy Neiman prints that cost thousands.

Federal prosecutors Christopher Conniff and Scott Marrah pointed jurors to DePalma's own words, and his attorneys conceded that the tapes were too much to overcome.

"He was a walking bug," Geduldig said.

GABBY CAPO IS KAPUT (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, June 7, 2006

Loose-lipped Gambino capo Gregory DePalma will likely spend the rest of his life behind bars after jurors found the sickly gangster guilty of a slew of mob crimes yesterday.

Jurors deliberated three days before convicting DePalma on 27 of the 36 charges he faced at a trial in Manhattan federal court, where prosecutors played numerous tapes of the gangster on his cellphone and blabbing at mob meetings.

The verdict was a notch in the belt of undercover FBI agent Joaquin Garcia, who has been called the "modern-day Donnie Brasco" for his stunning two-year infiltration of the Gambino crime family.

DePalma, 74, who breathes through an oxygen tube, quietly shook his head as the jury foreman announced the verdict on multiple extortions, receipt of stolen property, illegal gambling, racketeering and other charges.

"I think any sentence over five years is a life sentence," defense lawyer Martin Geduldig said outside of court, estimating the sentencing guidelines would call for a prison term of more than 10 years. "It was too difficult to overcome all if these tapes . . . He was a walking bug."

"Greg's been around the block a couple of times. He knew what he was battling here," said Geduldig, who added that he would ask Manhattan federal Judge Alvin Hellerstein for leniency at an Aug. 29 sentencing because of DePalma's poor health.

The ailing wiseguy, who has heart disease, diabetes and is missing a lung due to cancer, relied on the help of EMTs to get in and out of his wheelchair during the trial.

Meanwhile, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Christopher Conniff and Scott Marrah have repeatedly accused DePalma of feigning illness in order to curry favor with the court.

Testifying in a closed courtroom, Garcia told jurors how he ingratiated himself to DePalma by posing as gangster wannabe and jewel thief "Jack Falcone."

The agent, who weighs upwards of 300 pounds, joked that he packed on the weight while secretly recording hundreds of meetings with DePalma at restaurants around the city and in Westchester.

Prior to his March 2005 arrest, DePalma was taped boasting about his influence in the Gambino crime family and supposed brushes with celebrity, including a dinner with pop star Mariah Carey.

He also bragged of strong-arming movie star Armand Assante, who played "Dapper Don" John Gotti in an HBO movie.

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Ex-Tenn. Lawmaker Denies Taking Payoffs (AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

(06-06) 18:52 PDT Memphis, Tenn. (AP) -- A former Tennessee legislator charged with extortion took the stand in his own defense Tuesday and denied ever accepting payoffs from two FBI informants.

Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon testified that he had supported legislation for E-Cycle Management, a bogus company set up by the FBI, as a favor to friends and not for money.

Dixon was the only defense witness, and jurors were to begin deliberations Wednesday.

In final arguments to the jury, defense lawyer Coleman Garrett said Dixon is the victim of a government conspiracy based on a fake company that offered bribes for support of a proposed law that was never intended to pass.

"Don't treat this like it's real," Garrett said. "This is a joke. This man was set up."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said Dixon was not pressured into taking bribe money — "He just took it."

Under questioning from his attorney, Dixon said he had long known and tried to help the government's chief witnesses against him, Barry Myers and Tim Willis. Myers was Dixon's assistant at a community development center and Willis had been active in Memphis politics for years.

Dixon, a Democratic lawmaker for 22 years, said he had tried to help the two establish careers as lobbyists.

He acknowledged accepting $1,000 during a meeting that Willis secretly videotaped in 2004 for the FBI. But he said he thought the total of $6,000 that Willis laid out on a table was intended for Myers for helping lobby on behalf of E-Cycle.

On the tape, Dixon tells Myers: "Throw me one of those stacks, man."

He told jurors he thought Myers intended for that money to go to the financially struggling development center where they both worked.

Myers has pleaded guilty to splitting bribes totaling $9,500 with Dixon and is cooperating with the government.

Dixon was one of five sitting or former state lawmakers arrested in 2005 in an investigation the government called Tennessee Waltz and is the first to go to trial. One of the five, Republican Chris Newton, pleaded guilty, resigned his state House seat and is serving a one-year prison term. The other three are awaiting trial.

Dixon Tells Of 'network' (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 7, 2006

But didn't sell influence, ex-lawmaker testifies

Former state senator Roscoe Dixon acknowledged Tuesday that he accepted cash from a government informant portraying a lobbyist seeking favors, but denied that it was a bribe for his legislative help.

Dixon's testimony came at the end of his six-day federal bribery trial in which he was the only defense witness. The jury will begin deliberating this morning in what is the first local trial in the Tennessee Waltz public corruption investigation.

In his first public comments about the five-count indictment, Dixon was faced with explaining his words and actions on secret audio and video recordings that prosecutors say depict him selling his political influence by accepting cash payments from FBI informant Tim Willis.

"Tim Willis was my friend at the time and he knew he didn't have to pay me to get things done," Dixon told a federal court jury that saw him accepting a $1,500 payment in a tape made March 5, 2004. "I assumed it was to keep me doing the things I could do. I was under financial strain and obligations."

In closing arguments, federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza noted, however, that in the only conversation on the brief tape, Willis reminds Dixon to withdraw legislation for the FBI's undercover company called E-Cycle Management, Inc., which wants it revised.

"Oh, yeah, we'll kill it," Dixon replies as he walks out of E-Cycle's Downtown office with the money. "That's a done deal."

Dixon was charged with conspiracy to commit extortion and bribery by accepting $9,500 in cash payments for handling special legislation for the fictitious E-Cycle company that purportedly wanted to recycle the state's surplus computers.

His attorney, Coleman Garrett, argued that Dixon was "tricked" into accepting money and that government informants and undercover agents entrapped him.

"Why is the government doing this to Senator Dixon?" Garrett said in a voice with the volume and cadence of a fiery preacher. "Tim Willis was the main conspirator. E-Cycle was a lie. E-Cycle wasn't a real company. The government created this scam."

Dixon, 56, resigned from the Senate in January of last year after serving 22 years in the legislature to become the assistant chief administrative officer to Shelby County Mayor A C Wharton. He resigned the $101,856-a-year position when he was indicted five months later.

The Tennessee Waltz investigation netted 10 indictments in all, including four other past or present state lawmakers.

Awaiting trial are John Ford and Kathryn Bowers from Memphis and Ward Crutchfield from Chattanooga.

Former state representative Chris Newton from East Tennessee pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and is serving a one-year prison sentence at a federal facility in Atlanta.

Another guilty plea came from Barry Myers, Dixon's codefendant and former aide who testified last week that he was the former senator's "bag man" who collected payoffs on his behalf.

He said Dixon usually avoided accepting payoffs directly, but instead told suitors to "take care of Barry. Keep Barry happy."

Dixon testified Tuesday that he used the phrase only to encourage Willis to help his aide get consulting work if he could.

"I was just sharing the thought to help someone else out," Dixon said, adding that he tried to promote the careers of both Willis and Myers. "Both of these guys were like children to me. Barry was very, very helpful to me and I couldn't afford to pay him."

When his attorney suggested the phrase "keep Barry happy" might sound damaging, Dixon agreed. "It was a poor choice of words," he said.

In a video recording made Feb. 12, 2004, at Willis' Mud Island home, Willis places $6,000 cash on a table, Myers counts out six stacks of $1,000 each and Dixon tells Myers to give him one stack. He denied Myers' earlier allegation that he, Myers, took more of the money to Dixon later that evening.

"That was all I needed and I just saw it as a way of Barry giving me money to keep things going," said Dixon, emphasizing his financial strain. "It takes a toll on you."

In May of last year, Dixon agreed to be interviewed by the FBI and denied receiving any money that night in 2004 at Willis' home.

Dixon said his memory was blurred by his nervousness.

"I was scared as heck and kind of lost track of things," Dixon said in explaining the discrepancy between his denial and the video recording. "I get scared if I get stopped for a traffic ticket. I've always had the highest respect for the FBI and for police officers ... but I'm just a human being like anyone else."

U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla said he found little evidence of entrapment in the case, but that out of an abundance of caution, he still would give instructions for the jury to consider it as a defense.

Corruption Trial Witness: I Had To Hire A Drunk (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 7, 2006

Mayor Richard Daley's patronage chief ordered the hiring of a politically connected man who was "somewhat of a drinker," and he repeatedly engineered the promotions of workers with clout over more qualified candidates, the former No. 2 official in the city Water Department testified Tuesday.

Donald Tomczak, a key prosecution witness in the City Hall corruption trial, said he complained vehemently when Daley aide Robert Sorich directed him to accept the transfer of the man with the drinking problem, who had been working for the Transportation Department.

Tomczak said he warned Sorich that the man, a political worker under Ald. Edward Burke (14th), could cause injuries on Water Department job sites as a result of his drinking.

But Tomczak said Sorich insisted: "Work it out, Don." Tomczak hired the man and put him to work near his office at the Jardine Filtration Plant, where he could "keep an eye on him," Tomczak said.

Prosecutors hope the testimony supports their contention that political ties mattered more than ability in many City Hall hiring and promotion decisions. Sorich and three other former Daley administration officials are accused of participating in a scheme to fix personnel decisions in favor of pro-Daley political workers and other applicants favored by the mayor's office.

Under cross-examination, Sorich's defense lawyer prodded Tomczak into conceding that Sorich was only one of several players in the "exact same system" that has existed since Daley became mayor in 1989.

DOJ_NMG_0032609

Before Sorich began working in the mayor's office in 1993, Tomczak said then-Daley aides Timothy Degnan and Mike Broderick arranged jobs for pro-Daley political workers. Degnan and Broderick have not been charged with crimes.

"Certainly Robert didn't start this, did he?" attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin asked Tomczak.

"No," Tomczak replied.

In four weeks of testimony, federal prosecutors have presented many of their key witnesses. Tomczak's testimony was very similar to that of former Streets and Sanitation Deputy Commissioner Daniel Katalinic.

Katalinic and Tomczak—who both have admitted taking bribes from city trucking contractors—described how they built campaign forces of city workers who did the bidding of the mayor's office. The patronage armies were sustained through rigged jobs and promotions, they testified.

Former personnel directors in the city's Sewers, Water and Streets and Sanitation Departments told jurors that they received "blessed lists" of political workers from Sorich and Timothy McCarthy, Sorich's aide and co-defendant.

Two of the directors testified that they falsified ratings forms to ensure the hiring of favored applicants. They and other prosecution witnesses said the city's interview process for many blue-collar union jobs was a charade.

The fraud allegedly was designed to get around decades-old legal restrictions against City Hall patronage. The prosecution is expected to rest in two to three weeks after presenting testimony about hiring in the city's Aviation and Buildings Departments.

McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady, sent a subpoena to the city Monday demanding documents related to the 2004 hiring of two building inspectors who allegedly were hired because their fathers are union leaders. Deady wants memos of meetings involving top Daley administration officials, including Corporation Counsel Mara Georges, former Chief of Staff Sheila O'Grady and retired Personnel Commissioner Glenn Carr.

Defense lawyers have argued that the mayor's office recommended job applicants but that nobody was guaranteed a job or a promotion.

Durkin also has tried to emphasize that Sorich answered to higher-level officials in the mayor's office. Under cross-examination Tuesday, Tomczak acknowledged that former top Daley aides Victor Reyes and John Doerrer had the final say on hires. Neither Doerrer nor Reyes has been charged.

Tomczak agreed with Durkin's assertion that "not one red cent" changed hands in the alleged hiring scheme. Durkin contrasted that point with Tomczak's guilty plea last year, when he admitted taking almost $400,000 in bribes from companies in the city's Hired Truck Program.

"You're not equating taking $400,000 to this hiring nonsense?" Durkin asked Tomczak, who replied that he was not doing so.

Hundreds of jobs in the Water Department were filled with more concern for politics than merit, Tomczak told jurors. Getting promoted as a reward for political campaign work was widely referred to as "getting made," he said.

He said he went to Sorich to arrange the promotion of a political worker who was not the best candidate for a district foreman job. The man's promotion required Tomczak to "bring in an extra person with more experience to back him up," he testified.

Tomczak's testimony blunted another defense argument: that the mayor's office got involved in hiring to promote racial diversity. He said most beneficiaries of the rigged hiring process were white. Some minorities were promoted, he said, because "it would help the political group," which was divided into white, Latino and African-American branches.

Also Tuesday, a former assistant commissioner in the Water Department testified that she regularly met with Sorich from 1993 to 2002 to receive names of people that the mayor's office wanted hired or promoted.

But on cross-examination, Phyllis Bergthold said she told government agents that the names were "recommendations or preferred candidates." Bergthold, who grew up in the Daley family's 11th Ward power base, later acknowledged that the vast majority of people endorsed by the mayor's office were hired or promoted.

rrbush@tribune.com

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

Sorich's Lawyer: 'Not One Red Cent Changed Hands' (CHIST)

By Steve Warmbir And Natasha Korecki, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 7, 2006

In a burst of courtroom drama, a federal prosecutor and the defense attorney for Mayor Daley's former patronage chief clashed on Tuesday over testimony of the prosecution's star witness in the most fiery day so far in the trial.

Donald Tomczak, the former city Water Department honcho turned government informant, was on the witness stand wrapping up his second day of testimony when Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins asked how Tomczak rewarded some of the city employees who did political work for Tomczak on the side.

Tomczak said he could decide to award overtime on his own to city employees who took part in his political army. But Tomczak made clear that he did not have final say over hiring or promotions in his department. Final say came from the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, or IGA.

HIGHLIGHTS

PROSECUTION: Courtroom fireworks go off as a federal prosecutor and a defense attorney for the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, knock heads over the testimony of a star prosecution witness.

DEFENSE: In other testimony, a former personnel director at the city's Water Department says she considered names given to her by the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs just recommendations for hirings or promotions. But the witness acknowledges that the vast majority of those recommendations got the spots.

UP NEXT: Prosecutors are expected to call a former city transportation worker who ran his own political army.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

The mayor's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, who is on trial, was a top IGA official. Sorich and three other men are accused of running a hiring scheme in which officials rigged job interviews to ensure political workers for the Daley organization got city jobs or promotions.

'Pretty odd scheme, isn't it?'

Sorich's attorney, Thomas Durkin, took umbrage over the overtime question and appeared concerned that the prosecution was trying to link Sorich and his three co-defendants to the overtime scam -- although the prosecution never made any direct links.

"Overtime didn't have a thing to do with Robert Sorich or any of the young men at this table, did it?" Durkin asked Tomczak, his voice rising.

"No," Tomczak said.

Durkin also underscored that none of the men on trial ever took any money in exchange for getting people city jobs or promotions.

"Not one red cent changed hands," Durkin asked Tomczak.

"No," Tomczak agreed.

"Pretty odd scheme, isn't it?" Durkin said.

Collins loudly objected to Durkin's remark, and the judge sustained the objection.

Prosecutors say taxpayers were hurt in the scheme because people were hired or promoted in city jobs because of politics, not because they were the best people for the jobs or even qualified. Collins went through example after example with Tomczak on Tuesday where Tomczak said the most qualified person wasn't picked for a job.

Twice, Tomczak was told by Sorich to accept people with drinking problems for Water Department jobs, Tomczak said.

Also Tuesday, a former Water Department personnel director, Phyllis Bergthold, testified that Rosemarie Andolino, now executive director of the O'Hare Modernization Program, was present in some IGA meetings where Bergthold got names from Sorich of political workers who should get jobs or promotions. Andolino worked in IGA then.

Andolino's attorney, Michael Ettinger, declined to comment other than to say that prosecutors have assured him Andolino is not a target of the investigation.

FBI Probing Fumo In Warehouse Sale (PHI)

By Emilie Lounsberry, John Shiffman, Thomas Fitzgerald And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

Federal authorities are exploring whether State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, to help pay for renovations at his mansion, directed a nonprofit to purchase a warehouse owned by the contractor, sources said.

Fumo's attorney declined to comment yesterday. A lawyer for the nonprofit defended the warehouse purchase, saying the group paid "fair market value" after obtaining an appraisal.

The FBI's new line of inquiry in its sprawling, three-year Fumo investigation began after agents raided electrical contractor Donald "Gus" Dougherty's South Philadelphia home as part of a separate tax-fraud case.

This aspect of the inquiry - whether there is a link between the home renovation and the warehouse purchase - is in its earliest stages.

In recent days, prosecutors have subpoenaed permits from city records about the work done at Fumo's mansion in the city's Fairmount section, according to City Hall sources.

Investigators have been examining whether Fumo controls the nonprofit organization, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, and, if so, whether he has used it for personal and political gain.

Fumo purchased his 29-room, four-story brownstone on Green Street for $175,000 in 1994 and then embarked on an ambitious five-year effort.

"It was a big job," said Brian Burrows, a city electricians' union official, who said yesterday that he worked on the home and recently was interviewed by FBI agents about it.

He said he began working at the mansion in late 1999. Burrows said he was told that Dougherty pulled out of the job after not being paid. He said the work done by Dougherty's crews, plus his own, probably cost about $100,000, the same estimate given by another source.

"When I got there, it was tying all the odds and ends together on the project - for instance, the dining room was finished, except the chandeliers and wall sconces were coming in from Italy," Burrows said. "We hooked them up."

He says he wired Fumo's hot tub and the lighting and exhaust fans for his basement shooting range. The four-story building also has its own elevator.

Another person familiar with the renovations said that Dougherty's workers spent a year or more toiling within the mansion.

Though a Fumo spokesman declined to comment yesterday, his office told the Philadelphia Daily News earlier this year that Dougherty had done only a "small amount of work" and had been paid for it.

In December 1999, after Dougherty finished working in the mansion, he sold his warehouse at Second and Tasker Streets to Citizens' Alliance for $310,000 - $95,000 more than he had paid for it two years earlier.

The warehouse is about a dozen blocks from the Passyunk Avenue corridor where Citizens' Alliance has concentrated much of its activity, buying and fixing storefronts.

According to someone who took part in the talks over buying the warehouse, Fumo led the purchase negotiations for the nonprofit.

William J. Winning, a lawyer for Citizens' Alliance, said he did not know whether Fumo had directed the warehouse purchase.

Winning said the nonprofit obtained an appraisal that valued the warehouse at $310,000. "Fair market value was set, and that's what it was sold for," Winning said, adding that it's now "probably worth 10 times that much."

He said Citizens' Alliance now rents the warehouse to a limousine service and another tenant.

David Glancey, chairman of the city board that sets real estate assessments, said yesterday that the price paid by Citizens' Alliance seemed fair in light of rising property values in the neighborhood.

Fumo has never held a formal position at Citizens' Alliance.

Nevertheless, in an affidavit released last week, the FBI says that it has obtained e-mails showing that Fumo was "directly involved in and managing and controlling" its operations - including real estate purchases.

"I will decide" which buildings are bought, he wrote in one e-mail. Those e-mails were written after the warehouse purchase.

For a time, prosecutors were rebuffed in their recent attempt to subpoena city records pertaining to Fumo's home.

The subpoena sought all city records on renovations to Fumo's house from 1995 to 2000.

Such permits are normally public records. But city lawyers at first refused to turn them over, citing a 1995 court order obtained by Fumo's family sealing all city records related to the house.

To obtain it, a lawyer for Fumo's then-wife argued that Fumo had received unspecified threats and that release of his records would "seriously jeopardize the personal security of the plaintiff and her family."

The secrecy edict is highly unusual, possibly unprecedented in the city's history. Common Pleas Court Judge Albert W. Sheppard Jr., who issued the order, noted in an interview yesterday that at the time the city lawyers had not opposed it.

Saying that federal law trumped state law, federal prosecutors obtained a new order on Monday from a federal judge ordering the city to turn over the records. The city is expected to comply.

Richard Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said yesterday he could not comment on an active investigation.

Fumo, an influential Democrat who has served in the state Senate since 1979, has defended Citizens' Alliance's work in the community and suggested the FBI investigation is a Republican vendetta.

Geoffrey Johnson, one of Fumo's lawyers, declined to comment yesterday. Ken Snyder, a Fumo spokesman, referred reporters to Winning.

Fumo has been responsible for the bulk of Citizens' Alliance's funding.

As The Inquirer first disclosed, Fumo reached secret agreements with Peco Energy under which it gave Citizens' Alliance $17 million and Fumo dropped his opposition to Peco's business plans.

Authorities have also opened a parallel investigation into whether Fumo or his aides destroyed e-mails to thwart the federal investigation.

The probe marked a milestone of sorts last week when the FBI arrested two computer technicians on Fumo's legislative payroll and charged them with deleting e-mails to protect Fumo.

The FBI affidavit quotes e-mails in which the workers say Fumo ordered the e-mails destroyed. Fumo has also denied wrongdoing in that matter.

Now the Fumo probe is intersecting with another corruption investigation - the one involving Donald Dougherty's business. Sources have said this probe is examining, in part, whether Dougherty illegally avoided paying payroll taxes and union dues.

They have also been examining Dougherty's ties to John Dougherty, who is leader of Local 98 of the electrical workers' union, and whether officials at the union knew Donald Dougherty was avoiding paying union dues.

Financial dealings between labor leaders and contractors are closely regulated. Among other issues, the authorities have been looking into a sale of a Shore house by Donald Dougherty to John Dougherty, who are unrelated but friends since childhood. John Dougherty has said he paid a fair price.

To complicate matters further, John Dougherty and Fumo are rival political bosses who have an on-again, off-again political feud.

John Dougherty declined to comment yesterday. Donald Dougherty's attorney, Nicholas Nastasi, said this week: "I will not comment on any questions relating to Donald Dougherty."

Feds Say Bureaucrat Fixed Tickets For Tickets (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

Federal prosecutors portrayed Molden David Faison yesterday as a man who never met a concert ticket he didn't want - or wasn't willing to fix parking tickets to get.

The feds allege that Faison, a former hearing officer for the Bureau of Administrative Adjudication, used his job in August 2004 to extort $169 worth of tickets to a Prince concert.

Prosecutor Judy Goldstein Smith played damning FBI audiotapes of conversations between Faison and a government informant yesterday at the start of Faison's trial.

On the tapes, the government informant, John Florio, can be overheard giving Faison, who heard parking ticket appeals, the tag numbers and models of the vehicles with parking tickets he wanted dismissed.

The tapes reveal Faison keeping Florio informed about the disposition of the tickets and repeatedly asking him about getting tickets to concerts by Phil Collins, Prince, Barry Manilow and sports events. Florio also thanks Faison for "taking care" of him.

The tapes were played as corroborating evidence to support Florio, who took the stand yesterday as the government's main witness against Faison.

Florio, an admitted drug dealer with a gruff manner and South Philly accent, pleaded guilty on May 26 to three counts of possession of cocaine, crack and heroin with intent to distribute.

He testified that Faison agreed to reduce or dismiss his own parking tickets at a meeting on June 4, 2004, in exchange for $200.

After that meeting, Florio became a cooperating witness and wore a wire during subsequent meetings.

The feds allege the key meeting between Florio and Faison occurred on Aug. 18, 2004.

That day, Florio told Faison in a taped telephone call: "You're gonna be a happy camper. I got you two Prince tickets, up front, seats 1 and 2."

"Oh, man, what a deal," Faison says.

Florio told Faison that a cousin who worked for the plumbing company whose parking tickets Faison allegedly agreed to fix had paid for the concert tickets.

That same day, the feds say, Florio met Faison at a parking lot at 9th and Arch streets and gave him the Prince tickets.

"Oh, you the man... ," Faison tells Florio.

"I'm going to talk to my supervisor... and try to knock 'em all down," Faison says, referring to the plumbing company's parking tickets, but admits he may be able to get only "80 percent" dismissed.

Smith displayed copies of BAA disposition statements for the plumbing company vehicles that showed most of the tickets had either been dismissed or reduced.

During cross-examination, Faison's attorney, Edson A. Bostic, attacked Florio's credibility, getting him to admit that he used at least one and maybe two aliases while he was dealing drugs and that he had been convicted of assault charges in two separate cases.

DOJ_NMG_0032613

Florio also confessed that he smokes pot to soothe his nerves and that his recent guilty plea was to a lesser charge than that lodged against him in 2002.

Faison is the second BAA official charged with corruption. He was terminated from his $31,415-a-year job in September 2004 for reasons unrelated to the extortion charge.

A federal jury convicted former bureau Director Joseph F. Hoffman Jr. of mail fraud in February 2005 in connection with a ticket-fixing scheme.

Bolivar Co. Administrator Faces Federal Charges (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 7, 2006

CLEVELAND, Miss. - Bolivar County administrator Adrian Brown has been indicted on federal charges of accepting a kickback and tampering with a witness, authorities said Tuesday.

The arrest of Brown, 29, of Cleveland, was announced by the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office and the Bolivar County Sheriff's Department. Brown was indicated May 24 on the charges, officials said.

John G. Raucci, special agent in charge of the FBI in Mississippi, said Brown is accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County, which was to be reimbursed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said Brown is also accused of attempting to intimidate a witness in the investigation.

If convicted, Brown faces a $500,000 fine and 20 years in prison. An initial court appearance was pending.

Brown has been administrator in Bolivar County since April 2004. He previously was project administrator for South Delta Planning and Development District Inc. in Greenville.

Bolivar County Administrator Indicted On Federal Charges (JCL)

The Clarion-Ledger

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, June 7, 2006

Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown has been charged with defrauding the federal government and tampering with a witness.

The FBI announced Brown's arrest today, following a federal grand jury indictment on May 24, on one count each of theft or bribery concerning programs receiving federal funds and tampering with a witness.

If convicted, Brown, 29, faces a $500,000 fine and 20 years in federal prison.

Brown of Cleveland is accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County and the county was to be reimbursed by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Witness Recovers From Overdose To Describe New Jersey Graft (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

NEWARK, June 6 — The case of Raymond J. O'Grady is the culmination of years of work by federal investigators, a tale opening a window on small-town graft that brought down more than a dozen public officials in a New Jersey county run by old-fashioned patronage politics.

Now the trial has turned out to be a story of its own: the pivotal government witness — one day into his testimony last week against Mr. O'Grady, a longtime friend from Monmouth County politics — swallowed 60 to 80 blood-pressure pills in a suicide attempt.

But on Tuesday, the government salvaged its case, which a prosecutor, Ricardo Solano, had described in his opening statement last week as "an inside look at how public office is sold."

The prosecution witness, Anthony J. Palughi, took the stand again in Federal District Court here despite objections by the defense to allowing the testimony to continue so soon after what Mr. O'Grady's lawyer called "a miraculous recovery."

Mr. O'Grady, 56, a former committeeman in Middletown Township, N.J., is charged with taking $8,000 in cash to help steer municipal work to contractors, including two men who turned out to be agents from the F.B.I.

Mr. O'Grady was among 15 local officials arrested in February and March 2005 in a continuing investigation called Operation Bid Rig, which started in 1998. He is the first to go to trial; most have pleaded guilty, and two have died.

Mr. Palughi, 70, who recently retired as the Monmouth County superintendent of bridges, agreed to tape conversations with Mr. O'Grady, among other officials, when he was arrested in December 2004. He pleaded guilty in August 2005 to setting up bribes to local officials and pocketing money for himself.

DOJ_NMG_0032614

On Tuesday, jurors heard nothing of Mr. Palughi's attempted suicide last Friday morning before he was to resume his testimony. In arguments before Judge William J. Martini, Mr. O'Grady's lawyer, Kevin Roe, said that Mr. Palughi was surrounded in the hospital by F.B.I. agents.

"They had to patch this guy up or their case tanks," Mr. Roe said in a courthouse hallway during a brief break.

But Judge Martini, citing a psychiatrist's report that deemed the crucial witness lucid and able to testify, brought in the jury.

No sooner did Mr. Palughi answer a few questions than he offered an apology for his apparent confusion. "I'm not a professional informant, and not really that bright," he said.

But he forged ahead, testifying about tapes of his conversations with Mr. O'Grady that the prosecutors played for the jury.

Along with other recordings that the jury heard when the trial opened last week, the tapes track the two men discussing their "deals," all in dialogue that could have been lifted from a "Sopranos" script — accents and expletives included.

In the first conversation, which was recorded in October 2004, Mr. Palughi was at Carmela's, a restaurant in Neptune Township, with two federal agents posing as employees of a construction and demolition company. They were conferring about Mr. O'Grady, whom they were about to meet. Mr. Palughi advised them to give him no more than $1,000, adding, "I don't know why I'm telling you this, but I love you guys."

At lunch that day, the agents recorded their conversation with Mr. O'Grady, who was the director of the county motor pool at the time. Mr. O'Grady accepted their offer of "a little early Christmas gift or whatever."

Then, in a taped conversation of a subsequent meeting in February, Mr. O'Grady told the two agents that he would look for small jobs for them, as they had asked, to avoid bidding requirements.

In several tapes played on Tuesday, Mr. O'Grady and Mr. Palughi worried aloud that investigators might be closing in on them, finding out about the payments from the construction company as well as previous dealings involving fake and inflated invoices from a trucking company that Mr. Palughi said had also passed cash to Mr. O'Grady through him.

Mr. Palughi, who was questioned by James Nobile, an assistant United States attorney, also described Mr. O'Grady's badgering of one owner of the trucking company for contributions to the Monmouth County Republican Organization.

Yet Mr. Palughi volunteered that it was his own idea to call the owner, a man named Matty, to ask for money when he and Mr. O'Grady found themselves broke in Atlantic City one night.

"We wanted to gamble," Mr. Palughi said, "So I said, 'Let's call Matty and see what he can do.' He wired it down to the hotel."

The defense contends that Mr. Palughi lied to investigators and cooperated with them in part to save his county pension.

Under cross-examination by Mr. Roe, Mr. Palughi conceded that with a ninth-grade education he had no apparent qualifications for the county jobs he held for more than 20 years. In his $92,000-a-year job as superintendent of bridges, he said, he worked mostly as a chauffeur for Freeholder Director Harry W. Larrison Jr., one of the two arrested officials who died.

"Basically, my job was driving Mr. Larrison around," he said.

But Mr. Palughi disputed the lawyer's accusations that he had defrauded taxpayers or lied to get his jobs.

"That's how the system worked for years and years, no matter what party was in," he said. "It's a sin that it had to work that way, but it did."

Flemmi Describes Gang's Relationship With The FBI (BOS/AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, June 7, 2006

BOSTON --Convicted gangster Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, testifying Tuesday in a wrongful death lawsuit against the federal government, described a corrupt relationship of favors, gifts and tip-offs between the FBI and its criminal informants.

Flemmi said he and fugitive crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger gave the FBI information about the Mafia, and in exchange, the FBI protected them from prosecution. Members of the Bulger gang also showered several FBI agents with cash as gifts to make sure that protection continued, Flemmi said.

"It was kind of like a quid pro quo situation," he said.

Flemmi took the stand in a lawsuit by the family of John McIntyre, 32, a fisherman who was killed by Bulger and Flemmi after they learned he was cooperating with authorities. McIntyre's family claims that former FBI Agent John Connolly Jr. tipped off Bulger and Flemmi to McIntyre's identity.

Flemmi's testimony this week is his first since agreeing to cooperate with federal authorities in 2003. Flemmi is serving a life sentence in 10 killings -- including McIntyre's -- as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty.

About six weeks before his death, McIntyre had started talking to U.S. Customs agents in an investigation of Bulger and Flemmi's involvement in a failed plan to send guns to the Irish Republican Army aboard a Gloucester fishing boat.

DOJ_NMG_0032615

In response to questions from the McIntyre family's attorney, William Christie, Flemmi testified that McIntyre was killed after Connolly told them that one of the two people who were aboard the fishing boat was cooperating with authorities.

In opening statements at the trial Monday, another attorney for the McIntyre family said McIntyre was lured to a party on Nov. 30, 1984, then chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled and shot in the head by Bulger.

Flemmi was asked only a few questions about the McIntyre case.

Instead, Christie asked Flemmi to describe his relationship with the FBI, which began in the 1960s when he first became a criminal informant. Flemmi said his FBI handlers were eager for any information that would help them bring down the Mafia.

"It was the FBI priority," Flemmi said repeatedly.

Flemmi said he and Bulger set up a slush fund that was used to make cash payments to FBI agents and to buy them gifts. Flemmi said Connolly received cash payments totalling about $250,000 during the time they were informants, from 1975 to 1990.

Flemmi said the gifts were given to FBI agents to ensure "good will and protection."

Flemmi said Connolly treated him and Bulger with respect.

"He didn't treat me like a criminal, that's for sure," Flemmi said. "He didn't look down on me as an informant."

Connolly was convicted in 2002 on racketeering and other charges for tipping Bulger that he was about to be indicted. Bulger fled on the eve of his 1995 indictment and remains a fugitive on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list.

Christie walked Flemmi through a long list of crimes he and Bulger committed while they were FBI informants, including the murders of three other people the McIntyre family claims were killed after Connolly tipped the Bulger gang that they were talking to authorities about the gang's crimes.

Connolly was acquitted of playing any role in those deaths during his racketeering trial.

Gail Marcinkiewicz, a spokeswoman for the Boston FBI office, would not comment on Flemmi's testimony directly, but said the U.S. attorney general and the FBI have revised their guidelines on criminal informants "to minimize the chance that unchecked behavior could occur."

"There have been changes over the course of time and increased oversight," she said.

Flemmi said he was repeatedly assured by Connolly and his FBI supervisors that he and Bulger would not be prosecuted for their crimes.

Flemmi is scheduled to resume his testimony Wednesday.

FBI Handler Treated `me Like An Equal,' Flemmi Testifies (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 7, 2006

Tells of bribes, series of killings

Notorious gangster Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi offered a stark portrait yesterday of the days when he and James ``Whitey" Bulger ruled Boston's underworld, getting away with murder after murder while working as FBI informants.

All the while, one corrupt former FBI supervisor, John Morris, ``treated us like we were FBI agents," Flemmi testified.

His longtime FBI handler, John J. Connolly Jr., ``didn't treat me like I was a criminal, that's for sure. He didn't look down on me because I was an informant. He treated me like an equal, in my eyes."

Flemmi, who turns 72 on Friday and is serving a life sentence for killing 10 people, spent his second day on the stand yesterday in US District Court in Boston, testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit filed against the government by the family of John McIntyre of Quincy.

The trial marks the first time Flemmi has testified publicly since he began cooperating with federal authorities three years ago, after striking a deal that spared him the death penalty.

Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, because Connolly warned them that McIntyre had implicated them in an unsuccessful effort to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army. He and Bulger also blamed McIntyre for leaks that led to the seizure of the Ramsland, a vessel caught smuggling marijuana into Boston Harbor, he said. He and Bulger would have raked in about $1 million in drug profits, if the Ramsland hadn't been intercepted, he said.

Flemmi testified only briefly about McIntyre, then went through a litany of other murders and bribes given to FBI agents.

He said he and Bulger paid about $250,000 between 1975 and 1990 to Connolly.

New Hampshire lawyer William Christie, who represents McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, tried to establish a pattern of FBI negligence by questioning Flemmi about his informant relationship that stretched from 1964 to 1990.

Elaborating on claims he made in a deposition last year, Flemmi said that during the 1980s, he and Bulger gave cash payoffs to the following agents, who are now retired: $5,000 to Morris, $5,000 to John Newton, $2,500 to John Cloherty, $2,500 to Nicholas Gianturco, and $2,500 to Michael Buckley.

DOJ_NMG_0032616

Morris, who was later granted immunity, admitted to taking bribes from the gangsters. The other agents, who have never been charged, have vehemently denied taking any cash from Bulger and Flemmi.

When the allegations surfaced last year, Gianturco said, ``Years later, it's very easy for these guys to sit in a cell with nothing to lose and make allegations to even the score."

Flemmi testified for the first time yesterday that he and Bulger gave retired FBI agent Dennis Condon a gold ring with his initials on it.

But Boston lawyer Michael Meyer, who represents Condon, flatly denied that allegation. ``It did not happen," he said. He noted that Condon has been dismissed from an unrelated lawsuit filed against the government.

Flemmi also reiterated his contention yesterday that he and Bulger gave an expensive pipe to James Ring, a retired FBI supervisor.

Boston lawyer Alan Rose, who represents Ring and was in the courtroom, also denied that. ``Jim Ring never received a pipe or anything else" from Bulger or Flemmi, he said.

Rose noted that US District Judge Mark Wolf rejected Flemmi's allegations against Ring as untrue during court hearings in 1998.

The McIntyres' suit is the first of 17 civil suits filed against the government by victims of Flemmi and Bulger to make it trial. Ten have been dismissed. Lawyers representing some of the other victims' families took notes yesterday as Flemmi testified about other slayings.

Describing how he watched Bulger strangle 26-year-old Deborah Hussey with a rope in early 1985, after luring her to a home in South Boston, Flemmi said, ``Bulger is a pretty powerful person. . . . I don't know how long she lasted.

Hussey was the daughter of Marion Hussey, Flemmi's longtime girlfriend who had three children with him.

Flemmi testified that Hussey accused him, in front of her mother, of having a sexual relationship with him when she was a teenager, which he admitted was true.

But Hussey was killed, Flemmi said, because she was involved in drugs and was dropping his name and Bulger's name around town.

``Bulger was the driving force in that because she was using his name, as well as mine, but I'm not diminishing my role in it either," Flemmi said.

He wasn't asked, and didn't volunteer, many details about how he and Bulger killed Flemmi's former girlfriend, Debra Davis, 26, in September 1981. Flemmi agreed under questioning that they strangled her at his mother's South Boston home because she knew too much about their activities.

Flemmi acknowledged that he extracted the teeth from some of his victims after they were dead, to make it difficult to identify them.

He also offered details of other murders, and said Connolly had provoked the 1974 slaying of Richard Castucci and the 1982 murders of Edward ``Brian" Halloran and John Callahan by warning Bulger that they were informants or potential witnesses against Bulger or other members of the Winter Hill Gang.

Roger Wheeler, World Jai Alai president, was gunned down in Tulsa, Okla., in May 1981 because he refused to sell his company to Callahan, a Boston accountant who had promised Bulger's gang they could skim $10,000 a week from one of the company's parking concessions once he acquired the business, according to Flemmi. He said he and Bulger helped arrange the murder.

Connolly, who was convicted in 2002 of racketeering, is serving 10 years in prison in Florida.

Bulger, who fled to evade a 1995 racketeering indictment after being warned in advance by Connolly, remains a fugitive.

Most Popular Flemmi Details Why Victims Had To Go (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, June 7, 2006

In the same blase tone he used to describe how lovers and rats were routinely butchered and buried, gangster Stephen Flemmi claimed yesterday that the more blood he spilled with his partner in crime James “Whitey” Bulger, the bigger their FBI fan club grew.

Former Boston FBI supervisor James Ring “was aware of what we were doing. He condoned it,” Flemmi, 72, testified in federal court, explaining how Ring fawned over the two crime bosses, who also were the agency’s prized informants.

Ring’s partner, John Morris, “treated us like we were FBI agents,” the man nicknamed “The Rifleman” added.

As for the crime duo’s longtime handler, John Connolly - the only G-man convicted of blurring the lines with Bulger, Flemmi and the rest of the Winter Hill Gang - he “didn’t treat me like a criminal,” Flemmi boasted. “It’s like we were equals.”

DOJ_NMG_0032617

Between 1981 and 1990, Flemmi said Ring, Morris, Connolly and other Boston agents lapped up cash bonuses, jewelry, jukeboxes and cases of wine purchased from the kitty the gangsters kept for that purpose, dubbed “the X fund.”

The gifts, Flemmi explained, bought him and Bulger, 76, on the lam for 11 years now, “protection” from those sworn to sweep their ilk off the streets.

Instead, Flemmi said, murder indictments vanished and those trying to tell authorities what was going on were whacked. And all Flemmi and Bulger had to do in return was help the FBI bring down their North End competitors, the Sicilian Mafia.

“It was a quid-pro-quo situation,” Flemmi said.

Flemmi was the first witness to be called in a $50 million wron ul death suit brought against the federal government by a Quincy mother whose son, John McIntyre, was tortured to death by Bulger and The Rifleman in 1984 for telling the FBI they were trying to smuggle guns to Ireland.

Yesterday, Emily McIntyre’s attorney, William Christie, his voice spiced with contempt, took Flemmi on a lurid trip down memory lane to explain why certain people were executed, including:

Richard Castucci, an FBI informant Connolly warned Bulger had given up the hiding place of two top Winter Hill members. “It was kind of a revenge thing,” Flemmi said.

Roger Wheeler, the Tulsa, Okla., owner of World Jai Alai who refused to sell his company to a Winter Hill associate. “He was a difficult person to deal with,” Flemmi said.

Debra Davis, Flemmi’s longtime girlfriend, who was strangled by Bulger. She knew too much about their intimate arrangement with the FBI.

Brian Halloran, an informant who could implicate Bulger in Wheeler’s slaying. After Halloran’s murder, Flemmi testified, Connolly called Bulger and offered to provide him with an alibi.

Arthur “Bucky” Barrett, a bank robber. Bulger shot Barrett in the back of the head. “Bulger knew he had a lot of money,” Flemmi said, “and he wanted some of it.”

In Galante Garbage Investigation, Surrender Is Not An Option (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

NEW HAVEN (AP) — With the threat of indictments looming in a multistate investigation into organized crime in the garbage industry, the Justice Department recently told one of Connecticut’s largest trash haulers: Don’t come to us. We’ll come to you.

James Galante, a Danbury garbage magnate and the acknowledged target of the FBI racketeering investigation, recently asked prosecutors to let him surrender if indicted, heading off a public arrest, his attorney said.

But prosecutors rejected the request, defense attorney Hugh Keefe said, leaving Galante waiting for a possible visit from the FBI and the region’s garbage haulers wondering whether a series of arrests is imminent.

The industry has been on edge since federal agents raided dozens of homes and businesses in New York and Connecticut last summer, seizing truckloads of documents in an investigation into the so-called "property rights" system. That system, in which garbage companies carve out and enforce exclusive territories, has led to violence and higher prices for customers, prosecutors in similar investigations have said.

With a grand jury meeting this week and attorneys expecting indictments soon, Keefe and others have asked that their clients be allowed to voluntarily show up for court rather than face arrest by the FBI.

"If they want to be cowboys, it’s up to them," said attorney John Pollok, who represents Galante’s former business associate, Thomas Milo, who is named in FBI search records.

Pollok said he does not know whether Milo will be arrested or indicted.

"It’s an outrageous and unnecessary tactic that serves no useful purpose," Keefe said, arguing that Galante has not fled in the year since the case became public.

He said agents want to make a show of Galante’s arrest.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O’Connor, the state’s top federal prosecutor, wouldn’t discuss the case or confirm Keefe’s account. His office prohibits "perp walks" in which defendants are paraded before television cameras.

"Arresting somebody does not equate to a perp walk," O’Connor said.

O’Connor said decisions about arrests are left to FBI agents and the prosecutors running the case.

"We make those decisions on a case-by-case basis and generally we make the right decision," he said.

Keefe would not recount the specifics of his discussions with prosecutors but said he routinely promises to deliver his clients to court the day of an indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0032618

Sometimes, as when former gubernatorial aide Peter Ellef surrendered on corruption charges, prosecutors accept the offer. Other times, like when the FBI chased former Waterbury Mayor Joseph Santopietro through the street, they don't.

NYU Whiz Kid Pleads Guilty In $7 Million Hedge Fund Scam (STAMADV/AP)

Associated Press

The Stamford Advocate, June 7, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A former New York University student pleaded guilty to bank and wire fraud Tuesday, admitting he used his student ID and expertly forged documents to pose as the heir to a billionaire Turkish family and trick investors into pouring millions into a nonexistent hedge fund.

Prosecutors spent hours Tuesday describing how Hakan Yalincak, 22, charmed his way into the exclusive world of Greenwich high finance, shuttled counterfeit checks across the world and brokered deals with a Kuwaiti financier.

Yalincak's fund, the Daedalus Capital Relative Fund I, wasn't a legitimate investment and prosecutors said investors lost more than $7 million - a figure Yalincak said is overstated. Prosecutors say the money was spent on a Porsche, a Tiffany diamond and a $1.25 million donation to NYU.

The donation was used to reassure worried investors that the Yalincaks were investors who could be trusted, prosecutors said. Yalincak's mother, who also faces fraud charges, even persuaded NYU's development director to meet with prospective investors, prosecutors said.

NYU spokesman Josh Taylor said the development director spoke with two investors only to confirm that the Yalincaks had paid the first installment of what was to have been a $21 million gift.

The Kuwaiti businessman told the FBI that Yalincak's mother claimed to be part of one of the world's richest families. Other investors said they received financial statements showing the family's net worth at more than $1 billion.

"This was all an attempt by the Yalincaks to establish their bona fideness to investors as a wealthy Turkish family," prosecutor Calvin Kurimai said.

In reality, most of the money in the Yalincak accounts belonged to investors. When a few got suspicious and demanded their money back, prosecutors said they were paid with other people's investments.

When he came up short, prosecutors said, Yalincak forged multimillion-dollar checks and passed them quickly through banks in Greenwich, New York and Switzerland, hoping to cash out before they caught on. When they froze the accounts, prosecutors said Yalincak blamed it on a mistake by the executor of his family's estate.

"I just want to apologize to my family," Yalincak said in court. "My actions during the course of this thing really hurt my mother, father and my sister."

Yalincak's plea deal with prosecutors does not recommend a specific sentence. He faces up to 50 years in prison when he is sentenced Sept. 19. Yalincak's mother, Ayferafet, is scheduled for a fraud trial next month.

NYU said it will return the donation once a court determines whom the money belongs to.

"True philanthropy, like good business dealings, requires good faith," the university said in a prepared statement. "Clearly that was lacking here."

Yalincak, who has been detained since his arrest last year, was denied bail for a third time Tuesday.

More Sex Offenders Tracked By Satellite (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Hundreds of convicted sex offenders will have to wear a two-piece electronic tracking device for the rest of their lives under a new Wisconsin law.

Ankle bracelets and a pager-sized unit, often attached to a belt, will use Global Positioning System (GPS) technology to follow their every step. If they enter restricted areas, such as schools, officials will be alerted.

GPS programs will track 285 offenders the first year, beginning July 2007, and up to 400 by the second year, says Dan Leistikow, spokesman for Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle.

In May, Wisconsin joined a rapidly rising number of states using GPS to monitor convicted sex offenders. At least 23 states are doing so, according to a survey in February by the Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole. Others have since begun or expanded GPS programs.

"In the last several months, it's been exponential growth," says Steve Chapin, president of Pro-Tech, a Florida-based firm that provides GPS services to 27 statewide agencies. He says his business has doubled in the past three months.

As of January, 13 states had laws requiring or allowing GPS tracking, says the National Conference of State Legislatures.

DOJ_NMG_0032619

Aside from Wisconsin, governors in at least six states (Arkansas, Georgia, Kansas, Virginia, Washington and Michigan) have signed such bills this year. New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch plans to do so soon. Similar bills are pending elsewhere.

"It's the law you can't vote against," says Chapin.

Several of the laws are named after Jessica Lunsford, a 9-year-old Florida girl who was kidnapped, raped and killed in February 2005. The man charged with killing her was a convicted sex offender who hadn't reported that he lived across the street from her family. After he fled, it took almost a month to find him.

Even states without specific GPS laws, including Minnesota and Texas, are testing the technology and expanding its use.

Congress may accelerate such efforts. The House and Senate have each passed sex offender bills this year that approve funding for GPS tracking. They need to craft a final bill.

The surge in GPS use coincides with the technology's dramatic advancements. The devices have become smaller and more accurate, often pinpointing a person's position within 30 feet. They are more precise than older devices that use radio frequencies and detect only when the wearer leaves a certain area, such as home if under house arrest.

GPS units can be programmed to have "exclusion zones" where offenders are not allowed and "inclusion zones" where they should be.

States are spending $5 to $10 daily to track each sex offender. Some require offenders, unless indigent, to pay the tab. They can choose the costlier "active" tracking, which gives real-time reports, or "passive" monitoring, which sends one report daily that lists where the offender went that day.

States have tried both:

·California uses GPS to track 430 sex offenders and has funds to follow 2,500 offenders by 2009, says Elaine Jennings of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

Since the program began in July 2005, 45 offenders have been arrested for violating parole and no new crimes have been committed, she says.

"It's an excellent supervision tool" but doesn't supplant human supervision, says Jennings.

·Massachusetts has issued eight arrest warrants for violations by the 192 high-risk offenders it has tracked since its "active" GPS program began in May 2005, says Paul Lucci, one of the state's deputy probation commissioners. The state has officers who constantly watch a computer screen recording offenders' whereabouts and who can respond immediately.

·Michigan finished three pilot programs in 2003 and plans this summer to begin tracking up to 1,000 sex offenders, says Steve Bock of the Michigan Department of Corrections' Electronic Monitoring Center.

Bock says the state will use "passive" monitoring, because "active" GPS is too labor-intensive. He says real-time tracking generates "a ton of messages" that necessitate a 24/7 response team. He says it's problematic if offenders are barred from many areas, because GPS allows only a certain number of exclusion zones. "It can become a nightmare to enforce," Bock says.

Jake Goldenflame, 68, a convicted sex offender released 15 years ago, opposes lifetime GPS tracking. "If a man is so dangerous he needs it, he shouldn't be released," he says. Goldenflame says such monitoring may provide a "false sense of security," because it tells where the offender is, not what he's doing.

"It is not an effective way to prevent sexual assaults," says Richard Wright, a professor of criminal justice at Bridgewater State College. He says many serious sex offenders evade police by failing to register and others may re-offend regardless of tracking. He says no definitive study proves GPS deters crime.

Chapin says GPS reduces recidivism because offenders can't get away as easily. He says a December 2004 analysis by the Florida Department of Corrections found 3.8% of offenders tracked with GPS committed a new felony within two years, compared with 7.7% of those supervised without it.

Offenders tracked by GPS were 90% less likely to abscond or re-offend than those not electronically monitored, says a February study by Florida State University of 75,661 offenders placed on home confinement. GPS did about as well as radio frequency, which costs four times less. "It's not a cost-free device," says Mark Carey, president of the American Probation and Parole Association. "It's an augmentation of what we do. It's not a replacement."

Inmate Freed After 18 Years On Basis Of DNA Evidence (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

HARTFORD, June 6 — Eighteen years ago, James Calvin Tillman was arrested on charges of raping and kidnapping a woman after she left a bar in downtown Hartford. For 18 years, he insisted that he was innocent. And on Tuesday, he was freed.

He had refused a plea deal, his family said, and was convicted and sentenced to 45 years in prison. His appeals failed. Distraught, he underwent psychiatric treatment in prison. He read the Bible and urged other inmates to read it, too. And, finally, in February 2005, he wrote to the Connecticut Innocence Project, which helps inmates who claim that they have been wrongly convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0032620

The two public defenders who head the Connecticut Innocence Project located the victim's dress and pantyhose, which were collected as evidence in 1988, and had new DNA tests conducted. They found no match between Mr. Tillman and semen on the clothing. Based on that test, a judge in State Superior Court vacated his conviction on Tuesday and ordered a new trial. After the court session, Mr. Tillman's lawyers speculated that the charges would be dropped. The chief state's attorney, Christopher L. Morano, said, "There are still some loose ends that need to be tied up and need to be examined," a reference to an additional DNA test, and would not say whether he thought the case would go to trial again.

Mr. Morano said the case was the first in the state in which DNA evidence had "cast doubt" upon a conviction.

At least for now, Mr. Tillman is out of prison. Less than two hours after Judge Thomas P. Miano ordered that he be released without bail, the elevator doors in the lobby of the criminal courthouse on Lafayette Street opened and there was Mr. Tillman, 44, stepping out slowly, leaning on a cane as he made his way to an ecstatic woman in white, his mother, who called out to him and to Jesus.

"Thank the Lord!" said his mother, Catherine Martin, swallowing Mr. Tillman in her arms in front of his brother, a cousin, a couple of friends, his lawyers and a few reporters. "Thank you, thank you, thank you, Father! Jesus! Thank the Lord!"

Moments later, Mr. Tillman, stocky and bald, with a silver cross hanging from a chain around his neck, walked out of the courthouse and faced a wall of cameras and microphones. The first words he said were: "Praise the Lord. Thank you, Jesus."

Faith, he said, got him from 1988 to 2006. Science, he said, got him out.

"I was innocent all along so I just kept my faith and let science be science," he said, after thanking the public defenders, Karen A. Goodrow and Brian S. Carlow.

Mr. Tillman was arrested after a woman identified him from a photo as the man who abducted her as she was getting into her car not far from the Arch Street Tavern in downtown Hartford. The woman said Mr. Tillman drove her a short way, then stopped the car, beat her, raped her and ran away.

A chemical analysis of semen found on the woman's clothing — done before DNA testing was available — showed a match to certain characteristics of Mr. Tillman's semen, and prosecutors used that to support the victim's account. But the technology is not as sophisticated as DNA testing, Mr. Carlow said Tuesday, noting that the semen could have matched that of up to 20 percent of the male population.

Mr. Tillman protested his innocence. At one point, according to his mother and his brother, Willie Lee Tillman, 45, he rejected a plea deal that would have sent him to prison for eight years. In 1989, Mr. Tillman was convicted and sentenced to 45 years in prison for rape, kidnapping and other charges.

Mr. Carlow and Ms. Goodrow said it took them several months to track down the evidence collected in 1988. New DNA testing this spring showed no link to Mr. Tillman, although one more test has been ordered on a sample from the dress. Ms. Goodrow said the DNA on the clothing has not been matched to anyone else.

Judge Miano emphasized that the new DNA evidence did not suggest that a crime had not been committed by someone, only that eyewitness accounts can be devastatingly inaccurate.

"The court finds that if this new evidence were proffered in a new trial that it's likely to produce a different result at such trial," the judge said.

The prosecutor in the 1988 case, Edward R. Narus, also represented the state in court on Tuesday. Mr. Morano, the chief state's attorney, praised Mr. Narus for cooperating with the defense by agreeing to the request for a new trial.

Mr. Carlow and Ms. Goodrow did not criticize the way prosecutors handled the case. "In 1988, it was much more compelling evidence then than it is today," Mr. Carlow said of the semen testing.

Leaving the courthouse, Mr. Tillman stepped carefully over curbs and medians on his way to his mother's car, which blasted gospel music the moment she turned the key. His family said that he hurt his leg in prison, and that it became infected.

Asked how the green grass and fully leafed trees looked, after his more than 18 years behind bars, Mr. Tillman said, "Just beautiful."

CIVIL LAW:

Gabelli, Justice Department Settle Suit Over Cellphone Licenses (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032621

The Justice Department has reached a deal with Mario Gabelli in a civil-fraud suit that alleged the famed money manager was at the center of an effort to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in auctions of cellphone licenses.

Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy announced the settlement Tuesday during a hearing before U.S. District Judge Paul Crotty in Manhattan. Terms of the deal weren't disclosed but are expected to include a payment to the government of more $100 million, according to others briefed on the negotiations.

"We have reached a settlement in principle," Mr. Kennedy said. "We are moving forward."

The terms of the deal are expected to be made public during a court hearing on June 29. Mr. Kennedy declined to comment on the amount of the settlement.

Mr. Kennedy also said in court that the government reached a settlement with Russell Taylor III, the private plaintiff who brought the initial civil suit against Mr. Gabelli, Lynch Interactive Corp. and other Gabelli affiliates. Mr. Taylor said he witnessed the alleged fraud while working as a paralegal and attorney at a law firm.

Under the False Claims Act, Mr. Taylor stands to receive about 25% of the settlement. This windfall will be split with his two Washington law firms that worked on the case, Phillips & Cohen LLP, which specializes in whistleblower cases, and the litigation powerhouse Williams & Connolly LLP.

The settlement terms are also expected to permit Mr. Gabelli to continue to own and buy FCC telecommunications licenses, according to people close to the case. Had the suit gone to trial and gone against him, Mr. Gabelli might have lost that right. These and other terms are expected to be finalized at the court hearing at the end of the month.

The Justice Department joined the case in March, backing the allegations in the suit, which was filed under seal in 2001 in Washington, D.C., and later transferred to Manhattan federal court. The suit alleged Mr. Gabelli was at the center of a scheme to defraud the FCC of more than $160 million in bidding credits and other benefits intended for small businesses, and that he then earned profits of more than $205 million in the sale of some of those licenses.

Mr. Gabelli, who wasn't present in court Tuesday, runs Gamco Investors Inc., a mutual-fund empire in Rye, N.Y., that has become one of the best-known brands on Wall Street. Gamco isn't a party to the lawsuit, which focuses on Mr. Gabelli's role as chairman of Lynch Interactive, a telecommunications firm.

Lanny Breuer, an attorney for Lynch Interactive and other Gabelli affiliates, said that there were a number of parties involved and still some issues to sort out, but he expected the matter to be resolved in the next three weeks. "We remain very optimistic," he said in court. A spokesman for Mr. Gabelli had no comment Tuesday.

The settlement resolves the latest legal headache for Mr. Gabelli. Early last month, Gabelli Group Capital Partners Inc. settled claims by two shareholders that Mr. Gabelli had blocked them from selling shares in the closely held company. That settlement, valued at more than $80 million, resolved a suit by former partners who alleged Mr. Gabelli received exorbitant fees and compensation from the company. His reported earnings in 2005 were $55 million.

Gabelli Reaches Tentative Deal On Cellphone Licenses (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Mutual fund mogul Mario Gabelli has reached a tentative settlement in a civil lawsuit charging him with defrauding the federal government of hundreds of millions of dollars in auctions of cellphone licenses, according to the Justice Department.

Critics of the Federal Communications Commission's auction system seized on the case as proof that deep-pocketed bidders set up sham companies to win discounts reserved for small businesses.

A settlement in principle in the Gabelli case was announced Tuesday by Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy at a hearing in New York, said Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller.

Terms of the agreement were not disclosed. Details are expected to be revealed at a June 29 court hearing.

Neither Gabelli nor representatives of his telecom company, Lynch Interactive, could be reached for comment Tuesday.

The deal comes three months after the Justice Department intervened in a civil fraud lawsuit, filed five years ago by a citizen under a law that lets an individual sue on the government's behalf.

The lawsuit alleges Gabelli set up about a dozen sham companies in auctions from 1995 to 2000 to snare airwave licenses. The entities were formed a few days before each auction, often were dissolved shortly afterward and never used the licenses, many of which were later sold for huge profits, the lawsuit claims. The lawsuit seeks up to $370 million in damages.

In previous statements, Lynch has called the lawsuit “frivolous” and said it “adhered to both the letter and spirit” of FCC rules. In a March interview with USA TODAY, Gabelli welcomed the government's participation in the lawsuit, saying he was “delighted to deal with an entity that knows the facts.”

Gabelli is a Wall Street luminary whose money management firm, Gamco Investors, advises private accounts and the Gabelli family of mutual funds. Gamco manages about $28 billion in assets.

The legal battle was largely borne of controversial FCC rules aimed at encouraging small businesses to participate in multibillion-dollar airwave auctions. Because the licenses are so expensive, larger companies might financially back the small players, but they can't control company operations.

The FCC has found it challenging to determine if bigger companies exert control. The lawsuit alleges that fraud in the Gabelli case was blatant, adding that " 'bidders' existed on paper only."

In April, the FCC modified its auction rules in response to critics such as the Minority Media and Telecommunications Council. Small businesses are now barred from leasing or selling their spectrum for 10 years, up from the current five-year holding period.

The council says the new rules go too far and will discourage lenders and investors from backing small businesses.

Gabelli Reaches Pact With Justice Department Over Cell Licenses (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, June 7, 2006

June 6 (Bloomberg) -- Money manager Mario Gabelli has settled a civil suit alleging he defrauded the U.S. government by using ``sham'' companies to win cellular phone licenses.

The settlement, though not the terms, was announced today at a hearing in Manhattan federal court, Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, said. Garcia's office recently sought permission to join the suit, which was filed in 2001 by attorney Rufus Taylor III under the federal False Claims Act.

Taylor's suit stemmed from Gabelli's role in Federal Communications Commission auctions in the 1990s. The government set aside cellular phone licenses to be sold to small businesses. Gabelli, 63, bankrolled ``sham'' startups that would qualify under the rules to get access to discounts, the suit claims.

Gabelli's publicly traded Gamco Investors Inc., a Rye-based money manager with $27 billion in assets, isn't a defendant in the suit.

DOJ Announces Settlement In Gabelli Case (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

DOJ Announces Settlement in Civil Fraud Case Against Money Manager Gabelli

NEW YORK (AP) -- The Justice Department has agreed to settle a civil fraud lawsuit accusing prominent money manager Mario Gabelli in a scheme to gain unfair advantage in cell-phone spectrum auctions, a government spokeswoman said Tuesday.

The deal -- announced at a hearing Tuesday in U.S. District Court -- would include a $100 million payment from Gabelli to the government, The Wall Street Journal reported on its Web site, citing people briefed on the negotiations.

No information about the terms of the settlement were immediately announced, though they may be released at a hearing June 29, said Heather Tasker, the spokeswoman.

The deal came after the government sought to intervene in a 5-year-old lawsuit brought by private parties alleging Gabelli and others should pay hundreds of millions of dollars in damages for their participation in auctions conducted by the Federal Communications Commission between 1995 and 2000.

The lawsuit, initially filed in Washington, accused Gabelli of rigging the system by creating phony companies which bid for wireless phone licenses at a discount under rules favoring minority and small businesses. He then resold the licenses at a profit, according to the government.

Tim Metz, a spokesman for Lynch Interactive Corp., where Gabelli is board chairman, said he did not know terms of the settlement.

He said he also did not know if the deal would permit Gabelli to continue to participate in auctions.

"I know there's an application pending for the client, Lynch Interactive, to continue to participate in these auctions," Metz said.

At a hearing in federal court several weeks ago, Gabelli lawyer William P. Frank said prosecutors were treating his client unfairly.

Frank did not immediately return a call Tuesday seeking comment.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Use-Of-Deadly-Force Police Shootings Ruled Justifiable (NEWSNET5)

News Net 5, Cleveland, OH, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032623

Special Prosecutor Says Guidelines Followed In 5 Police Shootings

CLEVELAND -- A special prosecutor ruled that five cases of the use of deadly force by Cleveland police officers were justifiable.

The five fatal shootings took place in 2004 and 2005. The city appointed retired Judge Ellen Connally to investigate the cases and to make a decision about whether they were justified.

Connally ruled that all the officers involved in the shooting followed the guidelines outlined for the use of deadly force, and no charges will be filed in any of the cases, NewsChannel5 reported.

Before making her decision, Connally reviewed the evidence, interviewed witnesses, looked over photographs and talked with the coroner.

She ruled four of the shootings justifiable. But one of the shootings included a confrontation between Cleveland police and 14-year-old Brandon McCloud.

McCloud was shot and killed by police in his bedroom in August 2005. Police said McCloud, who was suspected in a string of armed robberies, lunged at them with a knife.

Connally called the shooting tragic. She did not use the term "justifiable," but said that it is within the bounds of the use of deadly force guidelines.

Mayor Frank Jackson promised accountability on the streets, and wants all cases of the use of deadly force to be investigated.

All five cases are still being reviewed by the U.S. Justice Department.

The other cases Connally made rulings on were the March 2004 death of Eren Y. Beyah, the September 2005 death of Larry Renshaw, the October 2005 death of David Crenshaw, and the December 2005 death of Angelo Ferguson.

Gay Marriage Amendment Faces Senate Defeat (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 6, 2006

The constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage is headed toward certain defeat Wednesday despite a fresh appeal for passage by President Bush.

While a majority of Americans oppose gay marriage, an equal majority oppose amending the Constitution to prohibit it, according to a poll this week by ABC News. And, according to one Republican, Americans do not yet buy the warning that traditional marriage is under attack by renegade judges.

"Most Americans are not yet convinced that their elected representatives or the judiciary are likely to expand decisively the definition of marriage to include same sex couples," said Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a possible presidential candidate in 2008. He told the Senate on Tuesday he does not support the amendment.

The measure's looming defeat in the Senate is by no means its last stand, said its supporters.

"Whether it passes or not this time, I do not believe the sponsors are going to fall back and cry about it," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah. "I think they are going to keep bringing it up."

The House plans a redux next month, said Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

"This is an issue that is of significant importance to many Americans," Boehner told reporters. "We have significant numbers of our members who want a vote on this, so we are going to have a vote."

Some of those closely watching the Senate's three-day debate on the proposed amendment are engaging that argument as if the measure stands a chance of passage.

Bush, his popularity sagging and his conservative base dissatisfied with Republicans' efforts on social issues, issued a fresh appeal for passage Tuesday for the third time in as many days.

"The administration believes that the future of marriage in America should be decided through the democratic constitutional amendment process, rather than by the court orders of a few," a White House statement said.

The Vatican also weighed in Tuesday, naming gay marriage as one of the factors threatening the traditional family as never before.

Despite the big names advocating it, the amendment was expected to fail a test vote early Wednesday after three days of floor time in which debate over the definition of marriage touched on issues ranging from child welfare to bigotry.

Democrats, all of whom except Sen. Ben Nelson (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska oppose the amendment, say the debate is a divisive effort to energize social conservatives this election year.

"The Republican leadership is asking us to spend time writing bigotry into the Constitution," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) of Massachusetts, which legalized gay marriage in 2003. "A vote for it is a vote against civil unions, against domestic partnership, against all other efforts for states to treat gays and lesbians fairly under the law."

DOJ_NMG_0032624

More than half of the 100-member Senate is likely to support the amendment on the test vote Wednesday, even if the vote fails to win the required 60 votes, said Hatch.

"Does he really want to suggest that over half of the United States Senate is a crew of bigots?" he fumed.

More than half of Americans, 58 percent, said in an ABC News poll released Monday that same-sex marriages should be illegal. But only 40 percent said they support amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage. A majority said states should make their own laws on gay marriage.

Forty-five of the 50 states have acted to define traditional marriage in ways that would ban same-sex marriage — 19 with constitutional amendments and 26 with statutes.

The amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. To become law, it would need two-thirds support in the Senate and House, and then would have to be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

Marriage Measure Doomed In Senate (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Senators will vote today on a constitutional marriage amendment that doesn't have enough support to pass, and Democrats yesterday tried to force a vote on gas prices to show that other issues are more pressing and that Republicans are playing politics.

"This is not what the American people want to talk about," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said of the marriage amendment, which would define marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

The Nevada Democrat interrupted the marriage debate by trying to call up a bill to prevent price gouging at the gas pumps. He was blocked by Republicans.

Republican leaders and President Bush, facing sagging poll numbers and a restless conservative base, have been pushing hard for the constitutional marriage amendment, which is a top priority for conservative groups. A House vote is expected soon.

Sponsors of the marriage proposal expect about 52 votes today on a motion to cut off debate and force a final vote. The motion would need 60 votes to pass, and the amendment itself would need two-thirds, or 67 votes, to be approved.

"It's not about the preservation of marriage. It's about the preservation of the majority, the Republican majority. That's the 'M' word that's behind this debate," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat. He cited a Gallup Poll in April that found Americans ranked same-sex "marriage" 33rd on a list of most important issues facing the country.

Supporters said it is a fundamental concern when courts are trying to force states to accept same-sex "marriage."

"This issue is going to be defined by either the courts or the legislative bodies, period," said Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican. "We seek to have it defined by legislative bodies."

In response to Democrats' attack, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, issued a statement saying a majority of Americans support traditional marriage and that his party has "a record of accomplishments and meaningful solutions" on the economy, prescription drug coverage and other issues.

Nineteen states have constitutional amendments defining marriage as the union of a man and woman, and 26 states have similar statutes. Nine states face lawsuits challenging their traditional marriage laws. Four of these states have had their laws overturned and are awaiting state Supreme Court decisions.

Polls show a majority of Americans oppose same-sex "marriage." The public is more evenly split on whether a constitutional amendment is the solution. A Gallup Poll released last month shows 50 percent favoring an amendment and 47 percent opposing.

Regardless of the outcome of the vote today, some groups say they will make sure the marriage issue remains a priority in the Senate. The Family Research Council plans to campaign against senators who vote against the proposed amendment. The group has begun attacking Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, and John McCain, Arizona Republican, both of whom are expected to oppose the measure.

For Foes Of Same-Sex Marriage, It's The Thought That Counts (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

There's violence in Iraq, corruption in the House and anxiety in the markets. Somebody needs to create a diversion.

"The gays are aggressive! Gays have called war! Gays are attacking traditional marriage!"

Bishop Harry Jackson was shouting these words outside the Capitol yesterday morning, at a rally for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0032625

"Marriage is under attack!" cried out Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), also at the rally.

"We can have anarchy!" warned Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.).

No doubt Jackson, Allard and Harris are sincere in their views about marriage. But the urgency of their alarm is a bit suspect to anybody with an eye on the electoral calendar.

With President Bush's encouragement, the Senate this week is taking up the marriage amendment even though everybody knows it will be roundly defeated, most likely in a vote today. Proponents are hoping to add perhaps four votes to the 48 they got in 2004 -- at the same time in the previous election cycle. At this pace, it will be 2014 before the amendment has a shot at getting the 67 votes it needs to pass.

What the marriage amendment indisputably does, though, is delight social conservatives, whose turnout in November will be crucial if Republicans are to retain their majorities in the House and Senate. And conservative activists have burst back on the scene to show their gratitude -- even if they know it's a losing cause.

"If we didn't believe in miracles, we wouldn't have spent our vacation money to come here," said Sandra Rodrigues of Utah, who with her family has been standing outside the Russell Senate Office Building all week, shouting at senators and displaying signs urging "Stop Same Sex Marriage: It Endorses Masturbation." "If same-sex marriage is endorsed," she explained, "then you're going to have children think it's just another option to have pleasure."

Rodrigues and family have plenty of allies in their effort to stir up the GOP base. A group backed by the Heritage Foundation and the Family Research Council scheduled an all-day event Monday at the National Press Club featuring Robert Bork and Alan Keyes. Allard has held two events in as many days. And the activists are vying to outdo one another in hysteria.

"This is in many ways the crucial question of our time," Heritage's Matthew Spalding submitted at a Press Club event.

Said Karen England of the Capitol Resource Institute: "We have boys who are going to be in with your girls in the locker room and the restrooms."

Added Exodus International's Alan Chambers, who said he quit homosexuality 14 years ago: "Our children are being raped every day of school by what's being taught. Are you mad? I'm mad. I'm so mad. God have mercy."

Chambers is likely to be angrier still if he checks out the results of last month's Washington Post-ABC News poll. When voters were asked about the most important issue in November's election, they chose the economy, Iraq, immigration, gas prices, terrorism and health care. Same-sex marriage merited only an asterisk, meaning it rated below 0.5 percent of responses.

With that in mind, Senate Democrats have tried furiously to keep the debate on topics more likely to depress Republican turnout in November. Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) brought a list to the floor Monday. "High gas prices, the war in Iraq, the national debt, health care, senior citizens, education, crime, trade policy, stem cell research: Each issue begging for the president's attention, each issue being ignored."

But liberal advocacy groups fell into the conservatives' trap, holding at least four events of their own to treat the doomed amendment as if it were an imminent threat. "It has come to a point in this country," Rabbi Joui Hessel said at a National Press Club event dueling with the conservatives, "where our government is poised to legalize a lesser status to gay and lesbian people."

Poised? It's not the first word that comes to mind when listening to proponents try to explain urgency for a same-sex-marriage ban this week.

When White House press secretary Tony Snow, at Monday's briefing, likened the amendment to efforts to enact civil rights laws, CBS News's Bill Plante challenged him.

"You would equate that with civil rights?" Plante asked.

"No, I'm just saying that I think -- well, I don't know. How do you define civil rights?"

"Up to you," Plante offered.

"Okay," Snow said. "Well, no, it's your question. So I -- if I -- . . . I need to get a more precise definition."

Likewise, Allard held a news conference Monday at which the speakers said they wanted to reduce the "epidemic level of fatherlessness in America."

"How would outlawing gay marriage encourage heterosexual fathers to stick around?" was the first question.

Allard skirted the question by saying that "laws send a message to our children."

The moderator, Matt Daniels of the Alliance for Marriage, tried to find a question on another subject. But when reporters continued to press Allard on the link between same-sex marriage and deadbeat dads, Daniels blurted out: "All right, you know what? We're going to call this press conference to a close."

Same-sex 'Marriage' Splits Black Leaders (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032626

Black pastors and civil rights leaders yesterday held separate rallies on Capitol Hill, staking opposite positions on a constitutional amendment aimed at banning homosexual "marriage."

"This is a moral issue that brings us to the table, and I'm a Democrat. We're not the right-wing Republicans that are just trying to make you do what our political agenda says. We have a legitimate concern about the deterioration of our community," said Bishop Harry Jackson, a pastor from Hope Christian Church in Bowie, who opposes homosexual "marriage."

The Senate is expected to vote on the measure today. The bill is not expected to pass, but opponents of homosexual "marriage" say they will mobilize election votes for or against lawmakers depending on how they vote.

Mr. Jackson's national group, the High Impact Leadership Coalition, organized a morning rally in favor of the amendment, which defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, and Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, the bill's sponsor, spoke to the crowd of about 100 in the park next to the Russell Senate Office Building.

Mr. Jackson and other leaders then descended on the offices of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat; Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat; and Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, to argue their case.

Later in the day, the Human Rights Campaign, the country's top homosexual rights lobbying group, rallied in the same park in opposition to the amendment.

"We must decide if liberty is just for all straight white men, or if in fact God has endowed all persons with the right to enjoy committed, loving relationships," said the Rev. Nathan A. Harris, of Lincoln Congregational Temple, in the District. "As a heterosexual man, as a Christian pastor ... I stand in solidarity with the community of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered persons."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and Rep. John Lewis, Georgia Democrat, spoke to the crowd of about 50.

The Rev. William Owens, chairman of the Memphis, Tenn.-based Coalition of African-American Pastors, said the homosexual rights movement is trying to "hijack civil rights." He said he marched for black civil rights in the 1960s.

"I did not march one step for people of the same sex to marry," Mr. Owens said.

Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, called Mr. Owen's remarks a "somewhat hysterical interpretation of the facts."

"Our fears about cultural changes in this country have been hijacked and portrayed as a legitimate issue of concern," Mr. Henderson said.

Conservative black pastors and civil rights leaders say homosexual "marriage" will further diminish the number of black children without a mom and a dad, in a community that has already felt the negative consequences of single-parent families.

"If we don't do something, we may face an America in 10 years where only one out of every 10 children is born to an intact family. We may face an America where the problems that are in the black community are in every community in the land. We don't want an America like that," Mr. Jackson said.

Liberal black pastors such as Mr. Harris, however, said that "heterosexual marriage has done a good job on its own of falling apart."

Damien, Demons And Dubya (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Washington

As I write this on 6-6-06, with a new Damien demonically wheeling through movie theaters trying to kill his mom in a remake of "The Omen," let us now speak of famous bogeymen.

The Bushes have always been good at using bogeymen to their political advantage.

Lee Atwater, the devilish strategist for Bush Senior, turned an obscure criminal named Willie Horton into the Candyman in 1988, whipping up the fear that if Michael Dukakis were elected, hordes of swarthy skels would be freed on weekend parole and swarm into your neighborhood.

W.'s supporters beat back the McCain threat in the 2000 South Carolina primary by spreading gossip that the Arizona senator had fathered a black baby — a creepy distortion of the fact that he and his wife had adopted a little girl from Bangladesh.

Karl Rove, an Atwater acolyte, had a closetful of bogeymen whisking W. past the finish line in 2004: terrorists who might strike again, gays who wanted to get hitched, stem cell research, Darwin, Dan Rather, and a Swift-boated John Kerry.

W. prefers tactical bêtes noires to real ones. (Hillary followed his lead by joining conservatives to support a constitutional ban on flag burning.)

DOJ_NMG_0032627

The president had a truly terrifying bogeyman in Osama but instead conjured up a fake nuclear villain in Saddam. He has played down bin Laden, first diverting the resources needed to capture him and now diverting the money needed to protect against his likely targets, letting homeland security funds be moved from New York and Washington. (Jon Stewart has said that Omaha got a lot of homeland security money because it was under threat by the "renowned Midwestern terrorist Omaha bin Laden.")

As Mike Crowley of The New Republic notes, the F.B.I. does not even mention 9/11 in its "Ten Most Wanted Fugitives" profile of Osama. The poster, updated in November 2001, says bin Laden is wanted in the bombings of the United States Embassies in Tanzania and Kenya that killed 200 in 1998, and "is a suspect in other terrorist attacks." No word of the nearly 3,000 killed on Sept. 11.

Fearing that their monopoly on Washington power could be coming to an end, with voters grumpy at Republicans over Iraq, gas prices, Medicare, Social Security, corruption, wild spending and general incompetence, Bush strategists have revived the gay marriage Frankenstein to scare the base into turning out for midterms. (That bride of Frankenstein had better be female.)

Same-sex marriage is far less spooky than the 17 severed heads recently found in a village northeast of Baghdad, or the terror suspect accused of conspiring to behead the Canadian prime minister.

W. ignored the gay marriage issue in the 19 months after he used it to help him stay in the White House. To reprise it now, knowing it has no chance of passing, is so transparent that surely even the most blinkered "values" voters see through it.

When pollsters ask Americans their top priorities, gay marriage does not leap onto the list. In a new ABC News poll, only four in 10 surveyed were in favor of rewriting the Constitution.

Even as W. gave a speech here promoting a constitutional amendment designed to demonize and discriminate against a group of Americans who have done nothing wrong, his heart did not seem in it. A Democratic strategist noted on CNN that the president looked as cowed as "a long-tailed cat in a room full of rocking chairs."

Wrestling with Iraq and Iran have worn down W., and he knows, as we do, that a couple of middle-aged guys who want to tie the knot in Provincetown is not the worst threat America faces.

With our marines needing refresher courses in "core values" and with Dick Cheney promoting values like torture, government snooping and pre-emptive war, it rings hollow to opportunistically proselytize on family values. (Mary Cheney, the gay daughter of the vice president, told interviewers recently that her father opposed the marriage amendment.)

As a Times reader who sometimes e-mails me put it: "The 'values' voters turn out to be opinion voters. They believe that God hates homosexuals, that superstition trumps science every time, that all those foreigners ought to be sent back where they came from, and that all government programs are wasteful and immoral, except, of course, for the government programs which benefit them. Those are opinions, not values, and willfully ignorant opinions at that."

I know Republicans are desperate. But does it make sense to use gay love to hatemonger here when we have so much real hate coming at us from abroad?

Justice Kennedy's Culture War (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The Supreme Court is busy this week, but Justice Anthony Kennedy should take a moment to tune into the Senate debate on gay marriage. As the man who enabled this latest front in the culture wars, it's the least he can do.

That's the most efficient way to think about the Senate debate this week on the Marriage Protection Amendment, which would create a national definition of marriage as a "union of a man and a woman." We remain opposed to federal interference in this issue, believing that issues of family life and law are best settled in state legislatures. Yet given the way activist courts have turned gay marriage into a national issue, it's no surprise that Congress joined the fray.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist knows he's unlikely to get many more than the 48 votes he got the last time he brought up this amendment, in 2004. Constitutional amendments require a two-thirds majority, and only one Democrat, Nebraska's Ben Nelson, is publicly on board. So some of this is about rallying a demoralized conservative base.

But the amendment vote can't be understood outside of the anxiety created by activist courts. Justice Kennedy wrote the majority opinion in the 2003 Lawrence case that banned state anti-sodomy laws. So sweeping was his "privacy right" language that it took only a few months for the Massachusetts Supreme Court to use Lawrence to justify its decision to impose a right to gay marriage there. Politicians in New York and San Francisco began issuing gay marriage licenses, never mind state law.

So here we go again with another values issue about to become an endlessly polarizing national debate. Beltway politicians can posture knowing nothing much will change. This is the history of abortion since Roe v. Wade, with both sides at the same barricades 30 years on. The Founders left such thorny social issues to the states precisely to allow the democratic give and take that can reach a rough consensus, as well as adjust as social mores change.

DOJ_NMG_0032628

That's what the states have been doing in recent years. Some 19 states now have constitutional amendments protecting "traditional" marriage; another 26 have statutes doing the same. Alabama voters yesterday endorsed such an amendment, and six more states will have the question on November ballots.

States have also devised a range of policies for civil partnerships or other legal rights for gay couples. These innovations reflect the reality that most Americans oppose extending the term "marriage" to gays but are open to other legal arrangements. Colorado voters may face ballot initiatives this fall dealing with both a definition of marriage and domestic partnership rights.

Supporters of the national ban say an amendment is necessary because willful courts won't honor those voter verdicts. They have a point. A federal court struck down Nebraska's ban on gay marriage last year even though 70% of the state's residents voted for it. Bans have been overturned in Washington, California, Maryland and New York.

But it's far from clear that a Constitutional amendment is necessary to stop this just now. Congress passed the Defense of Marriage Act in the 1990s, and sooner or later the Supreme Court will decide if this clashes with the Constitution's "full faith and credit" clause that applies one state's laws to the other 49 (i.e., easy Nevada divorce). If the High Court overturns the Defense of Marriage Act, there'd be a much stronger case for something as rare, and politically difficult, as passing a Constitutional amendment. Meantime, this is another argument for confirming President Bush's judicial nominees (see below).

As for liberals, they might consider that their best chance to change minds is through open state debate, not coercive courts. Polls show Americans are becoming more comfortable with civil unions and other gay rights. In fact, the best thing gay activists could do for themselves at the federal level would be to support repeal of the death tax, since under current law gay couples often lack inheritance rights. That would accomplish more than anything that will emerge from this week's political spectacle over amending the Constitution.

Verizon Bias Suit Deal Sets Record (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination.

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits.

The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District.

Nynex and Bell Atlantic were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave.

The total compensation paid thus far is more than $25.3 million. The EEOC told a U.S. District Court in New York yesterday that it projected that an additional $23.6 million would be paid in future benefits. The announcement came after years of calculating which women were denied benefits when on leave.

"This comes out of a different era," said Eric Rabe, a Verizon spokesman. "The people who were here then by and large don't work for the company anymore. We think our record today is exemplary, and this was not an admission of having done anything wrong. It is simply a matter of trying to get this behind us to move on."

The suit alleged that the predecessor companies violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963 by denying women service credits for leaves of absence taken between July 1965 and April 1979. The companies also denied pension credits for child-care leaves of absence until December 1983.

Pregnancy discrimination claims filed with the EEOC rose by 31 percent from 1992 to 2005, to 4,449 from 3,385. Some of that increase reflects a growing number of women working during and after their pregnancies, but not all of it. In the same period, the percentage of working women with children younger than 18 rose by about 5 percent.

"There really remain tremendous issues concerning pregnancy discrimination in the workplace," said Elizabeth Grossman, regional attorney with the EEOC in New York. "More and more women are continuing to go forward to assert their rights in a way past generations were not. Some employers are getting educated and changing practices, but many are not."

Grossman's office last year sued and won a settlement for a waitress who was removed from a managerial career track, denied work assignments and told to "consider her options" after she revealed she was pregnant. Ultimately, she was fired. The woman received $145,000 in a pregnancy discrimination settlement with her former employer. The same office last month also sued Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. on behalf of a pregnant employee at a Bridgewater, N.J., store who says she was denied modified work assignments that were given to other employees with temporary disabilities.

DOJ_NMG_0032629

The EEOC was joined in filing the class-action lawsuit against the phone companies by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Communications Workers of America, unions representing Verizon workers. "This case represents an important victory for working women who should not have had to sacrifice their pension benefits because they had children," Christopher M. Shelton, a CWA vice president, said in a statement.

Louisiana Governor Plans To Sign Anti-Abortion Law (NYT)

By Jeremy Alford

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., June 6 — Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's office said Tuesday that she would shortly sign into law a strict ban on abortion that would permit abortion only in the case where a woman's life was threatened by pregnancy.

The bill, approved by both houses of the Legislature and sent to the governor on Monday, would go into effect only if the United States Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision establishing a constitutional right to abortion, and allowed states to criminalize abortion.

In March, South Dakota enacted a law criminalizing abortion, hoping to create a case that would lead the Supreme Court to overturn Roe. Eleven other states are considering similar measures. Six other states have bans, similar to the Louisiana bill, that would be put into effect by the end of Roe.

A sponsor of the Louisiana bill, Senator Ben Nevers, Democrat of Bogalusa, said he had led the effort because the Supreme Court had grown more conservative and the time was ripe for change.

"I had a strong belief that we could finally protect the innocent life of an unborn child," Mr. Nevers said. "This is about the U.S. Constitution granting every person the right to life."

Jacqueline Payne, assistant director of government relations for Planned Parenthood, a nationwide provider of abortion services, said the trigger provision allowed the Legislature and Ms. Blanco to inflict policy on future generations they had no authority to represent, since Roe could take several years to overturn, if ever.

"We think Louisiana is hiding behind South Dakota, which took more of a direct affront," Ms. Payne said.

Roderick K. Hawkins, deputy press secretary to the governor, said that the abortion bill had not yet reached Ms. Blanco, but that she planned to sign it as soon as possible.

Although Ms. Blanco, a Democrat, has supported exceptions for rape and incest in the past, Mr. Hawkins said she found solace in the bill's "safety measures" that protect the life of the pregnant woman.

"The governor has always been a pro-life person," Mr. Hawkins said, "and this fits into her beliefs of supporting life and being anti-abortion. Plus, this had overwhelming bipartisan support of the Legislature."

If signed by the governor, Louisiana's measure would allow the prosecution of any person who performed or aided in an abortion. The penalties include up to 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $100,000.

Transsexual Discrimination Suit Enters Discovery Phase (RC)

By John McArdle

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

A full year after filing a discrimination lawsuit against the Library of Congress, Diane Schroer, who is preparing for surgery to complete her transition as a male-to-female transsexual, has only now seen her civil rights case move into the discovery phase.

But in the 12 months since the case was brought, Schroer's suit already has forced the U.S. District Court to take a hard look at how sexual discrimination laws apply to the Congressional workplace.

While lawyers for Schroer are preparing this week to serve the LOC with its first document requests and interogitories, lawyers with the U.S. Attorney's office, which is representing the Library, have about two weeks left to decide whether to appeal a decision by U.S. District Judge James Robertson denying their initial request to dismiss the case.

"It is unfortunate that litigation moves as slowly as it does, and it's unfortunate that it took Judge Robertson a long time to rule on the motion to dismiss," Arthur Spitzer, a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union who is representing Schroer, said this week. "On the other hand it was clear from his opinion that he had done a lot of research and a lot of thinking about the issue, and we were obviously pleased with his opinion."

Born David John, Schroer is a 25-year Army veteran who filed suit against the LOC on June 2, 2005, after being rejected for a position as a terrorism and international crime research analyst with the Congressional Research Service, a division of the LOC, because she was beginning the transition process to become Diane. She expects to complete the transition through surgery later this year.

DOJ_NMG_0032630

Schroer brought the case under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex and national origin. But lawyers for the Library argued in their response last fall that transsexual individuals are not considered members "of a 'protected class' as required by Title VII" and thus the case should be dismissed.

Lawyers for the LOC have argued in court filings that applying Title VII to transsexuals would create an improper precedent in the workplace.

"The term 'sex,' as used in Title VII, prohibits discrimination based on the biological state of a male or female," the U.S. Attorney's office argued in its response last fall. "District Courts in this Circuit, as well as in many other circuits, have never held that transsexuals are a protected group under Title VII."

In late March, Robertson denied the LOC's dismissal request, noting in his opinion that "the failure of numerous attempts to broaden Title VII to cover sexual orientation says nothing about Title VII's relationship to sexual identity. ... There are facts that Schroer could prove which would support her claim that the Library refused to hire her solely because of her sexual identity, and that in so doing, the Library discriminated against her 'because of ... sex.'"

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office, said this week that "we are in the process of deciding whether or not to seek to have the case certified to the Court of Appeals for a decision" and that "if we were going to seek an appeal we have to notify Judge Robertson by the 19th of June."

But, Phillips said, "I can't and won't get into what the grounds would be assuming we do seek an appeal."

Spitzer, though, was willing to speculate on what argument the U.S. Attorney's office might use: "Their view is simply that Congress did not intend to cover that back in 1964 when they prohibited discrimination based on sex. That's their basic argument."

However, Spitzer said, "The odds are that there is not going to be an immediate appeal either because the government doesn't ask for it or because Judge Robertson doesn't give them permission or because the Court of Appeals doesn't give them permission. And if there isn't an appeal then the discovery should move forward promptly and hopefully it won't be too many months until we are in a position either to file motions for summary judgment or to schedule a trial."

When Schroer initially interviewed for the job at CRS in October 2004, the name on her application was David J. Schroer and she dressed in traditionally masculine attire. Schroer — a retired colonel who served in the Army Rangers, earned several medals for distinguished service and fought in the war on terror as a member of the Special Operations Command — claims she was told she was the most qualified candidate for the analyst position. She argues that by December of that year the Library had offered her the job and was happy to employ her as a man.

However, she claims, Library officials changed their mind when Schroer informed them that she was under a doctor's care for gender dysphoria and that, in accordance with her doctor's instructions, she would begin using a feminine name and presenting a traditional female appearance by the time she started work as a research analyst.

Senate To Consider Letting Hawaiians Pursue Sovereignty (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Hawaii Sen. Daniel K. Akaka thinks Hawaiians should be allowed to govern themselves as Native Americans and Alaskans do, and after seven years of pushing a bill to start the process, the Senate is expected to take it up this week.

Mr. Akaka says the bill is a way to give "indigenous" Hawaiians a sense of pride and a chance for sovereignty for the first time since 1893, when Queen Liliuokalani was deposed and lands were illegally seized by U.S. Marines and a cadre of sugar-plantation businessmen.

"For the first time, if it passes, Hawaiians will have parity and be able to form a government entity to address their concerns, since the overthrow," Mr. Akaka said.

Republican senators annually have blocked the legislation, saying it would violate the Constitution by establishing a sovereign race-based government. It is only coming up now through a deal worked out between Democratic and Republican leaders to move other bills.

Opponents, including many native Hawaiians, say the bill opens up a "Pandora's box" of new race classifications and called the bill ambiguous as to what benefits it will bring.

The bill calls for an Office of Native Hawaiian Relations in the Department of the Interior, and a Native Hawaiian Interagency Coordinating Group to administer programs, a commission that would certify who are indigenous Hawaiians, and provides a process of reorganization of the Native Hawaiian governing entity.

"The bill will not authorize gaming in Hawaii. The bill will not allow private lands to be taken. The bill will not create a reservation in Hawaii," Mr. Akaka said.

DOJ_NMG_0032631

The legislation is supported by both Republican and Democratic senators, primarily those from states with substantial Native American and Eskimo populations, as well as the American Bar Association and Alaska Federation of Natives.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, who has kept the bill from coming to the floor, said the creation of a native Hawaiian government -- composed only of redefined natives and whose members can only be voted in by native Hawaiians -- could divide Hawaii's people.

"Unlike reservation Indians, Native Hawaiians do not live in one area of the State that is set aside for Indians; they live in the same cities and neighborhoods and on the same streets, as other Hawaiians do," Mr. Kyl said.

Reservation Indian tribes have the power to tax, regulate and make laws for members. There are an estimated 400,000 Native Hawaiians living throughout the United States.

Native Hawaiians also say it "too narrowly" redefines who is indigenous.

"It is only for people of Native Hawaiian blood," said 'Ehu Kekahu Cardwell, director of the Koani Foundation, a grass-roots group dedicated to restoring the Hawaiian nation.

"We want it to be for any descendants of kingdom nationals who were loyal to the queen during the time she was deposed. We want everyone to be able to have a say in how this turns out," Mr. Cardwell said.

Leon Siu, a Chinese Hawaiian lobbying against the bill on Capitol Hill, said it has already caused division in Hawaii.

"We reject a race issue being brought into our community; the bill will change the definition of who we are," he said. "Native Hawaiian is not a pure bloodline and ... this bill will introduce a new concept of racial apartheid."

Mr. Siu's father fled China in search of a better life and settled in Hawaii 70 years ago, as did hundreds of thousands of foreign nationals from America, Japan, China, Vietnam, and the Philippines who became Hawaiian citizens.

The Hawaiian monarchy historically never kept anyone from participating in its government structure and did not have a race-specific citizenship definition.

One of the most salient points in the debate will be a history lesson on how Hawaii became a U.S. territory and a state, which Native Hawaiians say was an "illegal annexation."

Queen Liliuokalani, the last Hawaiian monarch, was deposed in 1893 by a collection of sugar exporters doing business on the island with the complicity of the U.S. government.

Hawaii became a U.S. territory under a congressional resolution passed in the late 1890s, but the Constitution states that the U.S. can only acquire land held by sovereign foreign nations through a formal treaty.

The treaty authorized by the Safety Commission -- an illegitimate government established by the sugar plantation owners -- failed in Congress after 38,000 of the 40,000 natives living on the island in 1897 petitioned the Congress to reject it.

Congress formally acknowledged that the coup was unlawful in an apology resolution in 1993.

"This is just the next step in that process of acknowledging the wrong committed against the Native Hawaiian people and recognize them as a sovereign entity," said Donalyn Dela Cruz, spokeswoman for Mr. Akaka.

A Chance For Justice In Hawaii (NYT)

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

For Native Hawaiians, the last two centuries have been a struggle against extinction. Not long after Captain Cook sailed up in 1778, disease, poverty and political and economic exploitation began pushing their culture toward the vanishing point. One harsh milestone came in 1893, when American and European businessmen backed by United States marines overthrew the Hawaiian kingdom. Annexation by the United States quickly followed.

Hawaii has since thrived as a multiracial society, and its native language and arts have undergone a rebirth in the last generation or two. But if there is a common theme in this resurgent culture, it is an abiding sense of loss. The wrongs done to Native Hawaiians are a wound that never healed.

A tiny minority in the islands dreams, madly, of correcting this injustice by becoming an independent country. But Hawaii's broad mainstream — its Legislature, its current governor and her three living predecessors, its United States senators and two House members, and a solid majority of residents — has lined up behind something far more sensible.

It's a bill sponsored by Senator Daniel Akaka that would extend federal recognition to Native Hawaiians as indigenous people. It would create a governing body for the estimated 400,000 Native Hawaiians that would negotiate with the state and federal governments over land and other resources.

After languishing for years, the bill is heading for a Senate vote. This has prompted outraged editorials and op-ed articles warning that a Pacific paradise will become a balkanized banana republic.

Those worries are misplaced. The bill's central aim is protecting money and resources — inoculating programs for Native Hawaiians from race-based legal challenges. It is based on the entirely defensible conviction that Native Hawaiians — who make up 20 percent of the state's population but are disproportionately poor, sick, homeless and incarcerated — have a distinct identity and deserve the same rights as tribal governments on the mainland.

DOJ_NMG_0032632

The Akaka bill does not supersede the Constitution or permit Zimbabwe-style land grabs. It explicitly forbids casinos, a touchy subject in Hawaii. Any changes a Hawaiian government seeks would have to be negotiated with state or federal authorities. As has always been the case on those eight little islands, everyone will have to find a way to get along.

D.C. Mayor Fires Director Of Agency For The Disabled (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Karylyn Barker

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams fired the director of the District agency that cares for the mentally retarded yesterday in hopes of averting a court takeover of the troubled bureaucracy, which is facing fresh allegations of abuse and neglect in city-funded group homes.

After barely a year on the job, Marsha H. Thompson was dismissed as administrator of the city's Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities Administration. Williams said it was the first firing of an agency head in years.

In her place, Williams appointed Kathy Elmore Sawyer, retired commissioner of Alabama's mental health department and an experienced advocate for the mentally disabled. Sawyer now serves as a consultant to the D.C. agency. She will work under a six-month contract that ends shortly before Williams (D) leaves office in January.

During a news conference, Williams introduced Sawyer as "a nationally recognized expert who I believe can make an immediate impact on the staff, on the operations, on the mission and strategy of this important agency. . . . We believe she is the ideal, really the perfect person to get this job done."

Williams said he hopes Sawyer's appointment "can reassure the court and the lawyers for our clients that receivership is not the right choice at this time."

Several advocates called Sawyer a respected administrator with a sterling reputation. But the move will not stave off a push to have a receiver take control of the agency, the target of a 1976 class action lawsuit over care of the mentally disabled. University Legal Services, a group representing the plaintiffs, recently asked a federal judge to appoint a receiver, and a hearing is set for June 29.

"It isn't as simple as shuffling people and removing an administrator to fix 30 years of problems," said Sandy Bernstein, legal director of University Legal Services. The agency has had nine administrators in seven years, she said. Sawyer "will be the 10th."

A court takeover of the mental retardation agency would mark a major embarrassment for Williams during his final year in office. When he became mayor in 1999, five agencies were in receivership, including those responsible for housing, child welfare and mental health. Williams made it a priority to regain control, doing so by 2002. The District has not lost control of any city function during his administration.

Problems at the mental retardation agency -- which employs more than 200 people to oversee 90 residential and day program contractors, as well as 360 group homes -- have persisted.

Two weeks ago, as plaintiffs requested a receiver, the U.S. Justice Department urged the judge to hold the District in contempt of court because, it said, the city had not met promises to improve health care and other services at group homes and because of 14 "preventable and questionable" deaths since January 2003. The papers gave vivid and startling details about the extent of the abuse, which ranged from severe scaldings to fatal starvation.

In its court filing, the Justice Department criticized Williams, saying he has known about problems for more than 10 years, dating to his tenure as the city's chief financial officer.

Meanwhile, agency officials reluctantly revealed to council members that they had run out of money to pay the private providers who run the city's network of group homes. Last week, the mayor asked the council to approve an additional $18 million for the fiscal year that ends in September.

Amid demands for Thompson's firing from Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), the chairman of the council committee that oversees the agency, Deputy Mayor Brenda Donald Walker, said she approached Sawyer about two weeks ago and asked her to expand her role with the city.

"There was a culmination of issues that signaled serious management deficiencies that could not be overcome," Walker said, adding that her "knees are scarred not just from praying but from begging" a reluctant Sawyer to take the job.

Yesterday, Fenty and council member Vincent C. Gray (D-Ward 7) joined Williams at the news conference to praise the mayor's action and welcome Sawyer to the city.

Sawyer, of Montgomery, Ala., retired last year as commissioner of the Alabama Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation. During her first year in office, she negotiated the settlement of a 33-year-old lawsuit that established the right of the mentally ill to leave institutions and receive treatment in less-restrictive settings. She has since served as a consultant to several state agencies and was recommended to the District by a court-appointed special master.

DOJ_NMG_0032633

She described herself as "an advocate first" and promised to restructure the agency and get a handle on its budget. She starts work June 19. Other details of her contract are being finalized.

Thompson, whom Williams named interim administrator in April 2005, was informed of her dismissal early yesterday. Williams had given her the job outright six months ago, even after a judge warned that people were dying because of poor care in group homes.

Thompson said she expected the mayor to make changes in light of the receivership request, "but I didn't know I was going to get fired." She said that no major progress can take place until the agency has sufficient staff and authority, including the ability to secure federal Medicaid funding for expensive services paid for with local tax money.

Tina Campanella, executive director of Quality Trust for Individuals With Disabilities Inc., an advocacy group, said Sawyer has the background and experience for the job -- but warned that "the fix is bigger than the administrator."

"It's sad we're going to go through another change because this creates a disruption of services and support for people with disabilities," Campanella said.

Comes Now No. 19 (WP)

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

MARSHA H. Thompson, head of the city's Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities Administration (MRDDA), told The Post last month that by her count, she was the agency's 17th or 18th administrator in the past dozen years. Yesterday, having lasted about a year, her tenure came to an abrupt halt with Mayor Anthony A. Williams's announcement that he has appointed Kathy Elmore Sawyer to serve as the MRDDA's acting administrator. By his own admission, the mayor yanked Ms. Thompson and called in Ms. Sawyer because the city faces the prospect of a U.S. District Court judge placing the beleaguered agency in receivership. As he said in a statement, "My hope is that Ms. Sawyer will be able to provide immediate stability to MRDDA and can reassure the court and the lawyers for our clients that receivership is not the right choice at this time."

If the mayor is seeking immediate stability in that agency through the appointment of one individual, albeit a highly qualified professional, his search will more than likely be in vain. The problem at the MRDDA is not that it hasn't been led by a reformer with dedication, compassion and a vision. The problem rests below the agency head. It can be found within the agency and the group homes it oversees. Those places have more than their share of unqualified workers. They should be nowhere near vulnerable people who are mentally retarded or have developmental disabilities. Unless the mayor has the fortitude and is willing to wade in with the MRDDA administrator and stand down the bureaucracy and special interests, i.e., contractors; unless he is prepared to rid the payroll of incompetents, and clean house from top to bottom, then director No. 19 will soon give way to Nos. 20 and 21 and 29.

Look at the record: former group home employees prosecuted for physical and sexual abuse of MRDDA clients; benchmarks in work plans negotiated with the court unmet on every count; vulnerable clients abused and dying in MRDDA's care; the agency's budget overspent by more than $18 million; a new petition pending for federal court receivership. Cleaning up that mess requires more than hiring an outsider with a good reputation. It needs the backing of a mayor who places reform of a critical and much-neglected agency ahead of a trip to South Korea, where Mr. Williams is heading today. It needs a mayor as dedicated to improving the agency as he is to building a new baseball stadium or traveling the globe. Ms. Sawyer and, more to the point, the people in her care deserve no less. The court, in deciding on receivership, should seek the same assurance.

A Well Of Smiths And Xias (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Muhammad Waqar, Avi Wolfman-Arent, Yiran Xia, Victoria Sandoval, Jacqueline Orellana-Flores, Elizabeth Packer, Ramona Singh, Anuja Shah, Mayra Ramos, Emily-Kate Hannapel, Natasha Perez, Samir Paul, Ekta Taneja, Linden Vongsathorn, Michael Tsai, Nardos Teklebrahan, Matiwos Wondwosen ...

I went to a high school graduation Monday and a United Nations meeting broke out.

The commencement was my daughter Natalie's, the high school was Montgomery Blair in Silver Spring, Md. There were some 700 kids receiving their diplomas, and as I sat there for two hours listening to each one's name pronounced, I became both fascinated and touched by the stunning diversity — race, religion, ethnicity — of the graduating class. I knew my daughter's school was diverse, but I had no idea it was this diverse.

The names above, which I just pulled from the graduation book, were typical of her entire class, which included exactly five people named "Smith." In my high school in Minnesota it seemed like there were only five people not named "Smith."

My daughter told me that the names in her class can be so difficult to pronounce that for graduation the school had all the students write their names phonetically on a card so the announcer would not mangle them in front of family and friends.

There is a lot to be worried about in America today: a war in Iraq that is getting worse not better, an administration whose fiscal irresponsibility we will be paying for for a long time, an education system that is not producing enough young Americans skilled in math and science, and inner cities where way too many black males are failing. We must work harder and get smarter if we want to maintain our standard of living.

But if there is one reason to still be optimistic about America it is represented by the stunning diversity of the Montgomery Blair class of 2006. America is still the world's greatest human magnet. We are not the only country that embraces diversity, but there is something about our free society and free market that still attracts people like no other. Our greatest asset is our ability to still cream off not only the first-round intellectual draft choices from around the world but the low-skilled-high-aspiring ones as well, and that is the main reason that I am not yet ready to cede the 21st century to China. Our Chinese will still beat their Chinese.

This influx of brainy and brawny immigrants is our oil well — one that never runs dry. It is an endless source of renewable human energy and creativity. Congress ought to stop debating gay marriage and finally give us a framework to maintain a free flow of legal immigration.

What is so striking about Blair is that it is just a neighborhood public high school. It was not designed to be diverse. Yes, it has some magnet programs, but for the most part it just reflects its surroundings — about one-third black, one-third Hispanic and one-third Noah's Ark of everyone else.

As I mingled with the other parents afterward, waiting for our kids to emerge from the ceremony, I found myself at one point surrounded by families in which no one was speaking English.

The only familiar voice that came through the din was one that made me laugh — an African-American mom, gripping her child's diploma, saying: "This diploma is mine! I'm keeping this!" She said she had worked as hard as her kid for this day. Bless her heart, as I am sure she spoke for many parents.

It is hard to watch a graduation like this and not think about our enemies in Iraq and Afghanistan — the Taliban, Islamo-totalitarians like bin Laden and Zarqawi, and the retrograde regimes that support them. Their whole mind-set is about how to purify their world from "the other," from diversity, from "infidels." With enough brutality, they may win in Iraq. I still hope not.

But they will never win the future — because as soon as their oil wells run dry, their societies will be as barren, bland and unproductive as their deserts.

Our oil wells, by contrast, will still be pumping. They're right there, hiding in plain sight, in the Blair commencement book:

Yueyang Li, Kenia Lopez-Reyes, Lucy Fromyer, Raya Steinberg, Zahra Gordon, Sreva Ghosh, Juan-Jesus Louis, Yendil Furcal, Yenusa Eke, Sofonias Frezghi, Yohanes Dejen, Edra Comegys-Brisbane, Yoel Castillio-Ortiz, Elijah Zuares, Placido Zelaya, Mimi Zou. And Jessica Smith.

Georgia Has Changed For The Better, And The Voting Rights Act Should Too (HILL)

By Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.)

The Hill, June 7, 2006

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 worked. It changed Georgia dramatically for the better.

Now, as Congress considers a 25-year extension of the law, we need to modernize the Voting Rights Act to reflect the reality of today — a reality strongly shaped by the successes of the original legislation.

In 1965, the Voting Rights Act overturned the institutionalized discrimination embedded in the laws of Georgia and other Southern states. The law unshackled a significant portion of our state's residents and launched them into the political process by guaranteeing their right to vote. As a result, Georgia today represents a model of voter equality for states with diverse populations.

In fact, an academic study documents that black Georgians vote at higher rates than white Georgians. There are nine black statewide elected officials — most of whom defeated white opponents — including our state attorney general, the labor commissioner and three state Supreme Court justices, one of whom is chief justice. Black representation in statewide offices almost exactly parallels their proportion in the state's population. Four of our state's 13 members of the U.S. House are African-Americans — two of whom represent majority-white districts. It would be difficult to find a state with a more diverse group of elected officials.

Georgia is home to some of the most prosperous majority black communities in the United States. Today, our nation's best and brightest African-Americans flock to Georgia not for Freedom Rides but for great opportunities and a high quality of life.

Yet, despite Georgia's revolutionary strides in voter equality, the Voting Rights Act still treats Georgia as if it's a backward society governed by the laws of Jim Crow.

DOJ_NMG_0032635

Let me explain. The original Voting Rights Act created a formula to determine which states were denying minority citizens their right to vote. Congress applied the formula to the 1964 election turnout numbers, and Georgia was one of several states that essentially failed the test. The law allowed the federal government to approve or disapprove all election-law changes, from redistricting to moving voting precincts, in those states.

Since then, Congress has renewed the Voting Rights Act several times without looking at changes in the states affected by the law.

Renewing the law as it is would keep Georgia in the penalty box for 25 more years. It doesn't make sense to subjugate Georgia to the whims of federal bureaucrats until 2031 based on the turnout of an election featuring Barry Goldwater and Lyndon Johnson.

If Georgia's sins can never be forgiven, shouldn't there be an Accused Witch Protection Act that applies only to Massachusetts? Shouldn't our foreign policy treat South Africa as if it's still governed by a racist apartheid regime?

It's not simply a matter of fairness and common sense. There's a legal issue too. The Supreme Court ruled in 1966 that singling out states in the Voting Rights Act was constitutional only because it was narrowly tailored to address a specific problem and "temporary." We're already well past "temporary."

I do think there's a solution that will bring consensus. I'm proposing that Congress modernize the Voting Rights Act by applying the formula to the 2004 election. That way federal oversight would no longer apply to states that have corrected past problems. It would also allow the federal government to expand oversight to states where new problems have developed.

The Voting Rights Act has served our nation well. We dishonor the accomplishments of the law if we pretend nothing's changed since 1965.

Westmoreland represents Georgia's 8th Congressional District.

Block The Vote, Ohio Remix (NYT)

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

If there was ever a sign of a ruling party in trouble, it is a game plan that calls for trying to win by discouraging voting.

The latest sign that Republicans have an election-year strategy to shut down voter registration drives comes from Ohio. As the state gears up for a very competitive election season this fall, its secretary of state, J. Kenneth Blackwell, has put in place "emergency" regulations that could hit voter registration workers with criminal penalties for perfectly legitimate registration practices. The rules are so draconian they could shut down registration drives in Ohio.

Mr. Blackwell, who also happens to be the Republican candidate for governor this year, has a history of this sort of behavior. In 2004, he instructed county boards of elections to reject any registrations on paper of less than 80-pound stock — about the thickness of a postcard. His order was almost certainly illegal, and he retracted it after he came under intense criticism. It was, however, in place long enough to get some registrations tossed out.

This year, Mr. Blackwell's office has issued rules and materials that appear to require that paid registration workers, and perhaps even volunteers, personally take the forms they collect to an election office. Organizations that run registration drives generally have the people who register voters bring the forms back to supervisors, who can then review them for errors. Under Mr. Blackwell's edict, everyone involved could be committing a crime. Mr. Blackwell's rules also appear to prohibit people who register voters from sending the forms in by mail. That rule itself may violate federal elections law.

Mr. Blackwell's rules are interpretations of a law the Republican-controlled Ohio Legislature passed recently. Another of the nation's most famous swing states, Florida, has been the scene of similar consternation and confusion since it recently enacted a law that is so harsh that the Florida League of Women Voters announced that it was stopping all voter registration efforts for the first time in 67 years.

Florida's Legislature, like Ohio's, is controlled by Republicans. Throughout American history both parties have shown a willingness to try to use election law to get results they might otherwise not win at the polls. But right now it is clearly the Republicans who believe they have an interest in keeping the voter base small. Mr. Blackwell and other politicians who insist on making it harder to vote never say, of course, that they are worried that get-out-the-vote drives will bring too many poor and minority voters into the system. They say that they want to reduce fraud. However, there is virtually no evidence that registration drives are leading to fraud at the polls.

But there is one clear way that Ohio's election system is corrupt. Decisions about who can vote are being made by a candidate for governor. Mr. Blackwell should hand over responsibility for elections to a decision maker whose only loyalty is to the voters and the law.

DOJ_NMG_0032636

ANTITRUST:

A.C.L.U. Raises Surveillance As Issue In Big Phone Merger (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union asked the Federal Communications Commission yesterday to withhold approval of AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth until it reviews allegations that the companies gave customer records to the government without warrants.

In its filing, the A.C.L.U. cited a provision in the Telecommunications Act that says that in considering a merger, the commission must "weigh the public-interest harms of the proposed transaction against the potential public-interest benefits."

The group said the F.C.C. should determine if AT&T and BellSouth handed over phone records to the National Security Agency's surveillance program and, if so, whether that violated any privacy laws.

The A.C.L.U. action comes after USA Today reported last month that AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon provided the agency with call records on millions of Americans in surveillance done after the Sept. 11 attacks.

"The F.C.C. is in a position to determine whether the USA Today story is true and can bring the companies to the table and figure out whether they are providing customer information to the N.S.A. and what is the lawful authority for doing so," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty project at the A.C.L.U.

Kevin J. Martin, the F.C.C. chairman, said last month that the commission could not investigate reports of the companies' cooperation with the security agency because the agency's activities were classified.

Mr. Martin made the statement in response to a letter from Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, the ranking minority member of the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet. At that time, however, the matter was not linked to AT&T's deal for BellSouth, which was announced in March.

Tamara Lipper, an F.C.C. spokeswoman, declined to comment on the filing.

Selim Bingol, an AT&T spokesman, said, "We don't have anything to say without having seen the paperwork." He also said, "We are vigorous protectors of our customers' privacy and when we're asked to help law enforcement agencies, we do so strictly within the law."

BellSouth has denied providing phone records to the security agency and said the A.C.L.U.'s request did not affect the company. "The claims made in the USA Today story about BellSouth are false, so any assertions by the A.C.L.U. would be moot for BellSouth," said Jeff Battcher, a company spokesman.

In its letter to the commission, the A.C.L.U. noted that BellSouth had denied participating in the surveillance program. But it voiced concern about what would happen if the company linked up to AT&T.

"It would be a cruel irony if BellSouth had not participated in the program but as a result of this merger, BellSouth customers became unwilling surveillance targets," it said.

Telecom Firms Ask FCC To Stop AT&T-BellSouth Merger (SANANTBIZ)

San Antonio Business Journal, June 7, 2006

A group of seven telecommunications companies have filed comments with the Federal Communications Commission asking regulators to block the planned $67 billion merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp.

San Antonio-based AT&T (NYSE: T) needs approvals from 18 states, the U.S. Justice Department and the FCC in order to proceed with the merger -- which could close by the end of the year. The merger already has been approved in eight states and two foreign countries.

The group of companies claim the AT&T-BellSouth merger will only create a dominant player that will be able to thwart competition through its increased control over local networks and other communications services.

Through its acquisition of Atlanta-based BellSouth (NYSE: BLS), AT&T -- already the nation's largest provider of local voice, long-distance and broadband DSL services -- will only further move the company toward monopoly status, the companies claim.

The companies that are asking the FCC to block the merger are Cbeyond Communications in Atlanta (NASDAQ: CBEY); Grande Communications in San Marcos; NuVox Communications in Greenville, S.C.; Supra Telecom in Orlando; Talk America (NASDAQ: TALK) in New Hope, Pa.; XO Communications (OTCBB: XOHO) in Reston, Va. and Xspedius Communications LLC in O'Fallon, Mo.

They say the AT&T-BellSouth merger would extend the company's footprint to 22 states and further cement its standing as the nation's largest wireless provider by controlling all the stock of Cingular Wireless.

DOJ_NMG_0032637

AT&T already is the incumbent local phone company in 13 states. BellSouth's territory extends to nine states.

However, the company has long maintained that there is sufficient competition in the marketplace.

"There are always those who try to use these proceedings for their own special interests. These are our competitors. What do you expect?" AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk says. "We're confident that the FCC will see through their agenda and grant us a prompt review and speedy approval."

Company officials have also argued that the merger should proceed because the two telephone companies don't compete directly for residential service.

AT&T/BellSouth Opponents Talk Litigation (B&C)

By John Eggerton, Broadcasting & Cable

Broadcasting & Cable, June 7, 2006

Opponents of the proposed merger of AT&T and BellSouth said that if the FCC does not block or put strong conditions on the deal, "some parties" will likely sue.

In a conference call with reporters discussing their filings with the FCC in opposition to the merger, several of the groups argued that, unless the FCC requires AT&T to spin-off wireless company Cingular after the merger and to divest itself of wireless spectrum they argue has been warehoused, the "best case" scenario from the merger would be an "entrenched DSL cable monopoly for Internet access. That's because they said the merged company would likely sit on spectrum that could be used for wireless Internet access in competition to DSL.

"If the FCC doesn't "do the right thing," said Jonathan Rubin of the American Antitrust Institute, "there is potential for some kind of major litigation."

Jonathan Lee of telco lobby Comptel pointed out that his group was already in litigation against the Justice Department for what it thought were insufficient conditions on the AT&T/SBC and Verizon/MCI mergers.

Andrew Schwartzman of the Media Access Project said his filing on behalf of the Center for Digital Democracy emphasized the threat to net neutrality of the merger, homing in on the issue of removing a potential competitor for wireless Internet access.

Mark Cooper emphasized the issues of 1) net neutrality--"saying that AT&T is "leading the charge to put a toll booth and a tire shredder on the Internet"--2) potential red-lining of video and broadband service (only serving the more profitable areas of a franchise), and 3) the reconstitution of the old Ma Bell that the merger, following AT&T's earlier merger with SBC, suggests. Throw in the issue of phone record privacy, Cooper said, and it will make for "an interesting conversation."

Craig Aaron of anti-consolidation group Free Press said that its Web Site had generated 15,000 comments to the FCC opposing the merger.

June 5 was the deadline in the initial round of comments on the deal, which was announced in March.

Microsoft's Reputation At Stake, EU Says (BLOOM)

BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, June 7, 2006

European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that Microsoft Corp. should be concerned about its reputation as well as the financial impact of antitrust rulings.

Kroes, who will decide before the end of July whether to impose daily fines of $2.6 million on Microsoft, said the software maker should take account of its image.

"It's not only a matter of financial aspects in such cases, it's also a matter of reputation," Kroes said at a European Parliament meeting in Brussels, Belgium.

The European Commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator, is threatening to fine Microsoft unless it licenses information on the way its Windows operating system shares printers and files to rival software developers. The regulator says the company hasn't provided "complete and accurate" information to rivals.

Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs on about 95 percent of the world's personal computers, was fined in March 2004 for abusing its dominant market position by failing to make technical information available and for bundling its media player with Windows.

As part of the antitrust decision, the commission ordered Microsoft to license so-called network protocols, which would allow developers to make competing products. Rivals and the EU have said Microsoft has resisted complying.

Microsoft, which is appealing the antitrust decision, has maintained that it is already meeting the EU's demands.

BAA Backs Ferrovial's Latest Offer (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson And Jason Singer

DOJ_NMG_0032638

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

United Kingdom airports operator BAA PLC approved a £10.1 billion ($18.9 billion) takeover offer from Spanish builder Grupo Ferrovial SA, paving the way for a mammoth European infrastructure deal that highlights investors' appetite for companies with stable returns.

The approval by BAA's board yesterday, after four months of haggling between the two companies, appears to have trumped a rival bid by a consortium led by Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

But questions remain over how Ferrovial can boost profitability at BAA's regulated businesses enough to justify the bid's hefty premium. Some airlines expressed concern that the deal could lead to higher expenses.

Ferrovial's bid is valued at 950.25 pence a share, including a 15.25-pence-a-share special dividend that BAA promised shareholders in May. BAA rebuffed two earlier approaches by Ferrovial for 810 pence and 900 pence. If the latest bid goes ahead, Ferrovial will be paying 45% more than BAA was valued at when takeover rumors began swirling in February.

In accepting Ferrovial's offer, BAA's board rejected a slightly higher bid by the Goldman consortium, valued at 955 pence a share, because the group would have taken significantly longer to close a deal, said people close to the matter.

Ferrovial hamstrung the rival consortium's efforts with a "dawn raid" purchase of 14% of BAA's shares at 950 pence a share early yesterday. That gives the Spanish group a stake big enough to deter a new rival bid emerging from the Goldman group, because takeovers in the U.K. are typically conditional on receiving 90% or more of the shares.

The Goldman team, which is likely to proceed only with a friendly deal, said it was seriously considering returning with a new bid, possibly slightly higher than its latest offer. Regulators yesterday extended a Friday deadline and gave the Goldman group an extra week, until June 16, to make a formal offer or walk away.

If the U.K. airports operator accepts another bid, Ferrovial will receive a penalty fee of £115.5 million.

The challenge for Ferrovial's consortium -- which includes Caisse de Dépôt et Placement du Québec and a Singapore-based investment fund owned by GIC Special Investments Pte. Ltd. -- will be to squeeze returns out of BAA. BAA operates seven U.K. airports, including Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted in London, and is heavily regulated. The U.K. Civil Aviation Authority is reviewing prices BAA can charge airlines for the 2008-2013 period.

BAA was advised by N.M. Rothschild & Sons and UBS AG. Ferrovial was advised by Citigroup Inc. and Macquarie Bank Ltd.

Airport Operator Accepts $19 Billion Spanish Bid (NYT)

By Nicola Clark, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

PARIS, June 6 — BAA, the operator of some of the world's busiest airports, said today that it had accepted a new takeover offer from the Spanish construction group Ferrovial, ending a nearly four-month fight to remain independent.

Grupo Ferrovial's latest bid values BAA at about £10.2 billion, or $19 billion. "The board believes that an offer at this level represents an attractive price," BAA said in a statement.

Ferrovial's move appeared to frustrate a possible 11th-hour rival bid from the investment bank Goldman Sachs. During negotiations with BAA on Monday night, Goldman said it had proposed a nonbinding cash offer that would value BAA at £10.3 billion.

BAA acquiesced to Ferrovial's advances late Monday after a consortium led by the Spanish group succeeded in acquiring around 14 percent of BAA's shares on the open market.

The Ferrovial bid valued BAA at 950.24 pence a share, compared with Goldman's proposed offer of 955.25 pence.

A BAA spokesman said the company, which operates Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports, had chosen the bid from Ferrovial over the one from Goldman because it offered the greatest certainty for shareholders in the near term.

"Under Ferrovial's offer, shareholders will get their money sooner," said Duncan Bonfield, a BAA spokesman. "Goldman's has made a proposal. But as long as it is just a proposal, then there are clear risks involved."

Ferrovial's bid, which includes a 15.25-pence-a-share dividend, has already received approval from European Union and British antitrust authorities. The offer from Goldman would likely need two to three months to complete due diligence procedures and secure regulatory approval, according to BAA.

BAA controls two-thirds of Britain's airports, and its dominant position has long been a source of concern for airlines, which complain that the company has the power to set arbitrarily high fees for landing rights and other airport services.

Last month, the British Office of Fair Trading said it was considering an investigation into whether the company has abused its market position to the detriment of consumers.

Robert Milton, chairman of the board of the International Air Transport Association, worried that airlines could be charged even more to use BAA's airports in the near term as the airport operator seeks to recoup its financing costs.

DOJ_NMG_0032639

"It's hard to paint a happy picture at this time," Mr. Milton, who is also chief executive of Air Canada, said at an industry conference in Paris.

BAA's decision to accept Ferrovial's offer followed a series of overtures by the Spanish group that began in March, with a hostile takeover offer valued at 810 pence a share.

BAA's board swiftly rejected that approach, arguing that it significantly undervalued BAA's assets, which include airport stakes in Budapest and Naples, as well as restaurant and retail services concessions at several American airports, including Logan International in Boston. Ferrovial sweetened its bid to 900 pence last week, but BAA insisted that the company was worth at least 940 pence a share.

In a statement, Goldman Sachs urged BAA shareholders to take no action on Ferrovial's offer and said it would make a further announcement in the coming days. British market regulators have given the Goldman Sachs consortium until June 16 to make a firm offer for BAA, extending an earlier deadline by a week.

Mr. Bonfield, the BAA spokesman, said the company would not rule out negotiations with Goldman Sachs if it were to submit a formal bid. "We know our duty to shareholders," he said. "If there were an offer, then we definitely would have to look at it."

Ferrovial has until June 19 to revise its offer, while BAA shareholders have until June 26 to accept or reject the new Ferrovial bid.

BAA has said it plans to spend more than £9.5 billion over the next 10 years upgrading facilities at its three London airports. Major projects include a fifth terminal at Heathrow as well as modifications to runways and terminals to accommodate the new Airbus A380 "superjumbo" jet, which is scheduled to enter commercial service next year.

Given such large investments, combined with the added debt that BAA is expected to take on as a result of the Ferrovial deal, Standard & Poor's cut its credit ratings on the company to BBB+ from A and said it may cut them again.

BAA had £5.34 billion of debt on its books as of March 31, up from £3 billion at the end of 2005.

Street Sleuth Chirac Frowns On NYSE-Euronext (WSJ)

By Alistair MacDonald And Edward Taylor

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

French President Jacques Chirac said he would rather see financial-exchange operator Euronext NV merge with Deutsche Börse AG than with NYSE Group Inc., giving some heart to the German exchange operator as it seeks to win Euronext despite last week's merger agreement between the European and U.S. exchanges.

Buoyed by Mr. Chirac's remarks, Deutsche Börse Chief Executive Reto Francioni and Chairman Kurt Viermetz are on a lobbying trip to Paris today to sound out ways Deutsche Börse can make its offer "more attractive" to shareholders without making significant changes from what has been offered up until now, a person familiar with the matter said.

Some of the French banks that might play a role in the long-running exchange-consolidation saga are less concerned about having a European outcome. Rather, they want to ensure that if NYSE Group, operator of the New York Stock Exchange, and Euronext merge, they can rest assured that U.S. corporate regulation will stay out of Europe, according to a person familiar with the matter.

To that end, some of these banks want Euronext and NYSE Group, which have agreed to a roughly $20 billion merger, to insert a statute into the combined company's rules that would make it easier for investors to insist on a breakup if U.S. regulation creeps into Europe, according to a person familiar with the matter. How such a proposal might work remains unclear. A Euronext spokesman declined to comment. A group of French banks and a separate loose federation of companies listed on Euronext control more than 15% of Euronext's shares.

While there is disagreement, with some still not wishing to see a U.S. exchange handed the keys to Euronext, many in the French banking and business communities say they believe the NYSE-Euronext combination is attractive.

The banks' concern underscores the challenge NYSE Chief Executive John Thain and Euronext CEO Jean-François Théodore face in convincing some European investors that regulation won't be an issue. Some in Europe fear that a trans-Atlantic exchange merger might lead to European companies being subject to strict corporate regulation such as the Sarbanes-Oxley U.S. corporate-governance law. Indeed, the banks' worries come primarily from their role as trading customers that also list their shares on Euronext. The NYSE-Euronext deal requires the approval of at least half of Euronext shareholders.

Messrs. Thain and Theodore have said repeatedly that regulation of the various exchanges under the combined company would remain largely unchanged, although the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission would regulate the parent company, which will be known as NYSE Euronext. "A core aspect of the structure being proposed is complete respect for the federal model of Euronext, which envisions only local regulation of the marketplaces," says David C. Karp, a partner representing NYSE Group at law firm Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. "That is the structure being presented to regulators in each of the jurisdictions."

DOJ_NMG_0032640

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said late last month the SEC is in talks with regulators from the Netherlands and France about how to respond to the proposed Euronext-NYSE merger.

Concern about the political and regulatory consequences of the deal may provide Deutsche Börse some hope it can still wrest Euronext away. "The consolidation of the European stock-exchange landscape clearly has a European strategic and therefore political dimension, because it concerns the integration of European financial markets and their efficiency," Mr. Francioni said in an interview with German financial daily Handelsblatt yesterday. "I know that policy makers understand the significance of this -- on both sides."

Mr. Chirac, in Germany with German Chancellor Angela Merkel yesterday, said he favors a Franco-German alliance "out of principle" and that he would "regret if such a solution weren't definitively adopted." Ms. Merkel's government has said already it favors partnerships between European exchanges. Both, however, have acknowledged they don't have the power to influence the decision.

"Euronext is not France...it is four exchanges together," Mr. Chirac said, referring to the fact that Euronext runs the stock exchanges of Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon, as well as a derivatives exchange in London.

Mr. Théodore met with his counterpart at Borsa Italiana, Massimo Capuano, in Milan yesterday to discuss bringing the Italian exchange into Euronext. Borsa Italiana said the meetings had been "extremely positive" and the sides will meet again.

Struggle Over Continental Stock Exchanges Takes Political Turn (NYT)

By James Kanter

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

PARIS, June 6 — The struggle for control over continental stock exchanges took a political turn today, as President Jacques Chirac of France said he preferred an all-European alliance of exchanges over a proposed acquisition of Euronext by the New York Stock Exchange. But he backed away from the overt protectionism that has characterized French economic policy in recent months.

The New York Stock Exchange reached an agreement last week to buy Euronext, a four-country exchange with roots in Paris, for about $10.2 billion. The deal would turn Paris into the headquarters for N.Y.S.E./Euronext share trading in Europe, and close out a rival suitor, Deutsche Börse of Germany.

Speaking in Germany alongside the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, Mr. Chirac said that he preferred a European merger and would "regret if this solution is not adopted in the end."

But he made clear that his priority was to preserve jobs in Paris, even if it meant tying the knot with the Americans rather than Deutsche Börse, based in Frankfurt.

The president also acknowledged that he had only "very limited ways to intervene" in the deal.

Ms. Merkel was even more circumspect, saying that governments like those in France and Germany could not exert influence over merging companies, even if she were "of the opinion that it is good to build up strong economic units within Europe."

Deutsche Börse had no immediate comment on Mr. Chirac's remarks, but officials at the German exchange were likely to be pleased. They are seeking to persuade Euronext shareholders — whose approval is required for either deal — that their offer, spurned by Euronext's management, should nevertheless prevail.

Even so, the comments by Mr. Chirac and Ms. Merkel indicated that European political leaders may be less willing to interfere in cross-border deals involving stock exchanges than they have been recently in the energy and steel industries.

This year, the French government has helped to block Enel of Italy from buying the French utility Suez, and has expressed opposition to a hostile bid for Arcelor, a giant Luxembourg-based steelmaker with roots in France, by Mittal Steel, a giant rival based in the Netherlands whose roots are in India.

Even the German government has flexed some protectionist muscles, preferring to keep a sonar equipment manufacturer, Atlas Elektronic, in German hands rather than allowing the company to be sold to Thales of France for far more money.

On the other hand, a deal between two telephone equipment makers, Lucent of the United States and Alcatel of France, was arranged with minimal political outcry. The merged companies will have an American chief executive, but be based in Paris.

Likewise, the N.Y.S.E. offer for Euronext calls for Paris to become the combined entity's operational headquarters for equity trading in Europe. By contrast, under the most recent Deutsche Börse offer, most top executives would be obliged to move to Frankfurt.

From France's perspective, that may have made the Deutsche Börse offer much less attractive.

"There are sound economic reasons for having an all-European exchanges deal," said Stefan Jaecklin, a stock exchanges expert and managing director at Mercer Oliver Wyman, a consulting firm. But "integrating potentially competing managements in Germany and France and their operations would be far from a frictionless affair," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0032641

In a sign of what Euronext executives say is the preference of other bourses for its business model, talks began in Milan today about bringing Italy into the Euronext club. The chief executive of Euronext, Jean-François Théodore, and a member of the board, Olivier Lefebvre, met with Angelo Tantazzi, president of the Borsa Italiana.

Even Mr. Chirac seemed to say today that Euronext's current business plan was on the right track. "Euronext isn't France," Mr. Chirac said. "It is four exchanges that all work together and decide together."

Who Does Arcelor Belong To? (WSJ)

By Wilbur Ross

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

It is the dream of the autocrat everywhere. No longer need you seek the support of the electorate to stay in office. Instead, the onus is on the voters to throw you out. And 50% of those voters who turn out is not enough: It would take 50% of the entire electorate. Consider what this might mean if applied to U.S. presidential elections! Yet this autocratic dream might not be so fanciful in one case. For this is the proposal the Luxembourg-based steel company Arcelor is putting to its shareholders as a way of giving consent on its deal with the Russian steel producer, Severstal.

Arcelor has been fiercely resisting Mittal Steel's proposal that the two companies should merge. So far, so conventional. We did not agree with the steps Arcelor was taking to defend itself -- notably promising a huge cash return to shareholders, on a scale which would have threatened the financial stability and growth prospects of the company going forward. But shareholders will get to vote on this proposal, so one must accept that a democratic process is at work here.

What happened on May 26, however, introduced a completely different complexion. Arcelor announced a deal with Severstal whereby Arcelor will issue 295 million shares to take control of all Severstal's mining and steel assets. In exchange, Severstal gets a 32% stake in Arcelor -- rising to 38% after the capital-return exercise. While Arcelor sought to portray this as the culmination of years of cooperation between the two parties, it was clearly motivated by a desire to defeat the Mittal Steel offer.

There are three aspects of this transaction which raise concern. First, the question of price and control. Mittal Steel has made an offer to all Arcelor shareholders which represents a 70% premium over the stock's highest closing price prior to the announcement of our deal on Jan. 27. Naturally, shareholders expect a premium when ceding control, and 70% is by any standard a very generous number. The market apparently agrees: Our very competitive offer has driven up Arcelor's share price from €22 to €32.80. In the Severstal deal, by contrast, Arcelor shareholders are not made any offer at all. Worse, they are effectively ceding control to Severstal and its majority owner, Alexei Mordashov, at a 25% discount to the price Mittal is offering shareholders (based on a one-month average share price).

The second concern is that Mr. Mordashov should be required to make an offer for the entire share capital of Arcelor when his shareholding reaches 33%. However, the self-tender process would enable him to hold 38% without making any such offer to minorities. The third point concerns governance. It is one thing to be offered a controversial deal when you are given a say in the outcome. But this is not the case.

At the extraordinary general meeting that Arcelor has scheduled for June 28, the deal will be voted on. But it will pass unless more than 50% of the entire share capital of the company votes against it. This is most unusual. Normally when contemplating such a move, a company would seek the approval of its shareholders, and the threshold would be 66% of the capital either present or represented at the meeting. This is a deliberately prohibitive barrier. The percentage of the capital normally represented at an Arcelor general meeting is below 35%. There has never been a case in which 50% of the shares were represented at such a meeting -- never mind them all voting in the same direction.

So what Arcelor is offering is a vote that appears to offer a choice, but in reality points to only one outcome. This process offends the norms of good corporate governance. That is why Mittal Steel is delighted that the shareholder initiative -- requiring 20% investor support to achieve an orthodox shareholder approval vote -- has got the necessary support. Indeed, the extent of the success of this initiative -- getting around 30% of Arcelor shareholders, in only four days, to petition the Arcelor board to hold a meeting -- must be unprecedented in Europe, and demonstrates their strength of feeling on this issue. Apparently more than 191 million shares were pledged in support of this initiative. That's 19 million more than the number that reelected Arcelor Chairman Joseph Kinsch in April, an event he declared "a vote of confidence and a real mandate."

We must be clear what this vote is about. It is a request by these dissenting shareholders for a proper vote of approval on the Severstal deal. It is not an expression of preference for Mittal, or against Severstal. The opportunity for that will come later. A Mittal/Arcelor combination would have unique strategic advantages, and would fairly compensate Arcelor shareholders. We are more than happy to go to shareholders with this proposition. In the meantime, all we are asking for is a level playing field.

Mr. Ross is a nonexecutive director of Mittal Steel Company and CEO of W.L. Ross and Co.

US Air, After Merger, Wrestles With Frequent Ire (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0032642

By Melanie Trottman
The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

When road warrior Steve Bessellieu tried to get through to US Airways' customer-service desk for top-status frequent fliers by phone last month, the automated system didn't recognize his personal identification number and transferred his call to the lower-tiered Gold desk after three tries. Frustrated, he sent an email to the airline but has yet to hear back, he said.

"If this is how they're treating me, how are they treating the people who don't have status?" Mr. Bessellieu said.

US Airways Group Inc. faces substantial challenges in integrating operations following last year's merger between the old US Airways and America West Holdings Corp. Among them, it has to keep inevitable technology glitches from alienating its customers. Last month, the merged airline launched a combined Web site and merged frequent-flier programs by migrating more than 10 million records from one airline's technology platform to another. The outcome has been far less than perfect.

"This is one of the things that makes airline mergers really hard," said Travis Christ, US Airways' vice president of sales and marketing. "One of the frustrations that our customers feel sometimes -- and we do, too -- is that this just takes time. You can't measure it in hours and days."

While the merged airline's Web site now appears uniform to users, there are still two separate reservations systems in the backdrop. That means those two systems, both antiquated, must communicate with each other behind the scenes to process bookings properly. Even bigger potential troubles could come from merging the two systems, which is planned for the first quarter of next year.

US Airways officials concede there have been problems with the Web site. It has had trouble booking tickets and doing online check-in, a feature the airline touts as a customer convenience. The site has been slow -- functions like moving from page to page have taken up to twice as long during high-volume periods.

The airline said complaints to its call centers rose the day after the May 21 launch of the new Web site. But airline officials say problems were more the exception than the rule, and have since been largely corrected. On the fifth day after launch, for example, officials addressed slowness issues by reconfiguring servers to run off of some very fast disk drives. That change sped things up online by about 50%, the company said.

"Every hour, we're finding things and getting them knocked out," US Airways' Mr. Christ said. He said the company purposely opted to do a "soft launch" of the site, which means it didn't announce the unveiling to customers. If it had, the site might have crashed amid traffic overload. Chief Information Officer Joe Beery said a team of 60 to 70 people are onsite near the company's Tempe, Ariz., headquarters managing the process.

Mr. Bessellieu, the frequent flier, complained last week that he still couldn't look up his current frequent-flier account online, something the company says it knew in advance might occur until updates are completed June 9. He had further problems Memorial Day weekend viewing the seat map for a flight he was trying to book, and says airline staffers haven't been much help. "The agents that I've spoken to seem as lost as I do," he said.

Meantime, customer calls are pouring into the airline's 24-hour Internet help desk. On a recent afternoon, a call to the desk required holding for 30 minutes before getting an actual person to pick up the phone. An airline spokesman said many of the calls are from people inquiring about why their frequent-flier accounts aren't updating. Others are customers calling in to get help logging in to the new Web site for the first time, since frequent fliers have to create a new user profile for their accounts. The company said it increased staffing by 20% ahead of launch to handle higher call volume.

For its part, US Airways says it has received compliments on the new site as well. And the site does have some improvements. Users of the old USAirways.com will now have an improved booking engine with a feature that helps them determine which travel days have lower fares, for example. And users of the old America West site will be able to book United Airlines flights online through a code-share agreement.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

How To Say Yes To Energy (WT)

By Greg Walden And Marsha Blackburn
The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

You can't say much good about Hurricane Katrina, but maybe it woke up Congress to America's need for energy at prices our people can afford to pay.

The flurry of hearings, markups and energy policy debates that ensued were encouraging, and they produced more than just heat and light. They produced bills that, taken together, contemplate a strategy of energy security.

DOJ_NMG_0032643

One of them, legislation to streamline the permitting of refineries, is up today. Another, limiting the complex government requirement for so-called boutique fuels, is on deck.

Here's what we want:

· First, to explore for domestic energy to lessen our dependence on risky foreign sources.

· Second, to conserve energy without harming our economy or disrupting our way of life.

· Third, new technologies for fuels and for vehicle and electric plant design.

· Fourth, commonsense rules that eliminate needless delay in bringing critically needed energy projects on line.

We are pressing ahead with new technologies, from hybrids to plug-ins to hydrogen powered cars. And today's refinery-permitting reform bill may finally crack the barrier to new entrants in the refinery business, whether it's crude oil, coal-to-liquid or biofuels that need refining. In the long run, the "H-prize" may do more than anything else to accelerate the shift to cars that run on hydrogen.

The biggest challenge we face, however, is conquering fear. The country must find ways to unlock the energy that politicians and political activists keep trapped in our own country beneath layers of phobia.

The House is moving to deal with the fear by unlocking our own potential. We recently voted, yet again, to open a sliver of the Alaskan tundra, the Alaskan National Wildlife Refuge, to exploration.

Some of the upcoming Senate debate will be a replay of what we've heard for decades from the anti-energy crowd: The caribou will stop calving, there's no oil in ANWR, there's not enough oil in ANWR, our oil will be pumped into ships headed for Japan. The list of silly, flimsy or fact-free objections goes on and on, and it has the uncanny ability to survive dramatic advances in technology and safety, not to mention repeated applications of truth.

The caribou will thrive, just as they do all over the Alaskan North Slope oilfields. The oil in ANWR is abundant, and none of it may be exported.

The larger truth is that ANWR could be the single largest conventional energy resource in America. The mean estimate of recoverable oil from 2,000 acres in ANWR is 10.4 billion barrels. That's more than double the proven reserves of Texas and could increase America's total proven reserves -- currently 21 billion barrels -- by nearly 50 percent.

At peak production, development on ANWR's northern coastal plain could deliver an additional 1.5 million barrels of oil per day. That is an amount equal to the daily supply America lost in the Gulf of Mexico due to Hurricane Katrina; it is more than the daily excess supply in today's global market; and it is nearly equal to the amount we import from Saudi Arabia.

ANWR thrives as a political issue instead of an energy source because it is the last stand for those who want us to huddle together in the cold and dark, praying for rescue after we've run out of both resources and ideas. They've been saying no and voting no for nearly 30 years, but it's time that we took charge and started saying yes.

Another big job ahead is to recognize and deal with the fear that originates abroad. Witness after witness before our committee has commented on the percentage of today's crude oil price that is directly caused by "geopolitical risk."

The uncertainty caused by civil unrest in Nigeria and the bellicose, anti-American governments of Venezuela and Iran causes markets to fret that supply disruptions will drive prices higher. The consequence is that traders react by bidding up oil prices as much as 20 percent more than might otherwise be the case.

What if all the products that a barrel of oil produces, especially gasoline, were that much less expensive?

The House majority has said no to fear and politics and yes to providing American energy for American workers at a price they can afford to pay. Now it's the Senate's turn.

Rep. Greg Walden, Oregon Republican and Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican, are members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Ag Secretary Says Bird Flu Easily Found (AP)

By Lauran Neergaard

AP, June 7, 2006

Scientists have a new test that can tell within four hours if a bird is possibly infected with bird flu — but it still will take about a week to know if that suspect case is really sick with the deadly Asian strain, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Tuesday.

Bird flu hasn't yet reached North America, but testing of migrating wild birds has begun in an attempt to catch it early if it does. There have been no worrisome discoveries yet, Johanns told The Associated Press.

Four hours also is how long it takes to get preliminary results in people infected with the H5N1 virus, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said in the joint interview. But if bird flu ever begins spreading easily among people, that's too long, he warned.

DOJ_NMG_0032644

"If it occurs anywhere in the world, it's just a matter of weeks until it appears in the United States," Leavitt said, stressing U.S. preparations that include research into faster human tests for the disease as well as vaccines and treatments. Previously, officials have said that tests allowed them to tell within a day of testing whether a bird was possibly infected with bird flu.

Bird flu has killed at least 127 people worldwide since it began spreading in Asia in late 2003, and tens of millions of poultry and other birds have died of it or been destroyed to stem outbreaks. It is difficult for people to catch — most infections so far have been linked to close contact with infected birds or their droppings.

But experts fear the virus could mutate into a form easily spread between people, potentially sparking a worldwide outbreak.

It's considered likely that an infected bird eventually will wing its way to North America, perhaps mingling with native birds on breeding grounds in Alaska who then could bring H5N1 south to infect other birds.

An infected bird isn't a threat to the average American: "That will not be a crisis," Leavitt stressed.

Instead, Ag officials will work closely with farmers to protect poultry from getting sick, destroying entire flocks if the disease appears, quarantining farms and ensuring a disease-free perimeter of about six miles, Johanns said.

Indeed, the world got a scare last month when an Indonesian family apparently spread the virus to one another, killing at least six relatives and probably a seventh and sickening one more. There have been a handful of such in-family cases before, but this was the largest familial cluster ever counted. Genetic testing showed the virus hasn't mutated, and it didn't spread beyond blood relatives.

But Johanns and Leavitt said the situation illustrates the cultural difficulties in battling bird flu: how to educate impoverished families that the backyard chickens responsible for their livelihoods could sicken, even kill them.

In Cambodia, Leavitt said, a health minister told him it was "difficult to get farmers to think a few dead chickens are a serious problem" when 14,000 people there die of rabies in a given year.

Given such stark realities, what's the chance that health workers could contain a bird flu pandemic in its country of origin?

"We'll do all we can to help other nations," he said. But, "the chance of actually being there when the spark happens so you control it is very low."

Seneca Claim To Island Rebuffed (BUFFNEWS)

By TOM BUCKHAM And ANTHONY CARDINALE, News Staff Reporters

Buffalo News, June 7, 2006

High Court refusal ends 13-year fight

That sound coming from Grand Island was a sigh of relief.

The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday refused to reinstate the Seneca Nation of Indians' claim over the properties of 18,000 residents, ending a 13-year fight that had many residents fearing that they would be forced from their homes.

"Is it finally over?" said Liz AuClair-Smith, who has lived on Love Road for 36 years. "I'm delighted. It's been quite a burden to have that hanging over our heads - whether to sell or to stay. You wouldn't get your price."

"This lawsuit was mischief-making that somebody took seriously and that got entirely out of hand," said Douglas M. Smith, who has lived on Hennepin Road since 1967. "I agree that we have probably given the Indians a bad deal from the beginning. But to try to find a loophole from 250 years ago?"

The Senecas sued in 1993 to "recover" Grand Island and about 40 other islands in the Niagara River, claiming they had been illegally taken in an 1815 treaty with New York State.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Arcara ruled in 2002 that the Senecas had never lived on the islands and, if they had any right to them, had negotiated them away before 1815. His ruling was upheld by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in September.

Town Supervisor Peter McMahon applauded Monday's refusal by the Supreme Court to hear the Senecas' last appeal.

"There's no higher court," he said, "so it's over."

McMahon said he found it interesting that the U.S. Justice Department, whose intervention on the Senecas' behalf enabled them to sue in the first place, filed a last-minute brief contending that the appeal had no merit.

But Joseph F. Crangle, who represented the Seneca Nation when the case was filed, said: "I'm disappointed. There is no question that the treaty [of 1815] included islands in the Niagara River, and I think Grand Island is in the Niagara River. This is a good example of how people can rewrite history."

John Blanton, a senior from Grand Island High School, was told the news at Town Hall.

"I was very young when the suit started," he said. "I have very mixed feelings. Being a resident of Grand Island, I have to say they really don't own it. My grandparents were somewhat afraid they were going to lose their house. But I can see the Indians were here [in Western New York] first."

DOJ_NMG_0032645

Jim Tomkins, president of the Quality Quest Coalition in Grand Island, an environmental group, said he had ambivalent feelings about the case.

"Historically, the Indians have gotten the short end of the stick for a very long time," said Tomkins, who has lived on West River Road for 44 years. "But from a selfish point of view, if I were trying to sell my property I'd have had a lot different attitude."

When the Senecas filed their land claim in 1993, they said they intended to reclaim all 18,660 acres of Grand Island and evict more than 6,000 homeowners. Later, in some of their public remarks about the case, Seneca leaders softened their stance, saying they had no intention of forcing residents out of their homes.

During settlement talks in 2000, Seneca officials indicated they hoped to receive more than $176 million from the state and federal governments to drop the Grand Island lawsuit.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

$2.75 Million Is Poured Into War On Gangs (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, June 7, 2006

Greater Cleveland will get $2.75 million from the Justice Department to help fight street gangs, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday during a visit to the area.

"Obviously, the fact that Cleveland was selected shows there is a gang problem," Gonzales said during a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse downtown.

Most of the money - $2.5 million - will be spent in Cleveland over three years and focus on prevention, law enforcement and prison re-entry. A committee focused on the gang problem will determine by autumn exactly how the money will be spent.

An additional $250,000 will pay for six suburban police officers to work in schools. The officers will help oversee projects to keep students out of gangs. Chagrin Falls, East Cleveland, Parma and Warrensville Heights were selected for the Gang Resistance Education and Training grants.

"It gives the children a law enforcement officer they can call 24/7," said U.S. Marshal Peter Elliot, whose office started the program in Greater Cleveland. "It helps break down stereotypes and distrust of law enforcement."

In Cleveland, more than 90 gangs are involved in drug dealing and street violence. The gangs are no longer nationally organized, like the Crips and Bloods.

Instead, they are looser groups of kids hanging on the streets, according to the Cleveland Unified Gang Task Force.

Cleveland was selected for the money along with Los Angeles, Milwaukee, Tampa, Dallas and the corridor in Pennsylvania between Lancaster and Easton.

Gonzalez said those cities were chosen because the government felt the money would have the most impact there.

"These are gangs who are involved in very serious crime," Gonzales said. "They are robbing our youth of productive futures."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said law enforcement, community and church groups will meet over the summer to determine how to best spend the money.

That includes determining which neighborhoods to target for enforcement.

"We'll be assessing where there is the greatest problem and where we can make the greatest impact," Morford said.

But keeping kids from joining gangs, and helping former members avoid the gangs after getting out of prison, will also be a focus.

"If done right, this could have an incredible impact on the community," Morford said.

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

mtobin@plaind.com, 216-999-4128

Santa Rosa Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI (KPIX-TV)

KPIX-TV, June 7, 2006

(CBS 5) SANTA ROSA The leader of the Santa Rosa Hells Angels motorcycle club chapter turned himself into the FBI Tuesday and was placed under arrest for suspicion of drug possession and distribution, officials said.

Federal agents had been searching for 42-year-old Raymond Foakes since last week when law enforcement officers raided six locations around Santa Rosa, including the Hells Angels headquarters there, as part of an ongoing drug probe.

Foakes was previously arrested in 2003 in connection with a violent confrontation between members of the Hells Angels and Mongols motorcycle club at Harrah's Casino in Laughlin, Nevada in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0032646

He was one of 42 Hells Angels members indicted in the United States District Court in Las Vegas on federal racketeering and firearms charges.

Up until Tuesday's arrest, Foakes had been free on bond pending a September trial on the Nevada charges.

News In Brief From California's North Coast (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, June 7, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. - The president of the Sonoma County chapter of the Hells Angels who was wanted on federal drug charges turned himself into authorities in San Francisco on Tuesday, an FBI spokeswoman said.

Raymond Michael Foakes, 42, had been sought since Friday when federal agents and local officers raided his home and the motorcycle group's clubhouse. He was wanted under a sealed federal warrant alleging illegal possession and distribution of drugs.

Foakes was arrested in 2003 in connection with a violent confrontation between members of the Hells Angels and Mongols motorcycle club at Harrah's Casino in Laughlin, Nev., in April 2002.

Another Hells Angels associate, Michael Vargas, remained at large Tuesday, FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy said.

Camden Man Sentenced In Drug/murder Operation Case (CAMCP)

Camden Courier Post, June 7, 2006

Bernard Murray of Camden, convicted almost exactly a year ago for his participation in a large-scale drug operation that relied on murder as an enforcement tool, was sentenced today to life plus 85 years in a federal prison.

Representatives of three murder victims spoke at the sentencing hearing, asking for a harsh term for Murray, 29.

In response, U.S. District Judge Robert B. Kugler told them, "I can't solve the problems of Camden, nor can this court. But I will make sure you're safe from people like Murray."

The sentence is the longest that court officials could recall.

According to testimony at the eight-week trial last May and June, Murray and his co-defendants were involved in the killing of Rutgers-Camden student Hiram Rosa in February 2000.

Murray also was a participant in the March 2001 slaying of Kenneth Allen, an associate of their drug operation, and the October 2001 killing of Troy James.

One of the cooperating defendants in the criminal investigation, Enrique Perez, is to be sentenced by Kugler later today.

2 Drug Ring Leaders Sentenced (WPVI-TV)

WPVI-TV, June 7, 2006

Two leaders of a notorious Camden drug distribution ring were sentenced Friday.

29-year-old Bernard Murray was sentenced to life plus 85 years in federal prison on weapons and drug charges and ordered to pay a 250-thousand dollar fine.

Meanwhile, his partner, 39-year-old Enrique Perez, another leader of the gang, got 25 years in prison. He will have to pay a 20-thousand dollar fine.

Perez received a lesser sentence due to his cooperation with authorities.

Feds Hope To 'weed Out' Local Crime (NEWS14)

News 14, Charlotte, NC, June 7, 2006

The federal money will also be used to "seed" economic development in the Central Avenue corridor.

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- The U.S. Justice Department is committing about $1 million to revitalize a crime-ridden area of east Charlotte.

It is partnering with local businesses and the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department to implement the “Weed and Seed” program in the Central Avenue corridor.

The money will pay for community and faith-based initiatives that are designed to “weed out” crime, gangs and drugs while “seeding” economic development.

The Central Avenue corridor is one of more than 300 "Weed and Seed" sites in the country.

"We're going to measure success if we see a decline of truancy in the schools,” U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said Tuesday. “We’re going to measure success if we see a decrease in gang activity. We’re going to measure success if we see increased economic development."

The Central Avenue corridor is one of more than 300 “Weed and Seed” sites in the country.

“I hear a lot of people talking about they don’t feel like it’s as safe as it used to be,” one local resident said.

DOJ_NMG_0032647

Authorities hope the new program will help change that perception.

Guns, Drugs Are Seized In Reaids (TTNJ)

By Michael Ratcliffe

Trenton Times, June 6, 2006

Guns, ammunition and drugs were seized and three men were arrested on related charges when authorities raided three residences in Trenton and Hamilton on Sunday night, city police announced yesterday.

Those arrested were identified by police as Deon Williams, 29, James McCrary, 28, and Randal Williams, 44-year-old uncle to Deon Williams.

The raids on Indiana Avenue and Washington Street in Trenton and East State Street in Hamilton were the result of a three-month investigation by Trenton detectives, the Mercer County Prosecutor's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, police said.

Police said the probe began after neighborhood residents tipped authorities to a suspected drug distribution ring operating from the three residences.

Raids were conducted simultaneously about 9:40 p.m. Sunday by federal agents, state troopers and law enforcement officials from throughout Mercer County, police said.

Randal Williams was arrested after officers found a loaded Smith & Wesson .40 caliber pistol, a loaded .25 caliber Beretta pistol, .25 caliber hollow-point ammunition and a large amount of other types of ammunition in a house in the 1600 block of East State Street, police said. In addition to the weapons and ammunition, $150 cash and a sport utility vehicle were seized by authorities, police said.

Police said Deon Williams and McCrary were arrested during the raid of a house in the 1300 block of Indiana Avenue. Officers seized from that home 30 grams of crack cocaine, $628 cash, a digital scale and an SUV, police said.

The raid of a second-floor apartment on Washington Street yielded no arrests but did result in the seizure of a sawed-off shotgun, police said.

Deon Williams is on federal parole and faces a minimum of three years in federal prison for his parole violation alone, said Detective Capt. Carlo Orsini, commander of Trenton police's Special Operations Bureau.

1,000-plus Doses Netted In City Sweep (PPG)

By Jonathan D. Silver, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

Pittsburgh police have confiscated more than 1,000 packets of the type of fentanyl-laced heroin suspected of causing up to six overdose deaths in Allegheny County since Sunday, but it was unclear how much of a dent the seizure would put in the supply on the street.

During a news conference yesterday, police revealed few details about their activities -- including a large bust Monday in Hazelwood that netted 1,050 stamp bags of the deadly brand of heroin marked "Get High or Die Trying" -- but said a dramatic slowdown since Monday evening in 911 calls for heroin overdoses might be related.

However, some investigators believe the confiscation of 1,131 stamp bags overall of the potent heroin and two other types that have appeared in recent days might represent only a drop in the bucket of the lethal supply.

Despite the seizures, the street price remains at $10 to $15 a stamp bag, which could indicate that the amount of "Get High or Die Trying" available in Pittsburgh has not dried up.

With intense police scrutiny in Hazelwood and the Hill District, where the heroin has been concentrated, dealers are going underground, making it a bit more complicated for users to score their next fix.

Authorities cannot be certain that any deaths this week are related to overdoses of heroin until toxicology tests are completed to show the presence of drugs in the blood. That process could take weeks.

However, based on circumstances, it is believed that at least five fatalities among more than 40 people who have overdosed in Allegheny County since Sunday are related to a batch of heroin that police first became aware of Friday.

On Sunday, Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Penn Hills, was found dead in his Greenfield apartment. The next morning, Lynn A. Margavo, 30, was found dead in her home in the 5200 block of Gertrude Street in Hazelwood. An hour later, Dorothy Iannone, 56, of the 5100 block of Roma Way, also in Hazelwood, was found dead.

Yesterday at 12:25 a.m., Diane Pless, 20, of the 4700 block of Centre Avenue in Oakland was found dead by her boyfriend in her apartment. And at 1:20 a.m., Lawrence Jordan, 48, of Ravine Street in Munhall was pronounced dead in his bathroom after being discovered by his girlfriend.

DOJ_NMG_0032648

In Mr. Jordan's case, investigators recovered a stamp bag. The name of the brand was unreadable, but it was in red ink, a hallmark of how "Get High or Die Trying" is packaged.

A sixth death in Aspinwall from yesterday was being looked at in connection with the heroin overdoses, but the Allegheny County Police are not convinced the case is linked.

The county's crime lab has concluded that fentanyl -- a painkiller 80 times stronger than morphine -- was present in one sample of "Get High or Die Trying." A sample of another brand called "Dynasty" also linked to recent overdoses tested positive only for heroin, said Dr. Frederick Fochtman, the county's chief toxicologist.

A third brand of heroin has come up in the investigation of the overdoses, but narcotics Cmdr. Maurita Bryant would not name it.

Police yesterday revised the number of suspected heroin overdoses being investigated. As of yesterday afternoon, there were 33 in the city and nine in the rest of Allegheny County. Two more possible cases emerged late yesterday. One involved an inmate at the intake area of the county jail yesterday afternoon. Last night, around 11 p.m., police and paramedics responded to an apartment in the 5700 block of Phillips Avenue in Squirrel Hill for a reported overdose. A white male in his 20s was taken to Mercy Hospital where he was expected to recover, paramedics said.

Overdose cases spreading

Non-fatal overdoses possibly connected to the laced heroin continued to spread to additional communities outside the city, including Clairton, Mt. Oliver and West Homestead. All the victims have been white and between 16 and 56 years old.

In the West Homestead case, a 20-year-old man from Castle Shannon was found Monday at 2:15 a.m. after shooting up in his car in a KFC parking lot on Eighth Avenue, West Homestead police Chief Christopher Deasy said.

The man was hospitalized, and two stamp bags were found. A woman in the car said the heroin was bought in Homestead, Chief Deasy said.

Homestead police Chief Jeff DeSimone said his officers have not encountered any overdose victims from the batch of heroin making the rounds -- yet.

"We're keeping our fingers crossed," Chief DeSimone said. But, he added, "It's kind of inevitable."

Dr. David Murray, senior policy analyst with the Office of National Drug Control Policy in Washington, said the fentanyl-laced heroin has turned up in eight states and caused between 150 to 350 deaths nationwide.

He said the pattern of deaths, which started in Chicago and Philadelphia, is following known routes of heroin distribution.

The drugs flow into major cities like Chicago, which become hubs, and then trail out to smaller cites like spokes on bicycle wheels.

Dr. Murray said it would be hard to say what effect the closing of a drug lab in Mexico, which might be the source of the fentanyl, would have on the current overdose outbreak.

"We are trying to put out as much of a public health alert out there that says 'look there is something very risky out there,' " said Dr. Murray.

Fentanyl side effects

One of the side effects of fentanyl is that the body's muscles often instantaneously stiffen when it is injected into the bloodstream.

"It is so rapid acting that the addict is often found dead with the needle still stuck in their arm," he said.

Tom McElree, director of the regional Emergency Medical Services Institute, an agency that provides training and other services to emergency medical services in 10 counties in southwestern Pennsylvania, said the Pennsylvania Department of Health received a notice April 25 of "opioid" overdoses that had occurred that month in New Jersey.

Those overdoses involved some heroin and a mixture of fentanyl or methylfentanyl and procaine, a version of the anesthetic lidocaine.

He said his office is working to get a handle on overdoses in the region and statewide so it can help paramedics and emergency service professionals react properly to the outbreak.

Pittsburgh narcotics and homicide detectives on Saturday launched a joint investigation of the new brand of lethal heroin. Detectives are interviewing overdose survivors. Three drug dealers have been arrested, but police would not provide their names.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is also involved, but DEA Special Agent Rick McGoldrick in Philadelphia declined to provide specifics.

Although there is an awareness among drug users that "Get High or Die Trying" might prove fatal, many are enticed by the prospect of an incredible high rather than scared away by the potentially lethal consequences.

"Individuals who are addicted to heroin are actively seeking this drug," Cmdr. Bryant said. "The word is out on the street that it's pretty much the ultimate high."

Lt. Kevin Kraus said hardcore users seem to be shrugging off efforts to steer them away from the powerful heroin.

"It doesn't seem that any warning is successful at all," Lt. Kraus said. "It's a very addictive drug, and it's in great demand right now."

Heroin addicts often lose the ability to get high on their normal doses and long for the euphoria that first drew them in. The increased potency of the fentanyl-laced heroin is nearly irresistible for serious users, who need more and more of the drug to satisfy their addiction and avoid pain, said Dr. Neil Capretto, medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Center.

"They're looking for a stronger effect," he said. "Many people say, 'I started using to get high, and now I use to get by.' "

Even after they are treated for an overdose, users will often immediately return to the drug and even overdose again, trying to alleviate the withdrawal symptoms caused by reversal agents.

"It feels like the worse case of the flu you've ever had, times 10," Dr. Capretto said of withdrawal. "It's like having your head in a vise and knives in your stomach."

People who elect to use the new heroin are essentially playing Russian roulette, Dr. Capretto said, because it is impossible to determine whether the heroin has been laced with anything and how strong the drug will be.

"Addiction is not logical," said Dr. Capretto. "People will keep using. They say, 'I know I'll lose my job, my wife, my family, but I just can't stop.'"

Killer Heroin Coursed Through Philadelphia, Too (PPG)

By Bill Toland, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- In mid-April, dealers dropped shipments of additive-laced heroin on Philadelphia's streets. They might as well have dropped a bomb.

At least eight people were dead of overdoses by April 22, a Saturday night. The next day, city police arranged a news conference to warn users about the killer batch, a haphazard mix of heroin and fentanyl, a powerful painkiller that is like morphine, only many times stronger.

"We wrestled long and hard whether to go on TV," said police Capt. Len Ditchkofsky, head of the city's east division, epicenter for the outbreak. Announcing the existence of heroin so strong that it was killing the people who used it might well serve as free advertising for dealers.

But in the end, "we had a legal and moral obligation to let people know," Capt. Ditchkofsky said.

So police told users to stay away from the Kensington and Port Richmond neighborhoods, northeast of the city center. What came next was a lesson in junkie behavior. Users flocked to the area, buying up the $10 doses. They came from the city, and they came from the suburbs.

And, in the process, they may have given Pittsburgh a preview of what to expect over the coming days and weeks, as the lethal drug mixture spreads among dealers and users, propelled by the buzz that accompanies sensational overdose deaths and news reports.

"It just brought them down here in droves," the captain said. "They just started dropping like flies ... you're not dealing with normal people here."

Within a month, 30 people in Philadelphia and Camden County, N.J. -- just across the river from Philadelphia -- had been claimed by the potent cocktail. Hundreds more were admitted to hospitals with overdoses, and who knows how many recovered from their overdoses without the benefit of medical treatment.

In the days that followed the news conference, police and federal investigators moved to simultaneously trace and stop the flow. First, they focused on a single strain of the heroin, which came in bags marked "Fefe." Confiscate that strain, and they'd stop some of the flow, they hoped.

But within a week or so, it was apparent that lots of street brands were mixed with fentanyl (and in some cases, investigators now believe, doses contained no heroin at all, just fentanyl).

In the Philadelphia and South Jersey region, "fefe" was complemented by bags labeled "flatline," "exorcist" and "al capone," references to the packages' dangerous contents. In Harrisburg and elsewhere, the bags were labeled "apollo."

It wasn't one dealer, one brand name or one shipment. "It was the whole supply" line, from Chicago to Philadelphia, said Capt. Ditchkofsky.

When an entire supply line is affected, it takes a while for the drugs to run their course. Philadelphia's outbreak began in mid-April, and two months later, straggler doses are probably still on the street, despite a $250,000 seizure that took a half-pound of heroin out of the supply chain. A half-pound, when divided into individual doses, translates into 25,000 packets.

DOJ_NMG_0032650

"There's so many ways that heroin can come into a major city like Philadelphia. Same as Pittsburgh," said Capt. Chris Werner, head of Philadelphia's narcotics field unit. "It would be almost impossible to identify one main source of that particular drug."

If they could do it over again, Philadelphia police would have carried out their "moral obligation" by notifying the public that deadly heroin was on the streets, but would have purposely omitted the parts of the city where it was selling. In the same week, Chicago learned the same lesson -- police canvassed the neighborhoods where the heroin was being sold and where overdoses had occurred, passing out informational pamphlets that were supposed to scare away buyers.

But instead of following police advice, addicts followed the heroin to its source.

"What heroin users are looking for is that high that they got when they first used heroin," Capt. Werner said. "But it's almost impossible to find. So they look for stronger types of heroin."

And heroin so strong that it kills -- even if it's the additive that's providing the deadly strength -- is irresistible to some addicts.

Users sought out by The Philadelphia Inquirer confirmed the odd allure. One user told the paper: "If people die, other people think the heroin is good." An addict recovering at a treatment center in Camden told the paper that the deaths are the best kind of advertising. "It's like saying, 'We got the good stuff that's really kicking.'"

"It's a very panicky situation," said Oscar Hernandez, an administrator at My Brother's Keeper, a homeless shelter and drug treatment clinic in Camden. Longtime users can go through eight, 10, even a dozen doses a day, and any one of them could be the high that kills.

But even as longtime addicts seek more intense highs, others are frightened by it. "In the midst of that, there's people that want to get out, want to seek recovery," Mr. Hernandez said. "They said, '100 people are dead, I want to get out ... That's a good time to take the opportunity to reach out."

In Camden, a spokesman for the county prosecutor's office said that some users were scared away when they learned the source of the heroin's potency. Pure heroin is one thing, but an unknown mixture can be scary, even for longtime users.

"I think when word started getting around that there was fentanyl laced into this stuff, people started to realize that it wasn't just really good heroin," said Bill Shralow.

Another way to combat the scourge, at least on the distribution end, is by tacking new penalties onto typical drug charges for anyone caught dealing the more potent mix.

Philadelphia police threatened dealers with charges of attempted murder, reckless endangerment and risking a catastrophe, in addition to possession and distribution charges. So far, they have yet to make good on that threat, a police spokeswoman said. In Camden, the prosecutor has the ability to charge dealers with a first-degree homicide felony if one of the buyers ends up dead.

But of the eight heroin deaths reported in South Jersey from April 14 until the end of May, none could be traced to a specific dealer.

Camden was caught off guard by the two-week spike in fentanyl-heroin overdoses, unaware of January and February deaths in Chicago. But Pittsburgh, months behind the other outbreaks, can observe the mistakes and successes other cities experienced in dealing with the drug.

And yet it might not matter. Undercover buys, dealer arrests and media publicity about the dangers of the shipment go only so far. If users are warned against a certain label and those warnings begin to hurt sales, dealers with excess stock can easily repackage the heroin and stamp it with a different street name.

So Pittsburgh might have to wait for the bad heroin to flush its way out of the drug pipeline, just as Philadelphia and Camden did. The good, if obvious, news: Eventually, the highly potent supply will be used up. What isn't used in its most potent form will be cut and diluted by lower-level dealers, rendering the heroin -- though still dangerous -- less deadly.

Philadelphia's overdose numbers leveled off by the end of May, and Camden, following the two-week spike, is now seeing normal levels of heroin overdoses -- one every week or so.

Police Claim Bust Slows Heroin Flow (PTR)

By Jill King Greenwood

Pittsburgh Tribune Review, June 7, 2006

Pittsburgh police seized 21 bricks of fentanyl-laced heroin, putting a "serious dent" in the flow of the concoction that city detectives Tuesday blamed for six deaths in Allegheny County.

The seizure Monday night represented about 1,050 of the 1,131 stamp bags marked with "Get high or die trying" seized since the drug surfaced in the city on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0032651

City detectives said four people have died in the city, one in Aspinwall and one in Munhall. Thirty-seven others have overdosed but survived -- including one yesterday in the county jail.

"There's no doubt that seizure (of drugs) probably helped save some lives and prevent overdoses," city police Cmdr. Maurita Bryant said. "That's our goal here."

Police have been working around the clock to find out how large quantities of the drug wound up in Hazelwood, which they believe is the center of the crisis.

"We have detectives working 18- to 20-hour shifts, going home for three or four hours of sleep and then coming back," said city police Lt. Kevin Kraus "It's extremely draining, but we're continuing to run on full tilt."

Narcotics and vice detectives seized the 21 bricks -- each containing 50 stamp bags of the drug -- from someone in Hazelwood. Authorities wouldn't identify those who have been arrested -- both users and dealers -- as they pressure those suspects for information about the source of the drugs, which investigators say likely came from New York City.

Bryant said the increasing police presence in Hazelwood has run some of the drug dealers underground.

"They're not as visible, out on the street, like they were before," she said. "Now it seems to be that if you want some of this heroin, you have to make a phone call and meet somewhere."

Kraus said medical calls for overdose victims have decreased significantly since Monday.

Police are being tight-lipped about their investigation -- refusing to say specifically where each of the city and county overdoses occurred -- other than to note that several city neighborhoods from the North Side to Greenfield have been affected.

Three people died of suspected drug overdoses yesterday, and the Allegheny County Medical Examiner's Office is trying to determine if the same batch of heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl is responsible.

Diane Pless, 20, was pronounced dead shortly after midnight in her Shadyside apartment. Lawrence Jordan, 48, was found dead shortly after 1 a.m. in his Munhall home. Harold Bradley, 50, died at 2:30 a.m. at his home in Aspinwall.

The three who died earlier in the week were Dorothy Iannone, 56, of Hazelwood, an ex-waitress; Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Verona, an electrician; and Lynn Morgavo, 30, of Greenfield, who had a history of arrests for drug possession and distribution.

Residue or stamp bags, some without lettering, were found near five of the victims; Bradley had a history of heroin and alcohol abuse.

Betty Zielinski said her son battled a drug problem for years, but she was still shocked when she learned of his overdose.

"I didn't even know he was shooting up," she said.

Her son, who grew up in Greenfield and Squirrel Hill and attended Minadeo Elementary School and Taylor Allderdice High School, began smoking marijuana around age 12, she said.

"As long as he was on drugs, he was in a good mood," she said. "He told me before that he didn't even like to work unless he was on drugs."

Mary Jean Tudi, who lived across the street from the Zielinskis in Greenfield, said she knew Joseph Zielinski had drug problems but that he posed no problems.

"When you think of drug addicts, you think of them hitting people up for money," she said. "He wasn't like that. He was quiet and didn't bother anyone. It's really sad and I feel so bad for his mother."

Jordan was on disability, having suffered three heart attacks since age 26, and struggled with his addiction for years, said his girlfriend, Diane Pristas.

"He would give you the shirt off his back if you needed it. If you needed a place to stay, there was always a spare cot in the house," Pristas said.

Ruth Seybold, 60, of Hazelwood, recounted a phone call she received one day from Iannone.

"I don't know what to do," Iannone told her. "I just want to die."

Heroin Overdoses Decline, New Problem Arises (KDKA)

By Ralph Iannotti

KDKA-TV, June 7, 2006

(KDKA) PITTSBURGH Pittsburgh police say in the past 24 hours, there's been a significant decline in the number heroin overdose cases being reported.

But, now, there's another problem.

Addicts are now purposely seeking out the deadly drug laced with the pain killer Fentanyl.

They want to try it, despite its potential to be lethal.

Meanwhile, police continue to search for the supplier of the drug that has flooded several Pittsburgh neighborhoods.

One of the latest heroin overdoses was at the Allegheny County Jail.

DOJ_NMG_0032652

Pittsburgh police say a prisoner in the jail's intake area showed signs of an overdose and was taken to a hospital for treatment.

According to police, investigators believe the inmate somehow got a dose of the "get high, or die trying" heroin.

Hours earlier, police were called to the Centre Tower Apartments in Oakland where 20-year old Diane Pless died from a heroin overdose.

Pless was one of three heroin overdose victims on Tuesday: 49-year old Lawrence Jordan died of an overdose in Munhall; and 50-year old Harold Bradley was found dead in Aspinwall -- heroin was again the suspected killer.

Overall, police say the reports of overdoses have declined.

However, now there's another potential danger.

"A problem that we're having, that we're noticing, is that individuals who are addicted to heroin are actively seeking this drug," said Commander Maurita Bryant of the Pittsburgh Police. "Word on the street is that it's pretty much the ultimate high, and we have individuals coming in, actually looking for it."

Nearly 20 city and suburban neighborhoods have reported the potent heroin overdoses.

Police believe there have been six deaths related to the drug: two in Hazelwood and one each in Greenfield, Oakland, Munhall, and what police call a suspected heroin overdose death in Aspinwall.

A seizure of 21 bricks of heroin by the city narcotics unit may ultimately be cutting down on the overdose numbers.

There's little doubt this investigation is taking a toll on police.

"We've had detectives working 18 or 20 hour shifts," said Lt. Kevin Kraus of the Pittsburgh Police. "They would come back after three or four hours sleep. We're trying to combine resources, from other detective squads in the investigation branch."

Those 21 bricks of heroin seized by police break down into more than 1,000 individual $10 or $15 "get high or die trying" stamp bags.

A news conference has been scheduled for Wednesday by U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan.

She'll be joined by a DEA official, and Pittsburgh's mayor and police chief.

More Victims Added To Heroin OD Tally (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, June 6, 2006

(KDKA) PITTSBURGH The fourth reported death from a heroin overdose happened in the Oakland section of the city late last night.

A deadly batch of heroin first surfaced over the weekend and has claimed another life and affected dozens of victims.

Four fatalities have been reported among 36 total overdoses - 31 in the city and five outside of the city.

Just after midnight, police were called to an apartment building in the 4700-block of Centre Avenue in Oakland. It was described as another DOA from a drug overdose.

It was the fourth person to die since Saturday in connection with the heroin likely to be laced with the potent painkiller fentanyl.

Police were called to another drug overdose early Tuesday morning at a home on Eleanor Street on the South Side.

The person survived and was taken to South Side hospital for treatment. Police say they found some drugs inside the home.

City police commander Tom Stangrecki says he expects things could get worse before they get better.

"We believe this heroin has been distributed to other dealers in the area," Commander Stangrecki said. "It's going to take more than one arrest to stop this. Until the supply runs out, we may see more over doses."

Allegheny County authorities say a potent form heroin is to blame for more deaths and overdoses in and around Pittsburgh.

Police commander Tom Stangrecki says until the supply runs out, there may be more overdoses.

Police are arresting dealers as they try to find the source of the heroin.

Detroit, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, Chicago and other cities have all seen drug users die from heroin combined with fentanyl, which is considered 80 times more powerful than morphine.

Authorities have confirmed more than 100 deaths because of the fentanyl-laced drugs.

There will be a press briefing at 3:30 pm today.

Names Can Help End Drug Plague (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, June 7, 2006

Wayne County has a plague on its hands, but county officials are inexplicably refusing to identify its victims.

DOJ_NMG_0032653

About 60 people have succumbed since mid-May to a deadly cocktail of heroin and fentanyl, a pain-killing drug developed for cancer patients. The Detroit area has by far the most deaths from this mix of any place in the country. Federal, state and local medical and law enforcement officials have been assembled in Detroit for weeks trying to find the source of the drugs. Public warnings have been issued, but the deaths continue. Yet authorities have not responded to a Free Press request for the names of the victims, other than to ask for more time.

If there is not a master list of the victims, the sleuths charged with tracing the drugs are not doing a very good job, since the list would be the basis for finding commonalities that might lead someplace. If there is a list, keeping it secret serves no useful purpose. Someone might know something about one or more of the victims -- relatives, suspicious acquaintances, usual hangouts -- that could be a lead for investigators.

Beyond that, keeping the victims anonymous serves only to minimize the impact of this epidemic. It makes people care less when they know only that drug users are dying -- nameless, faceless people who made bad choices and were probably a burden. The truth is, each of these victims was someone's son or daughter and very likely had friends and family who tried at some point to stop their slide into the hell of addiction. Some kin may not even know of a death; others may have some useful information for police.

The county has no legal basis for withholding the names. It is well-settled law in Michigan that autopsy results are public information. It is well-established investigative procedure that an informed public can be an important source of information. Wayne County is doing a disservice to the public and to the victims of this scourge by failing to release fundamental information about a mounting crisis.

Office Denies Approving Documents' Release (BSUN)

By Michael Dresser, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, June 7, 2006

The Maryland attorney general's office is denying an assertion that Maryland Transportation Authority Police Chief Gary W. McLhinney received the approval of state lawyers before releasing sensitive security information last month.

The documents McLhinney released included the names of Secret Service agents and other security officers providing executive protection to state and federal officials and their families - details government agencies generally resist disclosing.

The statement that McLhinney had acted on the advice of state lawyers came in an e-mail from another state transportation department law enforcement officer, Maryland Transit Administration Police Chief Douglas DeLeaver, to The Sun's public editor. In it, DeLeaver defended McLhinney, who on May 16 released the documents to the media - an action that was the subject of a May 28 article in The Sun.

DeLeaver wrote: "The Maryland Attorney General's Office reviewed and approved the dissemination of the documents before the release."

But Kevin Enright, a spokesman for Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., denied that McLhinney sought state lawyers' advice.

"If Chief DeLeaver is under the impression that this Office approved Chief McLhinney's document dissemination to The Sun and other news organizations on May 16, he is mistaken," Enright wrote. "As the custodian of the records, Chief McLhinney elected to produce the documents with the knowledge that we did not have the opportunity to perform more than a cursory review and despite our concerns about their contents. That was his right."

DeLeaver and state Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan were at conferences out of the country and did not return calls. McLhinney did not return a call seeking his comment. But Trent Kittleman, executive secretary of the Maryland Transportation Authority, dismissed the matter as "a dead issue."

McLhinney released the documents at a news conference he called to criticize a reporter who sought to speak with one of his officers on an executive protective detail at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport.

The Sun had filed a public records request as part of an investigation of the Transportation Authority Police practice of providing armed escorts for celebrities passing through BWI, an unusual perk at a major U.S. airport.

In his e-mail, DeLeaver criticized The Sun for failing to mention in its May 28 article that "the Maryland Public Information Act requires Chief McLhinney to release the requested documents."

The Sun's request stated that it was seeking forms detailing police escorts to "private citizens (non-government employees)." Nevertheless, McLhinney released 305 pages that included details of travel through BWI by U.S. Cabinet secretaries, National Security Agency and Drug Enforcement Administration officials and other officials.

"The Public Information Act does not require the release of records that are not requested or that are excluded from a request," Enright said.

DOJ_NMG_0032654

In many cases, the documents show signs that they were not fully reviewed before release. In some cases, information is redacted on one document but disclosed on another. On some, material that is usually withheld - such as cell phone numbers and license plate numbers of cars transporting a protected person - is disclosed.

In the May 28 article, experts on executive protection and law enforcement criticized McLhinney for what they called a security violation and a breach of the trust between law enforcement agencies. The Transportation Security Administration said he had not broken federal law by releasing its forms.

Stidham Deposition May Help Schwartz (TC)

By A.J. FLICK

Tucson (AZ) Citizen, June 6, 2006

One week after being sentenced to life in prison and having his medical license yanked, Bradley Alan Schwartz was expected in court today for the start of a malpractice trial.

Among the evidence expected to be presented are words from the man Schwartz was convicted of conspiring to kill, Dr. Brian Stidham.

Stidham told attorneys in a deposition that he never saw Schwartz act as if he were impaired by drugs, said Schwartz's civil attorney, Tom Slutes.

"Dr. Stidham almost never saw Dr. Schwartz," said attorney Thomas Zlaket, who represents the family suing Schwartz.

Stidham went to work for Schwartz in October 2001, shortly before Schwartz stopped taking prescription drugs, Zlaket said.

Schwartz, 41, was convicted May 2 of conspiracy to commit first-degree murder in the Oct. 5, 2004, stabbing death of Stidham.

Prosecutors say Schwartz hired Ronald Bruce Bigger, 40, to kill Stidham, 37, over professional jealousy. Bigger has yet to be tried.

Pima County Superior Court Judge Michael Alfred on Monday refused Slutes' request to move the malpractice trial out of town.

Alfred also ruled that Zlaket may introduce testimony and evidence that Schwartz was indicted in federal court for writing illegal prescriptions for Vicodin and Ritalin.

Laurie Espinoza, Schwartz's former office manager, is expected to say that Schwartz appeared drugged at the time he operated on Garrett Hoxie, then a high school student, in November 2001. Espinoza says Schwartz didn't kick his drug habit until early 2002, after learning that the Drug Enforcement Administration was investigating him.

Espinoza was listed as a witness for both the prosecution and defense in Schwartz's criminal trial, but neither called her to the stand.

Slutes said Schwartz kicked his drug habit in September 2001 after he had treatment that relieved the pain for which he self-prescribed Vicodin. He also self-prescribed Ritalin, a stimulant.

After Schwartz was indicted, Slutes said, Espinoza embezzled from his practice. Schwartz's wife, Joan, caught the embezzlement and sued her.

Espinoza settled the case before it went to trial, he said.

Slutes said Schwartz may testify, depending on how the trial goes.

A week ago, Judge Nanette Warner sentenced Schwartz to life in prison with the possibility of parole after 25 years.

Jurors deadlocked on a first-degree murder charge. Warner dismissed the charge without prejudice, meaning prosecutors can refile it.

Schwartz's criminal attorney, Brick P. Storts III, is asking the Arizona Court of Appeals to force Warner either to drop the charge permanently or retry Schwartz immediately on the murder charge.

Another malpractice suit against Schwartz is set for trial in October.

Feds Search House Of Arizona Reliever (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Federal investigators searched Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley's house Tuesday as part of their investigation of steroid use in baseball.

Thirteen agents searched Grimsley's house in Scottsdale, Ariz., for six hours, according to Internal Revenue Service Agent Mark Lessler, who would not say what they found.

In seeking a judge's permission for the search, investigators who cracked the BALCO steroid scandal here said Grimsley initially cooperated in the probe. He withdrew his assistance in April, but not before he allegedly made "extensive statements" about illegal drug use, "for the purpose of performance enhancement," according to the court documents.

DOJ_NMG_0032655

IRS Agent Jeff Novitsky told the federal judge that investigators wanted to search the right-hander's house for "any and all records showing contact or relationship with any and all amateur or professional athletes, athletic coaches or athletic trainers" regarding illicit drug use and purchases.

According to Novitsky, Grimsley told him the names of other players he believed were using, but the names of those players were blacked out of the court records.

"I have no comment about that and no idea about that," Grimsley told the Arizona Republic on Tuesday, hours before the Diamondbacks played the Philadelphia Phillies.

Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick said in a statement the team learned of "this situation late this afternoon," but declined further comment.

Grimsley began his big league career with Philadelphia in 1989 and has pitched for Cleveland, California, the New York Yankees, Kansas City, Baltimore and Arizona. He has a career record of 42-58 with a 4.77 ERA.

According to court documents, Grimsley failed a league drug test in 2003. Authorities said when he was cooperating, he admitted to using human growth hormone, amphetamines and steroids.

He added that amphetamine use was prevalent in pro baseball, and that it was placed in coffee in clubhouses, marked "leaded" or "unleaded," Novitsky wrote.

After the BALCO investigation, Major League Baseball toughened its testing program for performance enhancing drugs and included testing for amphetamines for the first time this season.

Word of the Grimsley investigation comes nearly two months after an Illinois-based scientist prominent in the field of sports nutritional supplements pleaded guilty to supplying the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative with the performance-enhancing drug known as "the clear."

A federal grand jury in San Francisco is also investigating whether San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds lied under oath about using "the clear." A separate federal grand jury is probing who leaked Bonds' testimony from the BALCO investigation to the San Francisco Chronicle.

So far, the BALCO probe has netted guilty pleas from Illinois-based nutritional supplement scientist Patrick Arnold, BALCO president Victor Conte, Bonds' personal trainer Greg Anderson, BALCO vice president James Valente and track coach Remi Korchemny.

Diamondbacks' Grimsley Implicated In Steroids Probe (AR)

Arizona Republic, June 7, 2006

Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley admitted taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs and said that amphetamines were used "like aspirin" in major league clubhouses, according to an affidavit filed by the lead federal investigator in baseball's steroid investigation.

The affidavit, filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix, said Grimsley agreed to cooperate with U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents after Grimsley received a package containing two kits of human growth hormone April 19 at his Scottsdale home.

The affidavit, obtained by The Arizona Republic, comes nearly four years after the IRS began its probe of BALCO, the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, near San Francisco. The original goal was to investigate a drug ring that distributed steroids and other illegal performance-enhancing drugs to elite athletes.

advertisement

Thirteen special federal agents, including 10 from the IRS, searched Grimsley's home for nearly six hours Tuesday. They were seeking performance-enhancing drugs, financial records, address books and phone records, according to Mark Lessler, an IRS special agent.

Lessler, a special agent for criminal investigation in the IRS Oakland, Calif., office, declined to say what was obtained, or why the government waited nearly seven weeks to search Grimsley's home after knowing the pitcher had been in possession of human growth hormone.

It is the first time an Arizona Diamondbacks player has been linked publicly to the scandal, which has implicated San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, New York Yankees first baseman Jason Giambi and others.

Grimsley provided "extensive statements regarding his receipt and use of anabolic steroids, amphetamines and human growth hormone over the last several years," the affidavit said.

Grimsley also provided "details about his knowledge of other Major League Baseball players" using illegal performance-enhancing drugs, including several close acquaintances.

An hour before Tuesday night's game against Philadelphia, Grimsley told The Republic, "I have no comment about that and no idea about that."

Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick released a statement on the matter Tuesday night, saying: "We were first informed of this situation late this afternoon. This is a federal investigation, and as long as it is active and ongoing, we are prohibited from making any further comments."

Jeff Novitzky, the IRS special agent in charge of the BALCO case, filed the affidavit, which also said agents were anticipating the shipment of human growth hormones to Grimsley's home. In a two-hour interview with federal investigators on April 19, Grimsley told investigators:

· Until last year, major league clubhouses had coffee pots labeled "leaded" and "unleaded" for the players, indicating coffee with amphetamines and without. He did not specify how many.

· Latin players were a major source for the amphetamines within baseball.

· Amphetamines also came from players on California teams that could easily go into Mexico and get them.

Names of other players he suspected of using anabolic steroids or human growth hormone were redacted from the document.

In September 2003, the IRS and Food and Drug Administration agents raided the offices of BALCO and at an off-site facility found containers labeled as steroids, testosterone and human-growth hormones, which can make athletes stronger and faster.

No professional athlete has been charged in the BALCO investigation, although Bonds and Giambi testified before a federal grand jury in 2003.

Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig this spring appointed former U.S. Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell to investigate players who were alleged to have used illegal steroids.

Mitchell's appointment came after pressure from Congress and the release this spring of Game of Shadows, a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who describe how Bonds and other players used illegal performance-enhancing drugs provided by BALCO.

Until 2003, baseball didn't conduct drug tests for steroids. The following year, it began imposing penalties.

Last July, BALCO founder Victor Conte Jr, the central figure in the investigation, pleaded guilty to distributing steroids and money laundering in a plea-bargain deal. He was sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest.

Three others, including Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer, have negotiated deals with federal prosecutors for their roles in providing illegal performance-enhancing drugs to roughly 30 athletes.

Montel To Urge N.J. On Medical Marijuana (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Television personality Montel Williams plans to tell a New Jersey senate panel on Thursday how marijuana relieves his chronic pain caused by multiple sclerosis, and urge New Jersey lawmakers to enact medical marijuana laws, as 11 other states already have.

Williams, 49, who was diagnosed with MS seven years ago, said he turned to marijuana to relieve debilitating knee and foot pain after trying Oxycontin and a variety of other drugs to no avail.

Williams, a registered medical marijuana user in California, said he became an activist pushing for medical marijuana laws after being stopped at a Detroit airport by an Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms officer for carrying drug paraphernalia. The charge was later dropped.

"For me, marijuana eases the pain in my feet -- on a scale of 1 to 10, brings it from a 6 down to a 4 and keeps it there -- makes it manageable so I can deal with the rest of my day," said Williams. "Why should it not be available?"

Williams also plans to speak Wednesday at a Drug Policy Alliance-sponsored news conference supporting the New Jersey Compassionate Use Medical Marijuana Act. He said he was also hoping to discuss the issue with Gov. Jon S. Corzine, though the governor's office said as of Tuesday Williams hadn't requested a meeting.

Corzine said last year that he would sign a medical marijuana bill into law.

Reiterating the administration's position Tuesday, Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said, "All individuals should receive the best possible medical care available. If a doctor prescribes medical marijuana, we should honor his or her judgment and do what is in the best interest of the patient."

The proposal would allow certain chronically ill patients to use marijuana medicinally by smoking it, eating it or taking it in tablets. The drug would be prescribed by a doctor and the program would be monitored by the state Health Department. Under the proposal, the amount of marijuana a patient would be allowed to possess would be capped at one ounce and patients would be issued cards identifying them as registered medical marijuana users.

The bill, sponsored by state Sen. Nicholas Scutari, lists cancer, glaucoma, HIV and AIDS, wasting syndrome, chronic pain, severe nausea, seizures and persistent muscle spasms as among the conditions eligible for medical marijuana usage.

DOJ_NMG_0032657

Terrence P. Farley, an Ocean County assistant prosecutor and spokesman for two state law enforcement groups, told The Associated Press last month that the bill is a veiled attempt to legalize drugs.

"This is how they're trying to get marijuana legalized," said Farley, who also is director of the county anti-narcotics force.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Confident Immigration Deal Possible (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The AP, June 6, 2006

President Bush declared progress Tuesday in tightening the nation's southern border and pushing major immigration changes through Congress despite widespread skepticism that lawmakers can find a compromise.

The president brushed aside bitter divisions over the issue, saying the fact that there is active debate at all is cause for optimism.

"I know when you watch your television or listen to the radio, it seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," Bush said, a blazing sun beating down on him and the barn behind him used to simulate armed encounters in Border Patrol training exercises.

"Yet there's a growing consensus among all parties and all regions of the country that fundamental reforms are needed," he said.

Bush spoke after watching trainees in the dusty heat role-play in ways to protect the U.S.-Mexico border against illegal crossings — boarding buses to check IDs, aiming pretend guns at a vehicle under suspicion, interviewing car occupants at checkpoints and scouring freight cars.

As the Border Patrol's only training ground, the 2,000-acre facility in this unforgiving corner of southeastern New Mexico has been increasingly busy. The number of agents nationwide has grown to nearly 12,000 from 9,000 at the beginning of Bush's presidency, and Bush is proposing to add another 6,000 agents by 2008.

Later Tuesday, the president took in a video surveillance operation at the Border Patrol headquarters in Laredo, Texas, also hot and dry, and a busy crossing point near Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, where warring drug cartels have been blamed for more than 140 murders this year.

The visuals of Bush's two border-state stops focused on enforcement — a key theme as the president woos recalcitrant conservatives in his party to abandon a get-tough-only approach and support comprehensive reform. Bush says that, to be effective, any legislation should include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants that meet certain criteria and create a new program allowing legal work permits for foreigners. He has been promoting his seriousness about stepped-up enforcement to sweeten that argument.

But the emphasis of the president's spoken message was agreement.

He claimed "widespread agreement" on broad philosophical points such as the need to better control the border and stiffen penalties on companies that hire illegal immigrants. The implication was that, as congressional negotiators prepare for difficult talks over the radically different bills passed by the House and Senate, there is more to work with than it appears.

"While the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking," Bush said.

He pressed the point again outside the Laredo headquarters. Appearing eager to dispel doubts, Bush engaged in an impromptu question-and-answer session with reporters that extended over an unusually lengthy time despite temperatures over 100 degrees.

With dozens of Border Patrol vehicles behind him, Bush said it is important for congressional negotiations to get started.

"That will give us a pretty good feel for whether or not attitudes are hardened to the point nothing can get done," he said. "I don't think so."

The president's statements belied passionate differences on Capitol Hill, where even routine matters are getting bogged down. The Senate has not yet sent its bill to the House, so that talks can begin, because of a procedural disagreement.

The House bill generally is limited to increased border enforcement, making all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and advocating extensive fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. The Senate version includes more money for border security, but it creates a guest worker program that would legally bring in new foreign workers and provides a shot at citizenship for many already here.

Bush acknowledged the sharp divide over the status of the country's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants.

"This is the toughest part of the bill for the Congress," he said.

Bush's appearance is one of a series as he pushes his top domestic priority of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0032658

"A photo-op in New Mexico won't make Republicans in Washington, D.C., support comprehensive reform," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said. "The president must convince his party to enact the comprehensive immigration reform our nation deserves."

Also while in Laredo, the former Texas governor made two unscheduled stops to mingle with locals. He shook hands outside an elementary school and pulled up to Cotulla Pit-Style Barbeque, where he greeted surprised diners in Spanish and English and bought nachos for a long table of border agents who just happened to be assembled there.

The president was spending Tuesday night in Omaha, Neb., where he planned on Wednesday to visit a community center that offers bilingual counseling, food aid, legal services and business training to immigrants.

Nation Ahead Of Congress On Immigration, Bush Says (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. — President Bush today sought to minimize the differences that have divided the House and Senate over immigration, and said that consensus was growing across the country for changes in immigration policy, as he focused on the need for strict law enforcement in a speech to Border Patrol recruits.

"It seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," Bush said. "Yet there's a growing consensus among all parties and all regions of the country that fundamental reforms are needed."

"In other words, people are coming to the conclusion we got to do something about a system that isn't working," he said at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, in southeastern New Mexico about 100 miles from the Mexican border. "And while the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking."

The center is a 2,540-acre campus ringed with barbed wire. Recruits undergo a 19 1/2-week training schedule that features intense physical workouts, vehicle pursuits, firearms use, self-defense and Spanish language classes.

"Our failure rate is 30-to-1," said Maria Valencia, spokesperson for the U.S. Border Patrol, explaining that the center graduates one border agent for every 30 applicants.

In May, Bush called for an increase of 6,000 in the Border Patrol by 2008 — a 50% increase over current levels.

The facility here, where all the agents are trained, can graduate 1,700 a year.

With Bush looking on, recruits demonstrated scenarios for capturing illegal immigrants, among them a checkpoint, halting a vehicle, and checking a train.

Recruits use three rail cars, deployed on tracks in the middle of their campus, to learn how to look for illegal immigrants smuggled in boxcars.

With temperatures nearing 100 degrees, Bush emphasized that despite the angry debate over immigration, there was agreement over the need to control the nation's borders "so that every illegal immigrant caught at the border" is sent home.

"We agree that the government needs to crack down on businesses that hire illegal workers," he said. "In other words, in order to help you do your job, we all agree that if someone's hiring somebody who's an illegal immigrant, they've broken the law and we need to crack down on that."

"We agree that it's unacceptable to have millions of illegal immigrants living in our country beyond the reach of law and the protection of law," he said, adding: "And we all agree that immigrants to America must assimilate into our society. They must embrace our values and learn to speak the English language."

With the Congress far from beginning work on reconciling the immigration measures passed by the House and Senate, Bush is seeking to minimize the differences, and encouraging the yet-to-be-named conferees representing each chamber to find common ground.

The House bill focuses exclusively on law enforcement measures; the Senate bill, more to Bush's liking, takes a broader approach, addressing law enforcement efforts as well as paths that could legally approved work in the United States for foreign residents and to eventual citizenship.

Pressing for steps that could appeal to both those favoring a crackdown on illegal border-crossing and those seeking access to the American job market for immigrants, the president noted that he had asked Congress "to increase the number of detention facilities along our borders" and also said the nation needed to acknowledge that it was a magnet for job-seekers.

"It seems to me if we want to protect this border, we ought to recognize they're coming, and give them a temporary worker card," the president said.

Bush Turns To House In Immigration Debate (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032659

ARTESIA, N.M., June 6 — President Bush tried on Tuesday to win back the trust of conservatives who have distanced themselves from him on immigration, promising to "get this border enforced" and warning those who enter the country illegally that "if you get caught, you get sent home."

After weeks of embracing "comprehensive immigration reform" — Washington shorthand for a Senate bill that includes a temporary guest-worker program and a promise of citizenship for some illegal immigrants — Mr. Bush shifted his tone in remarks at the Border Patrol training academy here. Having nudged the Senate into action, Mr. Bush is turning his attention to the House, where Republicans deride the Senate plan as amnesty and are balking at the idea of compromise.

After watching Border Patrol trainees conduct mock security stops under a blistering 100-degree sun, Mr. Bush told the agents "I want the country to pay attention to what you're doing."

He promised to add 6,000 agents by 2008 — bringing the total to 18,000 — to build high-tech fences and new patrol roads, and "to end 'catch and release' once and for all on the southern border of the United States," a reference to the practice of releasing those who enter illegally and are not immediately sent home.

The image of Mr. Bush, his collar open and his starched blue shirt sleeves rolled up, surrounded by Border Patrol agents and trainees clad in olive drab uniforms in the dusty New Mexico desert, was carefully calibrated to sell the president's plan to the American people — and, by extension, their representatives in Washington.

But the president's tough talk failed to persuade at least one House Republican, Representative Steve Pearce, who represents Artesia. Mr. Pearce said he was "not on board with the comprehensive plan," even after flying here with Mr. Bush on Air Force One — a flight that included a private briefing from the chief of the Border Patrol, David V. Aguilar, with the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, hovering nearby. Mr. Pearce said he was encouraged that "the idea of securing the border is beginning to be a more dominant theme," but he warned that Congress was in danger of repeating a failed 1986 amnesty law.

"I trust him," Mr. Pearce said of the president, "but I'm not going to vote for the bill as it currently stands. Out here, we have a saying, 'Trust your neighbor, but brand your cattle,' and the president will understand that."

Mr. Bush's midday appearance here was the first stop on a two-day three-state swing, and came on the day of New Mexico's primary election. Later, he stopped on the border in Laredo, Tex., where he toured a video surveillance office at the local Border Patrol headquarters.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush plans to visit a Catholic relief organization in Omaha, where he intends to emphasize that immigrants must learn English and assimilate into American society. Here again, his intent is to assuage conservatives, many of whom were put off by the sight of demonstrators for immigrants rights waving the Mexican flag.

But with more than half the American public disapproving of Mr. Bush's job performance and a midterm election in which Republicans are far more concerned with their own political futures than that of the president, Mr. Bush's powers of persuasion are not what they once were. Even the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, acknowledged that the hurdles to reaching a compromise were high.

"It's going to be a considerable amount of work, yes," Mr. Snow said.

And while Mr. Bush is trying to pitch his plan out in the country, some on Capitol Hill say he needs to get to work behind the scenes in Washington to bring the House and the Senate together.

"This is more than an Oval Office speech, and it's more than going to New Mexico," Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in an interview on Monday. Mr. Specter added, "I think he's got to get involved in the negotiations, in the nuts and bolts."

Even on that score, Mr. Bush must tread lightly; his relations with Republicans in Congress have soured in recent months over issues like port security and a raid by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on a congressman's office.

"That's a touchy issue," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and a member of the Judiciary Committee, who said Mr. Specter told him, too, that the president needed to get involved. "Under the Constitution, the president doesn't write the legislation. Depending on how he were to handle it, I think it could well result in some pushback from members of the House who weren't on the same page."

One House Republican who has been a staunch foe of Mr. Bush on immigration, Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado, said there was not much the president could do to bring the two sides together. "I don't think there's a thing he can say," Mr. Tancredo said.

But Mr. Bush struck an optimistic note, insisting that there is a "a growing consensus" toward compromise.

"I know when you watch your televisions or listen to the radio it seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," he said. He added, "While the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking."

House Passes Security Budget

By The New York Times

DOJ_NMG_0032660

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Spending on port and border security would increase by about 9 percent in the coming year, as part of a $32.08 billion budget for the Department of Homeland Security that the House approved Tuesday by a 389-to-9 vote.

The plan includes money to hire 2,400 new border patrol and immigration agents and screen more ship containers entering the United States for radioactive threats.

Bush Defends Planned Path To Citizenship (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, June 7, 2006

LAREDO - In a parking lot of the Border Patrol headquarters three miles from the dividing line with Mexico, President Bush on Tuesday accused his opponents in the immigration battle of stirring up fear with false claims about amnesty.

"Look, if you're one of these types of people that basically say, you know, throw them out, then you just use the word 'amnesty,' just toss it around," Bush said. "In order to frighten people, you just say 'amnesty.' "

Standing with Gov. Rick Perry after a tour of the Laredo Border Patrol Sector's video surveillance program, Bush stepped up his criticism of lawmakers back in Washington balking at his call to create a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who have lived in the country for years.

It was a fine line Bush tried to walk. Earlier in the day, at a tour of the Border Patrol training facility in New Mexico, Bush struck conciliatory tones and said both sides in the debate have more common ground than differences.

"I know when you watch your television or listen to the radio it seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," Bush told Border Patrol agents in Artesia, N.M. "Yet there's a growing consensus ... that fundamental reforms are needed."

Looking for middle ground

Bush was in Laredo as part of a two-day trip highlighting immigration issues, as Congress prepares to iron out the differences between somewhat contradictory measures passed in the House and Senate.

"There's no question this is a difficult issue for some in Washington, D.C., but my job is to continue calling people to account," Bush said.

He supports a Senate bill that includes a guest worker program, tougher border enforcement and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who have spent years in the U.S., with a requirement that they pay fines and back taxes and show a proficiency in English.

Both of Texas' Republican senators, Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, voted against the legislation.

"The failures of the 1986 amnesty live on today, and we will need to work very hard to avoid a repeat of those mistakes," Cornyn said Tuesday as lawmakers returned to Capitol Hill. "My hope is that this summer we'll find a middle ground solution that controls illegal immigration and addresses the 12 million illegal immigrants without granting amnesty."

Last December, the House passed a bill that would make it a felony to enter the country illegally or to help those that do. The bill would also increase border security and strictly enforce immigration laws.

To build support for his guest worker and citizenship proposals, Bush has taken a tough stand on the law and order aspects of border enforcement, including calling for more walls and fencing along heavily trafficked areas of the border.

Rep. Henry Cuellar, a Democrat from Laredo, said residents in his community want protection — but not a wall.

"I think people feel that, when it comes to border security, we say 'heck yes,' " Cuellar said. "But when the discussion turns to building a wall, that's a big no."

Chatting with the locals

Laredo, with a population that is 94.9 percent Hispanic, is the most Hispanic city in the United States, according to the Census Bureau.

Cuellar said that generally, he hears support from his constituents for a requirement that new immigrants learn English. There is also concern, he says, about a threat to jobs from continued illegal immigration.

"They want a guest worker plan, but with controls," he said. "They want security, but they don't want to see Minutemen."

While in Laredo, Bush made two unscheduled stops, pulling the motorcade over on a main commercial street to visit briefly with schoolchildren, and stopping at a Mexican-style barbecue joint to meet with residents and border guards.

"¿Como estas?" Bush greeted patrons at Cotulla's, a restaurant decorated with deer heads. "You know your governor?" he asked, gesturing at Perry.

"Howdy," Perry said, greeting a family having dinner.

Such encounters, carefully planned but unannounced, are part of a larger White House strategy to remind Americans why they once liked him so much and use his personal popularity to help sell a controversial immigration program.

DOJ_NMG_0032661

Ray Keck, president of Texas A&M University International in Laredo, said he supports much of Bush's plan, but thinks more economic help for Mexico also would ease illegal immigration woes.

"We are heartened by the president's plan. We must look for a policy that would allow these people to become legal, tax-paying residents, a profitable part of our national workforce," Keck said.

Bush Visits Laredo To Plug Reform Plan (SAEN)

By Mariano Castillo And Gary Martin

San Antonio Express-News, June 7, 2006

LAREDO — In an effort to push an immigration bill through Congress that would secure the borders and allow for a guest worker program, President Bush toured a Border Patrol facility here during a brief visit Tuesday.

Bush's visit was the first to this city by a U.S. president since Richard Nixon in 1970.

It was part of a three-city tour to promote a bill that would increase security along the border and give undocumented immigrants who've lived in the United States for several years a path to citizenship.

In Laredo, Bush toured a video surveillance facility at Border Patrol headquarters with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Gov. Rick Perry.

In the surveillance room, the president observed more than a dozen screens displaying various points along the border.

"The Guard's going to help Border Patrol agents, so they can get out and do their job," Bush said, referring to 6,000 National Guard troops slated for deployment to the border.

Bush said a long-term solution to reduce the number of illegal crossings is to find work for them in Mexico.

"One of the interesting things about the border here that I don't think a lot of Americans are aware, but I know that those of us who grew up in Texas are aware of it, is that this part of the world used to be really poor," Bush said.

The North American Free Trade Agreement has started the process of producing jobs and wealth on both sides of the border, the president said, making Laredo a "booming town."

Asked by a local reporter if his immigration reform plan included raising the number of immigrants who can legally enter the country, Bush said he would leave that up to Congress.

Bush is trying to build momentum for an immigration bill that passed the Senate with bipartisan support. It faces stiff opposition in the House, which passed its own bill calling for strict border enforcement.

Hundreds of Laredoans lined Bush's motorcade route and gave him a mixed welcome.

"I've been waiting for this for a long time," David Bustamente, 18, said as he and some friends held up black poster boards with pro-gay-rights messages criticizing Bush support for a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

Only a few feet away, a group of middle school teachers cheered Bush and his immigration plan.

"Instead of the extreme, he's in the middle," said Nancy Chamberlain, a retired teacher.

Earlier, Bush toured a Border Patrol training facility in Artesia, N.M., reiterating the thin line he weaves between his vision for border enforcement and that of some in his party who want stricter measures, including a provision that would make a first-time undocumented entry a felony.

Bush also traveled to Omaha, Neb., where he was scheduled to visit a Catholic charity and speak at a college.

Bush Sees Support For Immigration Plan (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. -- President Bush yesterday said he sees a consensus building in Congress for the major elements of his immigration proposal, including a path to citizenship, and said the gap between the House and Senate is not that broad.

"While the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking," Mr. Bush said. He was speaking at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in eastern New Mexico, which is where all U.S. Border Patrol agents train and which is the key to his making good on his promise to hire 6,000 new Border Patrol agents by 2008.

The president said everyone in the immigration debate agrees that the border needs to be secured, that the government needs to crack down on businesses that hire illegal aliens and that something must be done about the estimated 12 million illegal aliens in the country.

"There's a consensus, and we need to act on that broad consensus and deliver comprehensive reform that makes our system orderly, secure and fair," he said.

House Republicans said Mr. Bush has made headway in convincing them he is serious about border security, but he has failed to sway them on granting citizenship to some illegal aliens.

DOJ_NMG_0032662

After Mr. Bush in mid-May announced plans to increase the Border Patrol and deploy the National Guard, Rep. Steve Pearce, whose district includes the training academy, said the president didn't go far enough. But yesterday, after flying with the president on Air Force One and being briefed by Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar, he said he thinks the administration has become serious about border security.

"They actually have begun to develop a comprehensive plan for securing the border, which we haven't been able to see before," Mr. Pearce, New Mexico Republican, said.

Despite Mr. Bush's view that compromise is in the air, Mr. Pearce said he is still adamantly opposed to amnesty, which he described as when illegal aliens are given any path to citizenship.

"Sorry, but that's the wrong message," he said, adding that he would vote against a bill such as the one that came out of the Senate and includes the same path to citizenship Mr. Bush backs.

The Border Patrol academy in Artesia will determine whether Mr. Bush makes good on his pledge to hire 6,000 new Border Patrol agents by 2008. Currently there are about 11,300.

For the past few years, as members of Congress have tried to increase substantially the number of agents, they were told the academy simply couldn't train that many. But the administration has announced it is ramping up operations here to handle Mr. Bush's request, though a spokeswoman couldn't say how much it has asked for in next year's budget.

The academy currently can train 1,700 agents a year, and at peak capacity two years from now plans to be able to train 3,000 agents annually.

Only one in 30 applicants will make it to becoming a Border Patrol agent.

Before speaking yesterday, Mr. Bush reviewed part of the training in the 19½-week course, including mock traffic stops. He then traveled to Laredo, Texas, to visit the Border Patrol sector headquarters there.

Also yesterday Mr. Bush seemed to float the idea of decreasing legal immigration overall by increasing the line for green cards and citizenship.

"If Congress is worried about the number of people getting in, they can decrease the number of green cards," he said.

"You can control the size of the line by the number of green cards you issue. If you want a longer line for people, issue fewer green cards. If you want to shorten the line, issue more green cards," he said.

Bush Pushes Immigration Plan In New Mexico (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M., June 6 -- President Bush returned to the U.S.-Mexico border region Tuesday to tout what he described as a growing consensus around proposed immigration reforms and see firsthand how new border agents are being taught to keep people from entering the country illegally.

In Washington, House Republicans are showing little sign of meeting the president's demands on a comprehensive immigration plan. But appearing at the training facility here for border agents, Bush sounded an optimistic note that agreement is possible on plans to increase border security, crack down on employers hiring illegal immigrants and help immigrants assimilate into U.S. society.

"People are coming to the conclusion we got to do something about a system that isn't working," said Bush, clad in shirt sleeves in the searing sun. "And while the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking."

Bush broke little ground substantively in his speech to border agents and agents in training, repeating many of the same points he had made since announcing his general approach to immigration in a nationally televised address last month. But aides say he is trying to build grass-roots support in advance of negotiations aimed at reconciling House and Senate bills that take sharply different approaches toward undocumented workers.

The president is also trying quiet diplomacy. Joining Bush on Air Force One on the trip from Washington were two New Mexico representatives who have been critical of the president for various aspects of his plan, Democrat Tom Udall and Republican Steve Pearce. During the trip, Pearce said, the two received a briefing from David Aguilar, chief of the Border Patrol, who outlined a more aggressive approach to keeping illegal immigrants from entering New Mexico.

"They actually have begun to develop a comprehensive plan for securing the border which we have not seen before," Pearce said.

A key sticking point for Pearce and other House Republicans is the president's plan for resolving the status of millions of illegal immigrants already in this country. The bill approved by the Senate would allow illegal immigrants who have been here at least five years a way to become citizens if they pay fines and back taxes and learn English; the House plan would make illegal presence in this country a felony.

DOJ_NMG_0032663

The president has been supportive of the Senate approach, and in his speech Tuesday indicated that he does not regard such an approach as "amnesty" because illegal immigrants would have to get behind legal immigrants in line for citizenship. He added: "If Congress is worried about the number of people getting in, they can decrease the number of green cards. . . . If you want a longer line for people, issue fewer green cards."

Despite Bush's growing emphasis on border security, House conservatives remain wary of any final bill that would make undocumented immigrants legal. Despite the president's statement, "most Americans" consider his plan to be amnesty, said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leading conservative. "There's just no support at home or in my heart."

But New Mexico's Democratic governor, Bill Richardson, who attended the speech here and met privately with Bush, said the president indicated he would deploy even more assets to overcome such doubts. "I came away with two strong impressions -- that he is sincerely eager to get a comprehensive bill, and that at the appropriate time he will weigh in heavily," Richardson said.

Before his speech here, Bush watched as agents in training staged various scenes depicting what it is like to work on the border. First was a document check of passengers on a bus, followed by agents scrambling over three train cars, yelling statements such as "All clear on the bottom" as lids and doors clanged. Bush also watched as agents staged a routine traffic stop, speaking in Spanish to a suspect who had his hands up while they trained on him what appeared to be plastic guns. He later flew to Laredo, Tex., to visit a regional Border Patrol facility. He watched screens monitoring different points on the border.

Earlier, he made an unannounced stop at Cotulla Style Pit Bar-B-Q, where he greeted diners in Spanish and English before sitting down with a dozen or so border agents around a long table. "Why don't we bring a couple of plates of nachos?" he asked.

Senate Candidates Choose Their Battles On Immigration Debate (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, June 7, 2006

In a new radio ad, Republican challenger John Raese criticizes Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) for opposing the deployment of troops to secure the U.S. border.

But Byrd's campaign notes that, during debate on the Senate immigration bill two weeks ago, the senator actually voted for an amendment that would have done just that. Raese's camp said the ads are based on an earlier newspaper article in which Byrd expresses reservations about the troops' being overworked.

Raese is one of several Senate candidates across the country using the finer points of the immigration debate as campaign fodder in advertisements and press releases. Their efforts are working to varying degrees of success to differentiate them from their opponents, who are firing back in much the same manner.

Only two Republicans facing tough reelection campaigns — Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) — were among the 23 in their party voting for final passage of the bill, and three of the four Democratic no votes were cast by vulnerable candidates.

When asked about Byrd's vote on the National Guard amendment, Raese spokesman Gary Abernathy said Byrd's final no vote on the entire immigration package represents an example of a senator voting for a bill before voting against it, a reference to Sen. John Kerry's infamous comments during the 2004 presidential campaign about his voting preliminarily for a bill funding the war in Iraq and Afghanistan and later voting against the measure.

But Abernathy said Raese would also have voted against the overall bill.

The Associated Press article Abernathy is referring to says that Byrd "questioned whether the National Guard is stretched too thin for such duty" and quotes Byrd saying that West Virginia National Guardsmen have "taken on two, three, sometimes four tours of duty in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Byrd spokesman Mark Ferrell said the senator simply wanted to make sure that the troops' mission was clear and that it wasn't a political stunt, and he was satisfied in both regards.

"Anybody with access to the Internet can look up any member of Congress's votes, and I would assume that the Raese campaign has that ability," Ferrell said. "So it beats the heck out of me — I don't know where they're basing that."

Though in recent months several campaign ads have been taken off the air for accuracy reasons, Ferrell said the Byrd campaign would rather get the truth out instead of challenge the ads.

In Rhode Island, Republican primary challenger Steve Laffey has singled out Chafee for being the only Republican to vote for an amendment to the immigration bill that would have allowed 12 million illegal immigrants to remain in the country and streamlined the legalization process.

He said Chafee's votes on that amendment and against another amendment, which would have prevented legalized immigrants from collecting Social Security benefits for work they did as illegal immigrants, show just how far left Chafee has shifted.

DOJ_NMG_0032664

Laffey spokeswoman Nachama Soloveichik said Laffey would have voted against the overall bill.

Chafee spokesman Ian Lang countered by noting that Chafee's stance on immigration is similar to President Bush's and that the final bill makes the legalization process sufficiently difficult.

He said Laffey's past actions on immigration contrast with his recent statements, referring specifically to the Cranston, R.I., mayor's support for allowing the use of identification cards issued by the Guatemalan and Mexican embassies — a practice that a Center for Immigration Studies report says is useful only for illegal immigrants. Lang also cited a Providence Journal article from early 2005 in which Laffey advocated having American companies like Wal-Mart set up employment centers at the border to recruit illegal crossers, and then the U.S. government, in turn, give them short-term visas.

Lang said Chafee doesn't outright oppose the foreign-embassy ID cards but has major concerns about them.

Soloveichik pointed out that the Justice Department has permitted the use of the cards, and she said they can be useful for temporary legal immigrants and also for police identifying illegal immigrants. She said the practice of sending recruiters to the border would promote legal immigration, which is consistent with Laffey's stance.

In Arizona, Democratic challenger Jim Pederson criticized Sen. Jon Kyl's (R) no vote on the final bill, charging that the vote was the culmination of his work to kill the legislation. In ads and releases, Pederson cites Arizona Republican colleague Sen. John McCain as saying that Kyl's immigration plan "borders on fantasy."

McCain said he was disappointed that Pederson used him to attack Kyl. Kyl's campaign said his plan is oriented toward striking some middle ground between the Senate and House bills and that Kyl and McCain worked closely together to get the Senate bill through important votes.

In New Jersey, Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr. criticized Sen. Robert Menendez (D) for opposing the amendment that would cut off legalized immigrants from getting Social Security benefits and others amendments that would make English the official language and would build a fence along the Mexican border.

Menendez, who voted for final passage, has charged Kean with flip-flopping by first supporting a path to citizenship and then asking for deportation of all illegal immigrants. Kean clarified his position in the local Herald News that people who are unable to return to their home countries and apply for citizenship should pay fines.

Around the country, other candidates are making emphatic statements as well.

In Montana, Sen. Conrad Burns (R) has aired an ad that calls out both of his Democratic opponents for not taking firm stances on the immigration debate.

In Pennsylvania, Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr. said the bill wasn't perfect but noted that he would have voted for it and that it does not provide amnesty, as his opponent, Sen. Rick Santorum (R), contends.

And in Tennessee, all three major Republican candidates running to replace Sen. Bill Frist (R) and the likely Democratic candidate, Rep. Harold Ford, denounced the bill as too lenient because it provides a path to citizenship. Frist voted for the bill.

Public, Bush Split On Illegals (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. -- President Bush has been making a strong push for illegal aliens to assimilate as he stumps for passage of a plan to legalize most of them, but a new poll shows that voters actually want less immigration and more security.

And even Mr. Bush's own pollster, in another recent poll, failed to ask about a pathway to citizenship, instead focusing on temporary legal status for illegal aliens -- a concept Mr. Bush no longer endorses.

About half of those surveyed in the new poll by MWR Strategies said the immigration problem facing the U.S. is "too much immigration," while just 29 percent identified the problem as "not enough assimilation."

Michael McKenna, who conducted the poll of 1,000 registered voters, said it suggests that Mr. Bush is moving in the wrong direction by embracing a path to citizenship.

"The practical import of it is, all this yak-yak about path to citizenship -- more than half the population looks at it and says there's just too much. We need less of it," he said.

"If you think the problem is just too much immigration, you don't care about path to citizenship or any of that other stuff."

When asked the best way to address immigration, 36 percent said penalize businesses for hiring illegal aliens, while 35 percent said create a path to citizenship and 17 percent said build a wall.

The Bush administration has been trying to convince skeptical Republicans in Congress that voters prefer a comprehensive solution to immigration and back Mr. Bush, who yesterday said a consensus is building in Congress for the major elements of his immigration proposal, including a path to citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0032665

A recent memo by Matthew Dowd, Mr. Bush's pollster and a senior adviser to the Republican National Committee (RNC), argues that "the comprehensive approach that emphasizes both security and compassion is unifying, not polarizing -- it is supported by Republicans, independents, and Democrats."

But Mr. Dowd didn't ask about a path to citizenship, which opponents call "amnesty," in his most recent survey, taken after Mr. Bush made his Oval Office address to the nation arguing for that proposal. Instead, Mr. Dowd asked about temporary workers, who would return home.

Mr. Dowd is advising Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign in California and was unavailable, according to the RNC. But a party official, who asked not to be named, said they simply didn't ask about that part of Mr. Bush's plan.

"The survey clearly asks about a comprehensive approach to immigration. We did not ask support questions regarding path to citizenship in this particular poll," the official said.

Mr. McKenna criticized Mr. Dowd's memo, saying it's "not inaccurate as far as it goes, but it's sure misleading."

"The questions themselves are clearly skewed, don't come to the heart of the issue in any important kind of way and are clearly biased in favor of one side," he said. "The weight of the numbers and the weight of the evidence suggests that people's main concern is border security and they view most of these proposals as amnesty."

Those who support a middle-ground route of giving illegal aliens temporary status but not a path to citizenship said Mr. Dowd's polling actually supports their plan.

"What is clear from this poll is that a work-and-return program, a bill that has not passed the Senate, can receive significant support," said Don Stewart, spokesman for Sen. John Cornyn, the Texas Republican who supports a temporary program but opposes a path to citizenship. "That's the third way in this whole debate."

Dan Bartlett, senior counselor to the president, says the public is behind Mr. Bush.

In a memo Monday, Mr. Bartlett said proposals to allow long-time illegal aliens a path to citizenship scored 79 percent in a CNN poll taken right after Mr. Bush's speech last month and 77 percent in a CBS News poll.

"The president is leading the country and the Republican Party in a direction he thinks is right, and opinion polls show Americans strongly support a comprehensive approach," he said.

Those who support a path to citizenship have made some headway in public opinion on how voters see the people who are the subject of the debate.

When Mr. McKenna polled in 2004, after Mr. Bush made his first major immigration speech detailing a guest-worker program, 73 percent saw the noncitizens as "illegal aliens," while 25 percent saw them as "undocumented workers." In his new poll, 62 percent said they are "illegal aliens" and 30 percent said they are "undocumented workers."

Sergio Bendixen, considered one of the top pollsters of Hispanic voters and immigration issues, said the difference between asking about "illegal immigrant" and "undocumented worker" can mean a swing of 20 percentage points in the answers.

Mr. Bendixen said Mr. Bush still has a chance to influence the debate but said he's having only a slight impact on the debate.

"I think the president is very weak right now politically. I don't think he's got a lot of credibility," he said.

House GOP Threatens To 'blue-slip' Bill (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 7, 2006

Lawmakers are shrouding themselves in a thin slip of blue paper as deep divisions on immigration policy are again being laid bare.

House Republicans have threatened to deliver a "blue slip" rejection of the Senate immigration bill, and Senate Democrats are blocking efforts to circumvent that maneuver.

The result is a procedural paralysis that has prevented the two chambers from even naming conference negotiators, a clear sign of the difficulties facing proponents of an immigration overhaul.

The Senate-written immigration bill contains tax provisions, violating the Constitution's requirement that all revenue measures originate in the House. Any House member could object to the Senate bill on that basis, forcing debate and a vote on whether to reject the measure outright.

Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) is considered the most likely to raise such an objection, but any number of House conservatives would be happy to kill the Senate bill. To avoid that fate, Senate Republican leaders want to bring up a separate House-passed tax bill, gut it and replace its provisions with the Senate immigration bill. But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has objected to that maneuver.

DOJ_NMG_0032666

Reid said he is concerned that using a House-passed tax vehicle could invite the introduction of unrelated tax cuts into House-Senate conference negotiations. If President Bush wants progress on the bill, he should tell House Republicans, “Don’t raise the blue-slip issue,” Reid said.

But Republicans say the problem is Reid, not the blue slip.

“Unfortunately, the minority leader over there, Harry Reid, continues to stand in the way,” House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday. “I think he ought to quit playing politics.”

As lawmakers engaged a new round of finger-pointing yesterday, one thing remained clear: The immigration bill is stuck.

Conservative Republicans are dead-set against the Senate bill, which would beef up border security, establish a temporary-worker program and allow many of the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country now to become citizens eventually.

The House version focuses solely on border security, and many House Republicans say the Senate bill would grant amnesty to millions of immigrants who broke the law to get here.

But proponents of the Senate bill say the blue-slip threat is merely a distraction, one of a number of tools the bill’s critics could use to thwart its progress if they chose to do so. If the will exists to strike a deal, they say, procedural roadblocks will not be a problem.

“Some technical blue slip is not going to stop any resolution that we come to,” Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a chief proponent of the Senate bill, said yesterday. “Let’s not get caught up in the minutiae and the weeds.”

McCain was among the leaders of a bipartisan core of senators who struck a deal on the immigration bill and then shepherded it through the Senate last month. Sixty-two senators, most of them Democrats, voted for the final bill.

The legislation drew harsh criticism from Senate conservatives, many of whom voted against it. Even if Reid were to allow GOP leaders to move forward, there is no guarantee that Republican senators would not use procedural weapons to stop action.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) tried to kill the bill on its first trip through the Senate.

Sessions sent a “Dear Colleague” letter yesterday in which he urged colleagues to study the details of the immigration bill, particularly the number of legal immigrants it would allow into the country in future years.

“It remains deeply flawed,” he wrote.

Republicans hinted yesterday that they have other options for getting around the blue-slip problem.

“There’s always a Plan B,” said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

In 2000, House and Senate leaders circumvented a similar problem by appointing “shadow” conferees to a bankruptcy bill and attaching their work product to the conference report on a separate bill, according to Walter J. Oleszek’s Congressional Procedures and the Policy Process.

But alternatives and timelines were in short supply yesterday.

“Things can break loose at any time,” Ueland said.

Reid Proposes Deal On Reform Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Immigration reform remained mired in the Senate yesterday, but Minority Leader Harry Reid indicated there may be some room for compromise.

Legislation has been stalled for weeks on constitutional grounds that prevent the Senate from writing bills that raise revenue. Because the Senate legislation includes a requirement that illegal aliens pay back taxes, it must originate in the House.

Majority Leader Bill Frist offered a solution by attaching the bill to tax legislation that had already passed the House. Mr. Reid has rejected that solution.

Republicans "think there's a problem because they want a problem," Mr. Reid said yesterday. "They don't want to go to conference."

But, he also added that he's at least willing to consider the idea.

"I've got another idea for them," Mr. Reid told reporters yesterday. "If they want to use another bill, a tax bill, instead of the House-passed immigration bill, then let them come to me with how they're going to not have this as a Christmas tree of tax measures. It's up to them. If they want use a tax bill, let's see what they can come up with to protect the Senate's position on immigration."

House Republican leaders accuse Mr. Reid of sitting on the bill to prevent the Republican Congress for taking credit for reforming the country's immigration laws in an election year.

DOJ_NMG_0032667

"Unfortunately, the minority leader over there, Harry Reid, continues to stand in the way of getting to a conference," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said yesterday. "And I think he ought to quit playing politics with this issue and let us get to work on solving this problem of illegal immigration."

The House, meanwhile, approved an amendment by Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, to bar any Department of Homeland Security money from being used to alert the Mexican government about the location or activities of the volunteer Minutemen patrolling the border.

In a letter to colleagues, Mr. Kingston urged support "in ensuring our U.S. Border Patrol does not tip off the Mexican government about the location of Minutemen Civil Defense Corps patrols. This amendment will send a message that we will not tolerate such actions."

The letter cites press reports from earlier this year suggesting that the Border Patrol had been tipping off Mexican officials about Minutemen activities.

Arizona Governor Vetoes Illegal Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona has vetoed a bill that would have punished employers who hire illegal immigrants and authorized the police to arrest illegal immigrants on trespassing charges merely for being in the state.

Ms. Napolitano, a Democrat who is running for a second term and is doing well in public opinion polls, said yesterday in a letter to legislators that parts of the bill would have violated the federal government's power to enforce immigration law under the Constitution and were opposed by many law enforcement groups and leaders in border communities.

Ms. Napolitano said that although she supported holding employers accountable for hiring illegal workers, the bill provided "amnesty" because it let them avoid penalties and fines by simply firing the workers after receiving a warning from the state authorities. She said she opposed charging illegal immigrants with trespassing because law enforcement groups and municipal leaders said it would overwhelm the police.

Ms. Napolitano said the determination of lawmakers to push a bill that she had made clear she would reject "confirms that you view this bill more as a political game than as a serious effort to protect our border."

Ms. Napolitano and the Republican-dominated Legislature have had a contentious relationship. This veto was her 115th — a record for an Arizona governor — since taking office in 2003. None have been overturned.

A spokeswoman for the governor, Jeanine L'Ecuyer, said, however, that 26 of the vetoes involved the same legislation offered multiple times by lawmakers. Some of the bills, Ms. L'Ecuyer said, included what the governor considered outrageous ideas, including one that would allow patrons to carry guns in bars and restaurants.

Arizona, where a majority of illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico enter, is one of several states where lawmakers have passed bills or are considering measures to fill in what they view as gaps in the federal enforcement of immigration law.

Ms. Napolitano has sought to appear tough on border issues while not playing into the hands of hard-line Republican legislators.

Last summer, she declared a state of emergency over border security. Last week, she authorized 300 National Guard troops from her state to participate in President Bush's plan to deploy 6,000 of them to the Mexican border by August to help the Border Patrol.

State Representative Russell Pearce, a Mesa Republican and the immigration bill's chief sponsor, said in an interview after the veto that he would try to put a similar measure on the November ballot.

Mr. Pearce said Ms. Napolitano's veto showed that she was not serious about reducing illegal immigration. "She is the best friend an illegal alien has in this country," Mr. Pearce said.

Poll: U.S. Public Warmer Toward Immigrants (AP-Y2)

By Will Lester

AP2, June 6, 2006

Immigration anxiety has been fueling a fierce political debate in the United States, but attitudes about immigrants in this country are considerably more positive than in several European countries, AP-Ipsos polling found.

People in Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Spain are much more inclined than those in the U.S. to think immigrants are likely to get involved in criminal activity.

"Often the immigrants come here and can't find work, they are forced to become criminals," said Leonardo Delogu, a doctor from Sardinia who was visiting Rome.

DOJ_NMG_0032668

More than a third of Germans, Italians and Spaniards say they think immigrants are more likely to be involved in criminal activity than people born in their countries. A fourth in France and Britain feel that way.

Those European countries are about evenly divided on whether immigrants are a good influence. In general, people who make higher incomes and have had more education are more likely to say immigrants are a good influence.

In the U.S., about one in 10 thinks immigrants are more likely to be involved in crimes. And a majority, 52 percent, say they think immigrants are a good influence on the country.

After many years, a steady flow over the Mexican border into the United States has left about 11 million illegal immigrants or more in this country.

Lawmakers are under pressure to bring immigration under control and are trying to agree on legislation that would tighten security on the borders while deciding the legal fate of millions of people in this country illegally.

President Bush was in New Mexico Tuesday trying to build support for his preferred approach of securing the borders, providing a new guest worker program and giving many illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship.

Public support of immigrants often depends on their legal status.

"In a nutshell, legal immigrants are helpful, illegals are not," said Don Bick, a home builder from Pittsburgh, Pa.

Many people in this country are alarmed about the changing ethnic nature of their communities and the added burden illegal immigrants can place on public services like schools and hospitals.

For Europeans, attitudes on immigrants have been shaped by more dramatic experiences.

· In France, young people in depressed suburbs rioted in November, burning thousands of cars and some public buildings.

· Spanish officials are trying to deal with boatloads of destitute Africans arriving at Spain's Canary Islands on rickety fishing boats nearly every day.

· An estimated 30 percent of Italy's prison population is made up of foreigners, often illegal immigrants convicted of crimes.

People in all eight countries in the polling — Australia, Britain, Canada, France, Italy, Germany, Spain and the United States — felt that immigrants work as hard or harder than people born in those countries. The polls, which questioned about 1,000 adults in each country, were conducted between May 1-22 and have a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

"Working hard is the only way they're going to survive, isn't it," said Sunny Siddiq, a liquor store owner in London who moved to Britain from Pakistan nine years ago. "They don't have luxuries in their home country, so when they come here, they only have one mission: to work hard and to support families back home."

"The population of immigrants is increasing dramatically," said Fred Bemak, a George Mason University professor who studies the impact of immigration. "When it's the person next door, it changes the tone."

Our Language Unites Us (USAT)

By Sen. James Inhofe

USA Today, June 7, 2006

To our nation's great credit and advantage, we have advanced English worldwide. It is the official language of 51 nations and 27 states in the USA. Last March, a Zogby International poll of likely voters found that 84% support making English the official language of government operations. Among Democrats, 82% supported that idea, and among Hispanics, 71%. This is nothing new: Over the years, many polls reflect similar numbers.

Speaking English well enough for everyday life is a guaranteed way for new immigrants to increase their earning potential, lift academic achievement and enhance their career options. That's the clear, compassionate message we need to send.

My amendment, passed by the Senate last month, clarifies that, unless specified by other laws, there are no entitlements to federal services and documents in foreign languages. This nation decided long ago that you must know English to become a citizen. Thus, there is no reason to offer government's citizen services in foreign languages.

In the same way the Pledge of Allegiance and the National Anthem bring this nation together, English is something we share and should promote. Yet Senate liberals voted against English as our national language and against the will of our constituents. Instead, they kowtowed to radical leftist groups, such as the National Council of La Raza.

Multilingual entitlements distress American unity and cost billions even though courts have consistently ruled that similar entitlements, provided under one of President Clinton's executive orders, are baseless.

In 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Martha Sandoval, who had lived in America for 10 years without learning English, could not sue Alabama because it didn't offer foreign-language driver's license tests. Similarly, federal courts have held that there's no right to foreign-language government forms, deportation notices or civil service exams.

The U.S. courts' position is unmistakable, and America's citizens and immigrants have spoken. Why aren't liberals listening? The message is loud and clear: Unite America behind our proud national language, help new immigrants advance by learning it and save taxpayer dollars by making English the national language. If liberals do not open their ears, people might just stop talking to them.

DOJ_NMG_0032669

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., sponsored the English language amendment.

Press 2 For Pointless (USAT)

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Sometimes it may seem that English is under attack. Dial a credit card company, and you're greeted in two languages. Order coffee at a convenience store, and the clerk might not understand you. Hit the wrong button at the ATM, and the screen flashes Spanish.

So should English be designated the USA's "national language"? Sixty-three senators have voted to make it so. They might as well have voted to make apple the national pie or American Idol the national TV show.

In practice, English already is the national language, even among the children of immigrants: 93% of second-generation Hispanic Americans are bilingual or speak primarily English, according to a 2002 national survey by the Pew Hispanic Center and the Kaiser Family Foundation. By the third generation, hardly anyone speaks only Spanish, and just 22% of Latinos are bilingual.

As in earlier generations, today's immigrants recognize that speaking English is their ticket to a better life. There are long waits for English classes — from one month to a couple of years — in cities from Boston to Phoenix. Legislating a "national language" is, at best, meaningless and, at worst, harmful.

Look at Miami-Dade County, which adopted an ordinance in 1980 that barred the county from doing business in any language other than English. Thirteen years later, the county commission unanimously repealed it. According to news accounts, public hospitals couldn't give written instructions in Spanish on how patients should take medications, and the county couldn't print some warning signs in Spanish.

Now Congress, rushing to score political points in the immigration debate roiling the nation, might be inviting similar mischief. The Senate measure, sponsored by Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., declares that no one is entitled to federal services or information in a language other than English, except where it's guaranteed by law.

Asked the measure's impact, an Inhofe aide offered this example: The White House website would no longer have to translate presidential speeches into Spanish. Quips about President Bush's command of English aside, leaving newcomers in the dark about presidential pronouncements is hardly a way to help them learn more about their adopted home.

More troubling is the measure's potential impact on other services. The IRS, for example, offers a Spanish version of its website. If the measure became law, immigrants would be discouraged from paying taxes.

It certainly would erect new barriers to citizenship. Currently, an applicant must understand the fundamentals of U.S. history and government. That's as it should be. Inhofe's measure would require that applicants also understand major legislation, court cases, the Federalist Papers and the Emancipation Proclamation. How many of today's Americans would pass that test?

To be sure, employers shouldn't put people who barely speak English into customer service positions. But as the immigration debate rages on, politics is trumping common sense. That's true in any language.

Contributing: This is one of an occasional series of editorials on immigration issues. View the previous editorials at editorialpage.usatoday.com.

Carter-Finley Workers Plead, Will Be Deported (RN&O)

By Jennifer Brevorka, Staff Writer

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, June 7, 2006

RALEIGH - Six men arrested by federal immigration agents at Carter-Finley Stadium last month have pleaded guilty to entering the country illegally and will be deported, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Federal immigration agents accompanied troopers from the state Highway Patrol to a construction site at the stadium May 23 in hopes of finding a driver who had fled from an auto accident. When federal agents arrived, more than 50 workers in hard hats ran. Seven, including one juvenile, were arrested.

Federal agents later found the suspected driver, Reynalda Guitierres, 28, in Durham and charged him with illegal entry.

Justice Department officials said that the following men pleaded guilty to illegal entry and will remain in federal custody while they undergo the deportation process: Victorino Marquez-Hernandez of Mexico; Antolin Contreras-Maldonado of Honduras; Armando Hernandez-Penaloza of Mexico; Melvin Jovel-Hernandez of Honduras; Omar Miguel Barbosa of Mexico and Demetrio Huerta-Ordonez of Mexico. Agents also charged Marquez-Hernandez with possession of false immigration documents.

DOJ_NMG_0032670

A Guatemalan teenager also was charged with illegal entry and possession of false immigration documents, but his case was continued, officials said. They did not release his name.

TAX:

Estate Tax Showdown Is Splitting The G.O.P. (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Senate Republicans, pushing once again to abolish the estate tax on inherited wealth, are split about whether to push for a full repeal that would probably fail, or seek a more cautious compromise with Democrats that could pass.

Permanently repealing the estate tax, or what Republicans have branded the "death tax," is a priority for President Bush and many Republican lawmakers.

But Senate leaders, vowing to schedule a vote for full repeal on Thursday, have yet to line up the 60 votes they need to prevent a Democratic filibuster. Indeed, with public approval ratings declining for Mr. Bush and the Republicans, party leaders face at least as much opposition from Democrats today as they did last summer.

In what is either a shrewd game of chicken or an effort to inflame the passions of crucial Republican constituencies, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, has made little effort to strike a compromise with conservative Democrats that would greatly reduce but not fully abolish the tax.

"Senator Frist is for full repeal, first and foremost," a spokeswoman for Mr. Frist, Carolyn Weyforth, said. "Until we've had the cloture vote, any talk of a compromise is premature."

The strategy has divided Republicans. Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told reporters on Monday that the Senate could easily pass a bill that eliminated the estate tax for all but a tiny slice of the nation's richest families.

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, has been trying for more than a year to woo Democrats from conservative states.

On Tuesday, Mr. Kyl circulated a proposal that would eliminate the tax for any estate worth less than $5 million and reduce the current rate for bigger estates.

Proponents said that repeal of the tax would promote savings and investment and eventually create jobs, as Americans would have more incentive to build businesses if they could keep the wealth within their families.

Critics say the estate tax as it is now reduces some of the nation's economic inequality, and they insist that its repeal would benefit the very wealthiest families at a time when the government is running large budget deficits.

Most polls show that a slim majority of voters support a repeal of the tax, especially when it is called the "death tax." But the tax affects less than 2 percent of all estates — most of which belong to very rich families — and repeal would be expensive.

Full repeal would cost more than $600 billion over 10 years, according to the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, although supporters insist the actual cost would be much lower.

The full cost would start to hit the Treasury in 2011 — the same year that the nation's oldest baby boomers will turn 65 and start a sharp rise in spending on Social Security and Medicare.

But opponents of the estate tax, including hundreds of thousands of small-business owners and a well-financed national network of grass-roots advocates, are running television ads in states with Democratic senators like Montana, Louisiana and North Dakota. They have also been campaigning in Maine, whose two moderate Republican senators are reluctant to support full repeal.

The issue could be crucial to the political career of Mr. Frist, who is weighing the possibility of running for president in 2008. He vowed to force a vote last summer, but retreated after it became clear that he could not prevent a filibuster.

Mr. Frist now appears to be going for broke: instead of seeking a compromise that might win over a handful of crucial Democrats, he is pushing for a permanent repeal of the estate tax.

Though Republican aides say Mr. Frist has not closed off the possibility of a compromise, the senator has pointedly refused to schedule any floor time for debate about alternatives in the event that his own effort fails.

As part of Mr. Bush's tax cut of 2001, the estate tax is scheduled to gradually phase out and disappear altogether in 2010 but then return in full the very next year.

Mr. Bush has long called for making his tax cuts permanent, but the estate tax has generated an emotional intensity far greater than most other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0032671

"The president's position has been clear, and it is that we should eliminate it altogether," said Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, in an interview on Tuesday.

"Keeping tax rates down on estates is just another way of not impeding the incentives to save and invest," Mr. Lazear said. "We're already consuming at very high rates, and our savings rate is very low. We don't want to bias the system any more than we already are."

Business groups are pushing hard to make the repeal permanent, focusing on a handful of Democratic senators from states that lean Republican.

The targets are the two Democrats from Arkansas, Senator Blanche L. Lincoln and Senator Mark L. Pryor, as well as Senator Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana and Senator Max Baucus of Montana.

Mr. Baucus, the senior Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, has offered his own proposal for scaling back the inheritance tax. Under one proposal he circulated — which was rejected by Republicans as too modest — estates worth less than $3.5 million would be exempt from any tax.

Mr. Baucus has been quiet in recent days, but aides said he was still open to proposals for a compromise that he could sell to other Democrats.

A handful of moderate Republican senators are likely to oppose a full and perhaps even a partial repeal of the estate tax. They include John McCain of Arizona, George V. Voinovich of Ohio, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and the two senators from Maine, Olympia Snowe and Susan M. Collins.

Ardent opponents of the estate tax, who have campaigned for more than a decade on the issue, say their time is hand.

"We're going for full repeal and we're pushing hard," said Dick Patten, executive director of the American Family Business Institute. "I'm very optimistic."

Mr. Patten's group, which claims 1,900 members who own family companies, is spending more than $1 million on television ads in 11 states. Some ads try to strike a bipartisan feel, quoting Republicans, Democrats and the economist Milton Friedman on how the estate tax hurts family-owned companies.

Another ad aims to pressure Mr. McCain, who voted against a permanent repeal of the estate tax in 2001.

"American family business owners and farmers are counting on John McCain, counting on him to keep his promise," said one television commercial that was broadcast in Arizona.

Aides to Senator Snowe of Maine said they had been under heavy pressure from both sides. On Tuesday, even as Mr. Patten's group was still running ads in favor of repeal, a group called the Maine People's Alliance brought a giant replica of a silver spoon and staged a news conference opposing repeal just outside her Senate office.

Frist Wants Estate Tax Repeal On Agenda (AP)

By Mary Dalrymple

The Associated Press, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - GOP leaders on Tuesday put abolition of the federal estate tax on the Senate's election-year agenda as other senators weighed ideas to shrink, but not erase, the tax.

President Bush's tax cuts eliminated the estate tax in 2010, but that temporary law expires, and the tax comes back to life, one year later.

Republicans have been unable to maneuver a bill permanently repealing the tax past Democratic objections. That has prompted Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and others to broker a compromise aimed at curbing the tax during the next decade.

The effort has attracted interest, and generated a flurry of ideas, from a small group of Republicans and Democrats interested in curbing the tax and getting rid of the quirky law that repeals and resurrects the levy.

"I think it's important that we put this issue to rest so that people will know what the rules are," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine.

Kyl told other GOP senators Tuesday that common ground might be found by increasing the size of an estate exempt from taxation to $5 million per person or $10 million per couple, according to GOP aides familiar with the proposal speaking on condition of anonymity while negotiations continued.

His idea would tax estates between $5 million and $30 million equal to the top tax rate for most capital gains. The remainder of the largest estates would be taxed at 30 percent, those aides said.

Kyl offered the idea as senators, Republican and Democratic, said proposals for progressively taxing estates were gaining more support than plans taxing all estates at one, lower rate.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said talks among senators interested in a compromise seemed to be moving toward a structure that includes at least two different estate tax brackets.

DOJ_NMG_0032672

Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., said "stair-stepping" the rates "brings on folks who otherwise would think that was too much of a giveaway."

"Of course, the question arises, what are the numbers?" he said.

This year, the first $2 million of a person's estate, or $4 million per couple, is exempt from taxation and the remainder is taxed at rates as high as 46 percent.

The first step toward considering either a complete repeal, or a compromise shrinking the tax, would come Thursday. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., planned a pivotal vote to test support for moving ahead with a bill, already passed by the House, to repeal the tax. He would need 60 votes to succeed.

Vote-counters on both sides express optimism they will prevail but caution that some senators probably will not commit until required to cast a vote.

Proposals to shrink instead of repeal the estate tax have gained some traction among senators worried about budget deficits amid spending on the war in Iraq.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who has supported repealing the tax in the past, is interested in a compromise given pressing demands on federal spending, including cleanup and reconstruction after Hurricane Katrina.

At least two GOP senators, George Voinovich of Ohio and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, say the government's finances cannot support any reduction in estate taxes at this time. Both plan to vote against Frist's effort to start debate.

Some groups lobbying to completely repeal the tax say the effort to compromise gives up the fight before testing the waters for abolishing the tax.

"It disappoints me that they want to compromise before we've actually had the vote on repeal," said Dick Patten, executive director of the American Family Business Institute.

__

On the Net:

U.S. Senate: http://www.senate.gov

How Tax Code Change Affects Overseas Workers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

In your May 24 editorial "Lost in Taxation," you are confused about how a recent change to the federal tax code will affect some Americans working overseas. The change concerned the foreign earned income exclusion under section 911 of the tax code. You imply 4.1 million Americans could be affected, but according to the most recent available IRS data, 306,393 tax returns claimed the benefits of section 911 in 2003. Of those returns, only 125,894 actually had any U.S. tax liability after the benefits.

Like all U.S. citizens and taxpayers, expatriates are protected from double taxation primarily by the foreign tax credit mechanism. The section 911 exclusion, on which you focus, is secondary. In fact, to gain the benefits of excluding all or a portion of their foreign income from their taxable income in the U.S., section 911 beneficiaries opt out of foreign tax credit relief on the excluded income. For those working in countries that impose little or no tax on this income, section 911 actually allows expatriates to avoid taxes altogether on this income. Prior to the change enacted recently, those working in countries with higher taxes would elect section 911 not to avoid double taxation on their foreign income, but to have their other income, including U.S. income, taxed at lower marginal tax rates than taxpayers living and working in the U.S. with the same economic income.

Expatriates will continue to have a better deal than their domestic counterparts. Through section 911, individuals can still exclude a sizable amount of income that those living and working in the U.S. cannot exclude. Also, American workers abroad who claim section 911 benefits will be taxed at the same rates as domestic workers with the same income. And the subsidy for housing costs is brought in line with other U.S. government-sponsored housing programs.

Sen. Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa)

Chairman, Committee on Finance

Washington

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Renews Push For Nominees (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032673

White House officials are making a concerted effort to cooperate with outside conservative groups to support and defend President Bush's nominees to the federal bench, and they are also planning to work more closely with the Senate on confirming the nominees.

The greater focus on judges comes in the wake of privately expressed criticism from conservative leaders that the White House and the GOP-controlled Senate were doing little to defend high-profile nominees such as William "Jim" Haynes and Terrence Boyle, both picked for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, from attacks by liberals.

The White House and Senate Republicans offered spirited defenses of prior embattled nominees, such as Priscilla Owen, who now sits on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Janice Rogers Brown, who is a member of the D.C. Circuit Court. But since their confirmations and the Supreme Court confirmations of Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, GOP leaders have done little to defend other controversial nominees.

The lack of an organized defense of languishing nominees such as Haynes, Boyle and William Myers, a nominee to the 9th Circuit, prompted former clerks of the nominees and conservative activists to take matters into their own hands. Boyle's former clerks, many of whom are now prominent lawyers, joined together on their own accord to defend him from accusations that he acted improperly while a district-court judge.

Conservative activists and intellectual leaders, such as Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, and Professor John Yoo of the University of California at Berkeley, also began laying plans to form committees to defend other embattled nominees. Yoo was in the national spotlight earlier this year during the Alito hearings because of his writings on the legal theory of the unitary executive, which Bush has used to justify his wartime powers.

But since the Senate confirmation of Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals two weeks ago, the White House has begun to take a more active role in defending the nominees. For example, talking points circulated at the end of last week defending Boyle from accusations that he did not recuse himself from cases where he may have had conflicts of interest were written in the signature style of the White House and its ally the Republican National Committee. And administration officials are also working more closely with conservative activists to defend the nominees. Also, the Department of Justice is crafting a memo on Boyle's conduct as a judge and activists close to the White House such as Edward Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center who authored a recent article in the conservative Weekly Standard, are stepping up their advocacy on behalf of the judicial nominees.

"I sense that," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, when asked yesterday if he noticed more effort by the White House to support the judicial nominees. He added that he met with Boyle and a White House aide Monday in a meeting he said he assumed was set up by the administration.

"I guess that represents a stepping up and talking about judges," Sessions acknowledged.

Sessions also said that conservatives are right to be concerned about the lack of action by Senate Republicans to defend the nominees, something he attributed to distractions caused by the busy schedule and big political issues such as immigration reform.

"I think it's time to get more serious in defending the nominees," he said.

Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a rising star in the upper chamber's conservative circles, said that the White House is working more closely with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) on the judicial nominees.

"We've got to get moving faster on judicial nominees," said DeMint, who added that Frist has told him judicial nominees are a priority.

A White House official said that several of the nominees have sat in the Senate for a long time and that the administration is asking senators to make a decision about whether to confirm them or not, whether to "fish or cut bait."

The greater cooperation between the White House and conservative groups comes several weeks after White House political adviser Karl Rove and counsel Harriet Miers told conservatives in a private meeting that they would begin sending more judicial nominees to the Hill. But so far few nominees have been sent.

The White House official said that to the extent there is a push on judges it is an effort to wrap up background checks on judicial nominees and send them to the Senate more quickly. The effort is a direct recognition that the window of opportunity for getting nominees confirmed in the Senate may be closing as Election Day and the end of the 109th Congress approaches.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a member of the Judiciary Committee, has come under heavy fire from conservatives for blocking Haynes's nomination.

Yesterday, nearly 80 prominent conservative leaders including David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union; Paul Weyrich, chairman of Coalitions for America; Manuel Miranda, chairman of the Third Branch Conference; and Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Michigan Republican Party, delivered a letter to Graham rebuking him for "effectively blocking" Haynes's nomination in the Judiciary Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0032674

"We understand that you and Senator [John] McCain [R-Ariz.] have concerns about the Bush Administration's policies on prisoners captured in the War on Terror, and about Mr. Haynes's role in implementing those policies at the Defense Department," the conservative leaders wrote.

Graham defended himself yesterday by saying that he is not blocking Haynes in committee and arguing that the conservative leaders who signed the letter do not represent all conservatives. But Graham refused to say whether he would cast a crucial vote to pass Haynes out of committee.

A Different Judicial Battle (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The Senate is back in session, and we'll soon see if Republicans are serious about confirming President Bush's nominees for the appeals courts. Majority Leader Bill Frist kept his promise to confirm Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit before Memorial Day, after he'd waited three years for a vote.

So who's next? Mr. Frist wanted to move Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle by Memorial Day too, but no go. A federal judge in North Carolina, Mr. Boyle has the honor of waiting longer than any appeals-court nominee in history for a floor vote. He was in Mr. Bush's first group of nominees announced on May 9, 2001 and was first nominated by Mr. Bush's father in 1991, though Democrats denied him a vote.

Democrats now say they'll filibuster his nomination. They are distorting a couple of Judge Boyle's civil rights decisions and making conflict-of-interest allegations that add up at worst to minor infractions. But Republicans don't want a fight in an election year over race or ethics. And Judge Boyle's onetime Senate champion -- Jesse Helms -- has long since retired. A controversial nominee without an angel to guide him through today's polarized Senate is in trouble.

Which brings us to William "Jim" Haynes II, another stalled Fourth Circuit nominee. Mr. Haynes was named on September 29, 2003, had a hearing two months later, and was voted out of committee in March 2004. But don't blame this delay only on Democrats. Two Republicans -- Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham -- are also causing the holdup.

Mr. Haynes is the Pentagon's general counsel, and his transgression is to have offered legal advice on the treatment of detainees in the war on terror. The big point of contention is his role in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's decision in December 2002 to allow "coercive" interrogation techniques against al Qaeda detainees at Guantanamo.

The Pentagon says Mr. Haynes offered legal analysis; his critics distort this to say he was instrumental in forging a policy that could be used to justify "torture." But there is no evidence that anyone condoned torture, and it was the CIA, not the Pentagon, that used "waterboarding" that critics cite as the most coercive sanctioned technique.

In any case, Mr. Rumsfeld rescinded his decision within six weeks after Pentagon lawyers took their concerns to Mr. Haynes, who then took them to Mr. Rumsfeld. Even if you believe the "coercive" techniques policy was a mistake, its reversal was due in no small part to Mr. Haynes, who did his duty of providing legal analysis. Mr. Haynes met with Senator McCain for an hour last month and agreed to answer written questions about the issue.

Senator McCain's anger over the Air Force's tanker deal with Boeing also unfairly extends to Mr. Haynes. As general counsel, Mr. Haynes had the job of reviewing and, in some cases, redacting the small library's worth of documents the Senator demanded. A McCain spokeswoman tells us that the Senator has not made a decision about whether to support the nomination.

It's hard to see how opposing Mr. Haynes would achieve anything except win the Senators some fleeting praise in the establishment media. It wouldn't impress GOP primary voters in Mr. Graham's home state of South Carolina, an important Presidential primary state in 2008 and home to many Haynes supporters. In defeating Mr. Haynes, Mr. McCain would mainly be validating those critics who want to punish anyone associated with the war in Iraq. Is this how a President McCain would treat his appointees who come under political fire for offering honest counsel?

There are 18 vacancies on the appeals-court bench -- 10% of the total -- and not many weeks left to fill them before election-year campaigning makes judicial confirmations next to impossible. Seven nominees are currently waiting for a hearing or vote. With Republicans in danger of losing Senate seats, if not their majority, now is the time to honor one of their campaign pledges from 2004 by confirming Mr. Bush's judicial nominees.

Boom Of The Judicial Canon (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In Texas, calling someone a "spokesman" comes close to fighting words.

Take the case of the Honorable Nathan L. Hecht, a justice of the Supreme Court of Texas and a well-known conservative jurist. A longtime friend of White House counsel Harriet Miers, Hecht gave more than 120 media interviews during her failed

DOJ_NMG_0032675

Supreme Court nomination. Hecht coordinated strategy with White House aides and agreed to take media calls straight from the White House, according to a recent investigation.

He even joked to the Texas Lawyer newspaper that he was acting as "PR for the White House."

But a "spokesman?" No way, he told the Texas State Commission on Judicial Conduct, which last month admonished Hecht for his activities on behalf of Miers. The Texas Code of Judicial Conduct prohibits judges from doing anything to "advance the private interests of the judge or others."

Hecht said his actions did not promote Miers's nomination. He called a New York Times headline that described him as Miers's "spokesman" inaccurate and misleading, saying he had been "simply providing information to people who called."

(Some in Washington might argue that "providing information" is the opposite of what spokesmen for this administration do.)

Earlier this year, a panel of current federal appellate judges testified before Congress on behalf of then-Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said there was no conflict of interest, even though a future Justice Alito could review the rulings of the same judges. At the time, Specter said Alito and the judges have "a confluence of interests," not a conflict.

Hecht said he will "vigorously contest" the admonition. "I believe that my statements on matters of national public interest did not offend canons of judicial ethics and were fully protected by the First Amendment," he said in a prepared statement.

Hecht, who said he and Miers have dated over the years, told the commission that his close relationship with the top White House lawyer "made it impossible for him to remain silent when asked by reporters to provide factual information about Miers' background, experience and views on religion and abortion."

Hecht told the commission he had not been speaking for his friend but had merely been "swept up in the task of providing information about [Miers] to those who asked for it."

So don't go calling him a "spokesman."

Battle Over Foreign-Aid Spending Heats Up (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration and Congress are headed for a clash over how to spend U.S. aid for the developing world.

President Bush's decision to consolidate billions of dollars in foreign-aid programs under the State Department puts him at odds with Congress's age-old prerogative of earmarking foreign-aid funds for favorite issues, such as immunizing children or encouraging sexual abstinence for AIDS control.

"Both Congress and the executive branch want to decide where the money goes, and there's a struggle between the two," says Steve Radelet, senior fellow at the Center for Global Development, a Washington think tank.

The brewing storm over foreign aid is the latest fight this year between a weakened White House and congressional Republicans eager to show independence going into November's elections. Lawmakers can't be too assertive, since lobbying scandals have called into question the practice of inserting earmarks into spending bills. But because foreign aid helps define the U.S. image overseas, Congress believes it must retain a major say.

At the center of the struggle is Randall Tobias, a former Eli Lilly & Co. chief executive who is now the country's first director of foreign assistance. With marching orders from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mr. Tobias is remodeling $16.6 billion in U.S. foreign-assistance programs to give the State Department more power to use aid to further American foreign-policy goals.

Under Ms. Rice's plan, State Department officials in Washington will identify their strategic priorities -- such as fighting terrorism and promoting economic growth -- in the 154 countries that receive U.S. aid. The U.S. ambassador in each country will determine which projects the U.S. will fund to achieve those goals. Mr. Tobias plans to have ambassadors in 35 countries test the approach this summer.

The administration is "trying to ensure we're bringing all U.S. government foreign aid into a strategic package," Mr. Tobias says. Right now, he says, foreign-aid decisions seem almost haphazard, a product of mandates from Congress and on-the-ground judgments by half a dozen U.S. agencies and departments.

Lawmakers, however, are loath to cede control. Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.), a member of the Appropriations Committee, is drafting legislation that would require the administration to spend 50% of aid to Africa on such items as water wells, immunizations and teacher training. Mr. Brownback says he became disenchanted with how the administration is delivering foreign aid during a December trip to the Democratic Republic of Congo.

DOJ_NMG_0032676

"It was like you were just taking a lot of money and scattering it around, and there was nothing real at the end of the day," says Mr. Brownback, who is part of a growing pro-aid movement among American Christian conservatives.

Mr. Tobias's team recently assembled a two-page internal analysis of spending patterns in U.S. aid, which jumped to $27.5 billion in fiscal 2005 from $10 billion in fiscal 2000. The patterns, they found, imply that the five major priorities of American policy are promoting security interests in the Middle East, fostering post-Cold War partnerships with Eastern Europe, fighting AIDS in Africa, countering narcotics in the Andes and providing humanitarian relief.

Mr. Tobias and his team say that while those issues are important, together they don't seem to reflect a coherent strategy of leveraging aid into foreign-policy achievements. "Aside from Iraq and Afghanistan, our foreign-assistance priorities haven't changed at all" since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, says one administration official. Mr. Tobias says the solution is to concentrate more authority with the executive branch. The administration's overarching goal, according to State Department documents, should be "helping to build and sustain democratic, well-governed states that will respond to the needs of their people and conduct themselves responsibly in the international system."

The administration's approach has rattled the private charities that distribute much U.S. aid in the field. While officials at the charities are careful not to appear opposed to the idea of overhaul, many were upset that Ms. Rice didn't seek their views.

Behind the charities' concern is a suspicion that the administration might direct more aid to foreign allies in the fight against Islamic extremism, and away from the world's neediest. "Poverty alleviation and long-term development approaches should not be the casualties of shorter-term strategic objectives," says Todd Shelton, director of public policy for InterAction, an umbrella group representing more than 160 development charities.

Meantime, prominent lawmakers continue to force the administration's hand by earmarking aid money. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) helped set aside $200 million this year to be used for drinking-water supply projects, at least $50 million of which must be spent in Africa. Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) has set aside money for matters such as human-rights and refugee causes in Burma, as well as a small Kentucky-based nonprofit, Voice for Humanity, which has received millions of dollars over the years and is represented by a former McConnell aide.

The practice is a bipartisan one. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.), had a hand in setting aside $15 million for "neglected diseases" that get less attention than AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis.

Mr. Tobias, who gets good marks from both parties, says he will gradually win Congress over as he did in his last job, running the president's huge AIDS initiative.

"My hope is Congress will see this strategic approach as a good substitute for a number of the earmarks we're dealing with today," he says.

Advice Is Not Well Taken (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, June 7, 2006

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and a top Bush administration official urged Republican investigators on Capitol Hill to change how they conduct probes of the executive branch in a private meeting earlier this spring.

The unusual request infuriated some of the GOP aides, who countered that the administration has repeatedly failed to cooperate with their requests for information. The staffers expressed outrage that the meeting was even taking place, calling it inappropriate for a White House policymaker to tell investigators how to scrutinize the Bush administration.

“The meeting did not go well,” a GOP source said.

Others thought the forum was somewhat productive, but acknowledged it was bizarre.

While Republican aides expressed different reactions, the pleas by Gingrich and Office of Management and Budget (OMB) representative Clay Johnson have raised new separation-of-powers questions as lawmakers and White House officials iron out their differences over the FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson’s (D-La.) office last month.

Democrats are seizing on the meeting as proof of the cozy relationship between the GOP-led Congress and the administration.

Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), laughed when asked about congressional investigations of the administration, stating, “The GOP-led Congress has completely abdicated its oversight responsibility, and the American people are paying the price.”

Gingrich set up the meeting and asked Johnson, OMB’s deputy director for management, to attend. The former Speaker, who has not ruled out a presidential bid in 2008, communicates regularly with lawmakers and staffers on a wide range of policy issues.

DOJ_NMG_0032677

Some Republicans defend their oversight activities, noting their critical reviews of how the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) reacted in the wake of Hurricane Katrina as well as other investigations that showed poor performances by other federal agencies.

Johnson and Gingrich spoke at length about Congress's important oversight role but stressed that the focus should be on solving problems, not issuing press releases.

A few Capitol Hill officials say it is inconsistent for Gingrich to recommend that investigators move away from a "gotcha" mentality when he, as Speaker, ordered Republican lawmakers to hold rigorous oversight of the Clinton administration, adding that those probes were designed to embarrass the Democratic president.

Gingrich did not comment for this article.

Investigators asked Johnson about the timing of the meeting, but sources say those questions were not directly answered.

Some came away from the meeting believing there was an implied, unstated message: Ease up on oversight this election year.

In an interview yesterday, Johnson said, "It never occurred to me that it would be interpreted that way. We want more oversight, not less. We are for transparency."

But Johnson made clear to The Hill and to GOP aides that he believes oversight activities should be done differently. He favors monthly, collaborative meetings between the OMB and oversight officials instead of lawmakers' holding "gotcha" hearings.

"Let's set up an action plan to solve the problem," Johnson said. "Let's not just leave it at 'I've embarrassed these [administration] people, and that's my only goal.'"

Johnson also took issue with how lawmakers pose questions to administration officials during congressional hearings, saying that some the questions "are not constructive in their wordings."

James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, called Johnson's advice strange and comical.

"I find it interesting to have an administration official lecturing people that are overseeing what they are doing," Thurber said.

Thurber, a critic of GOP oversight of the administration, said Republican investigators "get nothing out of OMB."

Asked for comment about how aides described his advice as bizarre, Johnson said, "If they took offense, I'm sorry they took offense. … I would suggest they're wrong."

Johnson cited testimony from Comptroller General David Walker criticizing congressional oversight of the executive branch and similar testimony from former House Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas).

Congressional investigators "should talk to Walker and Armey," Johnson said.

Congressional aides say that Johnson meant well but that they are frustrated by what they perceive to be his view that the OMB can adequately oversee the activities of all federal agencies.

"The whole attitude of 'We're good' is annoying," a congressional aide said.

Capitol Hill aides say that if the Bush administration is sensitive about oversight now it could be in for a rude awakening in the 110th Congress. Political analysts predict that there is a decent chance that Democrats may take control of at least one of the chambers in the next Congress and the House is more likely to flip than the Senate.

A Democratic-controlled House is one of the administration's worst fears because Democrats would likely issue dozens, if not hundreds, of subpoenas in the course of their oversight investigations of the Bush administration. The minority party in each chamber lacks subpoena authority.

Republican investigators from the House and Senate attended the Gingrich-Johnson meeting. No lawmakers were present, and Democratic staffers were not invited. Some investigators in both chambers said they were unaware of the meeting.

Staffers for Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), regarded as the most aggressive oversight-oriented lawmaker, did not attend the Johnson-Gingrich meeting.

In a 2004 interview with The Hill, Grassley said the administration regularly gets irked by his oversight initiatives: "They see it as a Republican picking on a Republican. It's no different [from] when [former President] Clinton was in. The difference is that when I did it in the Clinton administration, I didn't get help from Democrats. When I do it with a Republican president, I get a lot of help out of Democrats, and that compounds [the administration's anger]."

Democrats Guard Legislative Power (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Angered over recent media reports that President Bush has effectively disavowed hundreds of laws enacted during his tenure, a handful of House Democrats are now pushing measures to shore up Congress' legislative authority.

DOJ_NMG_0032678

Citing concerns over maintaining a clear Separation of Powers between the legislative and executive branches, Reps. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) and Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas) introduced separate bills shortly before Memorial Day.

Both Democrats, as well as Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), who co-authored Frank's bill, have criticized White House use of "signing statements," a practice that allows the president to attach an official declaration to newly enacted laws, and one historically used as a legal interpretation for executive branch agencies.

But in those statements, printed in the Federal Record, Bush also has asserted that he holds the power to ignore provisions of law that he believes are in conflict with the Constitution, essentially setting aside at least portions of those laws.

According to a late-April report in the Boston Globe, Bush has issued more than 750 such statements during his six years in office, more than the total number issued by all other commanders in chief in the nation's history.

On Monday, Frank criticized the use of signing statements and characterized the declarations as "a line-item veto over legislation."

"Bills are often carefully worked out so they modify provisions and how they operate," as well as to win support from lawmakers, Frank said. "What's he's doing is basically saying, 'I'll take the parts that I want, and I'll disregard the other parts.'"

While it is not possible for Congress to prohibit the president from issuing signing statements — under the Constitution the president is charged with the execution of laws — Frank said he would like to curb the process.

"We would like to try and stop them," Frank said. "It is not constitutionally possible for [Congress] to prevent them."

Under the Massachusetts lawmaker's proposal, any time the president issues a signing statement setting aside a newly enacted law, the White House would be required to notify Congress within 10 days and include an explanation for the decision. In addition, the proposal would require the White House to provide lawmakers with the text of those statements issued before the passage of Frank's bill.

The measure also would create a series of expedited procedures for Members to introduce a bill or resolution responding to the signing statement. "If [the president] gets what he wants with modifications ... we should then have a chance to take back what he wants," Frank said.

Members also could request a report from the office of the House general counsel outlining any legal challenges that could be raised by an individual lawmaker.

An alternate proposal introduced by Jackson Lee in late May, the Congressional Lawmaking Authority Protection Act, also aims to reduce the use of signing statements, but it would do so by essentially refusing the proclamations of any authoritative power.

Under the Texas lawmaker's legislation, federal, state and independent agencies, as well as federal and state courts, would be prohibited from giving any legal significance to signing statements when interpreting federal laws.

In addition, the measure would bar the use of federal funds for signing statements that contradict "the intent of Congress" in enacting the law.

"Presidential signing statements seek to alter Congress' primacy in the legislative process by giving the President's intention in signing the bill equal or greater standing to Congress' intention in enacting the bill," Jackson Lee said in a May statement. "This would be a radical, indeed revolutionary, change to our system of separated powers and checks and balances."

Jackson Lee's measure effectively would force the White House to issue a veto, rather than resort to a signing statement. Bush has yet to issue a veto well into his second term in office.

While Frank's legislation has been assigned to the House Rules and Judiciary panels, and Jackson Lee's measure has been assigned to the House Government Reform Committee, no hearings are scheduled yet on either proposal.

In the Senate, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has suggested his panel could hold a hearing on the use of presidential signing statements, but similar legislation has yet to be introduced in that chamber.

Frank noted: "Given the contempt this administration has shown for the process, hearings are a good first step if there's a likelihood they will lead to something."

Data Theft Affected Most In Military (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Christopher Lee

Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Social Security numbers and other personal information for as many as 2.2 million U.S. military personnel -- including nearly 80 percent of the active-duty force -- were among the data stolen from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs analyst last month, federal officials said yesterday, raising concerns about national security as well as identity theft.

The department announced that personal data for as many as 1.1 million active-duty military personnel, 430,000 National Guard members and 645,000 reserve members may have been included on an electronic file stolen May 3 from a department employee's house in Aspen Hill. The data include names, birth dates and Social Security numbers, VA spokesman Matt Burns said.

DOJ_NMG_0032679

Defense officials said the loss is unprecedented and raises concerns about the safety of U.S. military forces. But they cautioned that law enforcement agencies investigating the incident have not found evidence that the stolen information has been used to commit identity theft.

"Anytime there is a theft of personal information, it is concerning and requires us and our members to be vigilant," Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. He said the loss is "the largest that I am aware of."

Army spokesman Paul Boyce said: "Obviously there are issues associated with identity theft and force protection."

For example, security experts said, the information could be used to find out where military personnel live. "This essentially can create a Zip code for where each of the service members and [their] families live, and if it fell into the wrong hands could potentially put them at jeopardy of being targeted," said David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS).

Another worry is that the information could reach foreign governments and their intelligence services or other hostile forces, allowing them to target service members and their families, the experts said.

"There is a global black market in this sort of information . . . and you suddenly have a treasure trove of information on the U.S. military that is available," said James Lewis, director of technology and public policy at CSIS.

One defense official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, called the extent of the data loss "monumental."

The new revelations significantly increase the potential harm from what was already one of the largest data breaches in U.S. history. On May 22, VA disclosed that an external computer hard drive was stolen May 3 from the home of a VA employee and that it contained unencrypted names and birth dates for as many as 26.5 million veterans who were discharged after 1975 or submitted benefit claims. It also included Social Security numbers for 19.6 million of those veterans, VA officials said.

Initially VA thought that all of the 26.5 million people affected were veterans, but a database comparison revealed that they also included the bulk of active-duty military services, as well as more than 1 million members of the National Guard and reserves.

Montgomery County police released a description yesterday of the stolen laptop and its external hard drive because they said it may have been purchased by someone who does not realize the value of its content. "It could have shown up at a yard sale or a secondhand store," police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said. "This is a time of the year when parents may be buying computers for kids going to college in the fall."

Montgomery County police are offering a $50,000 reward for information that allows authorities to recover the laptop. The computer is a Hewlett-Packard model zv5360us and the external hard drive is an HP External Personal Media Drive.

The Washington Post is not publishing the name of the career data analyst whose laptop was stolen in response to a request from law enforcement authorities who are investigating its disappearance.

The breach outraged veterans -- even more so because senior VA officials knew about the theft within hours of the crime but did not tell VA Secretary Jim Nicholson until 13 days later. The 60-year-old analyst, who had been taking home sensitive data for at least three years without authorization, has been fired, officials have said. His boss resigned last week and another senior VA official is on administrative leave pending investigations by the FBI, the VA inspector general and Montgomery County police.

A coalition of veterans groups filed a class-action lawsuit against the federal government yesterday, contending that privacy rights were violated and seeking $1,000 in damages for each affected veteran.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia, demands that VA fully disclose who was affected by the theft, and asks a court to prohibit VA workers from using sensitive data until safeguards are in place. Burns said the department does not comment on pending litigation. He said VA has received no reports of stolen data being used for identity theft or other criminal activity.

VA receives records for every new recruit because active-duty personnel, National Guard members and reservists are eligible for certain VA benefits, such as GI Bill educational assistance and the home-loan program.

"The department will continue to make every effort to inform and help protect those potentially affected, and is working with the Department of Defense to notify all affected personnel," Nicholson said.

Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.), ranking member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, said yesterday that he was "appalled" at the data breach and called for a Government Accountability Office investigation into VA information security practices.

Research shows that it is not unusual for government employees to take home sensitive data on laptops, Lewis said. "The rules we have are either chaotic or nonexistent. . . . We still have a paper rules government when we are a digital nation."

Stolen Computer Had Data On More Troops (USAT)

USA Today, June 7, 2006

A stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer had personal data on about 2.2 million current members of the military, not just the 50,000 initially reported, the Pentagon said Tuesday. The stolen data include the names, birth dates and Social Security numbers of as many as 1.1 million active-duty troops from all the armed forces and nearly 1.1 million National Guard and Reserves personnel, according to a Pentagon briefing paper distributed to Congress.

The disclosure is the latest revision by the government as to who was affected when burglars took a government laptop and disks from the home of a VA employee on May 3. The VA said when it disclosed the theft May 22 that the data involved up to 26.5 million veterans discharged since 1975, as well as some of their spouses.

Meanwhile, a coalition of veterans groups charged in a federal class-action lawsuit in Washington that their privacy rights were violated by the theft. The suit demands that the VA fully disclose which military personnel are affected and seeks $1,000 in damages for each. VA spokesman Matt Burns declined to comment.

Police in Montgomery County, Md., where the burglary occurred, are offering a $50,000 reward for the return of the stolen Hewlett-Packard computer gear.

Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar sought as much as $500,000 and a stake in a technology venture in his country, Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., told an FBI informant, according to court documents filed in a bribery probe of the congressman. Jefferson allegedly said he delivered "African art," which authorities say was code for cash, to the Potomac, Md., home of Abubakar's wife late on July 31.

The details were in an affidavit for a federal court warrant to search the house. The affidavit was filed in August and unsealed Monday.

His lawyer, Edward Weidenfeld, said Abubakar did nothing wrong and is cooperating with authorities.

The FBI said in a different affidavit reported earlier that Jefferson took a $100,000 bribe. Jefferson, who has not been charged, has denied wrongdoing.

House GOP Seeks To Keep Promise On Earmarks (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Although House leaders have yet to appoint Members from their chamber to smooth out differences between House and Senate lobbying reform bills, they are working to make good on their pledge to appropriators that any new earmark disclosures apply equally to all committees.

A GOP leadership aide said that Republican leaders are working with each of the relevant committees to find a way to make earmark disclosures uniform for any bill that contains earmarks.

"We need to have that uniform," said this aide. "We are working committee by committee."

In order to get enough support to pass the lobbying and ethics reform legislation, House leaders pledged that any bill would contain disclosure of earmarks, including those in tax-writing and authorizing measures — not just in appropriations bills.

A spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said that the commitment on earmarks remains.

"They're committed to ensuring that earmark reform applies to every committee," said Kevin Smith.

Another House GOP leadership aide said that the Speaker's office hasn't fully decided whether conferees from the House will be selected this week but added that discussions are taking place at the staff level.

"They have found a lot of common ground," the aide said. "More common ground than differences."

Several sources in Congress and on K Street said they have not detected a sense of urgency from House leaders on appointing conferees.

Jo Maney, a spokeswoman for House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) said that "things are being discussed at a staff level," but she declined to go into specifics. She also said that since Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is the one who must appoint conferees, she didn't know when that is likely to happen.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said conferees have not been selected but could come this week.

Fred Wertheimer, president of campaign finance and lobbying watchdog group Democracy 21, said there is much speculation about House leaders not wanting to appoint conferees until the House and Senate have worked out most of their differences between the two bills. Wertheimer added that the two main differences involve reforms of 527 political groups and earmarks.

There is a procedural reason why it may make sense for the House GOP to delay the naming of conferees until the key issues are resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0032681

House rules say that 20 calendar days and 10 legislative days after conferees are appointed, Members can file motions to instruct. “That would mean that Democrats could go to the floor as much as they wanted to and pile on” motions, Wertheimer said.

One lobbyist said that such maneuvers can lead to “a series of embarrassing votes for rank-and-file Republican Members. The only way you appoint conferees is when you think you can work out a conference agreement” within that 20-calendar- and 10-legislative-days window.

House leaders, Wertheimer said, “made a commitment to the appropriators” that they would bring a bill to the House floor that includes earmark disclosure for all earmarks.

“Whether they can actually work that out remains to be seen,” Wertheimer said. “Who knows where Ways and Means and Transportation” — two of the key committees for tax and authorizing measures — are on the issue. “That probably is the toughest thing they have to work out,” he said.

Ianthe Jackson, spokeswoman for the House Ways and Means Committee, said she had not heard anything about earmark negotiations. A spokesman for the Transportation panel did not return a call seeking comment.

Senate Emphasis On Ideology Has Some In G.O.P. Anxious (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Though some Republican candidates may relish the Senate's current concentration on same-sex marriage and other ideologically charged topics, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island is not among them.

"It may stir up my primary voters a little bit against me," said Mr. Chafee, a centrist Republican up for re-election. He opposes the push for a constitutional amendment to prohibit same-sex marriage and is under intense pressure to back a proposed amendment that would forbid flag burning. "I'm collateral damage."

Other Republicans, including some conservatives, say Mr. Chafee may not be the only potential victim of what they see as a misguided effort to appeal to social conservatives by staging votes intended primarily to make a point about the party's values. They say that voters are more concerned about the economy, health care and immigration, and that replaying the marriage debate in particular could do as much damage as good as Republicans fight to retain control of Congress.

"I don't think the problem is primarily with social conservatives," said Pat Toomey, a former Republican House member who now heads the Club for Growth, a conservative political action committee. "The problem I see is with economic conservatives who see out-of-control spending, huge deficits and that Republicans can't make the tax cuts permanent. The problem is on a different field."

Those who doubt the strategy are up against a long-held belief among Republican leaders that highlighting issues like same-sex marriage, flag desecration and abortion speaks to the party's convictions and carries concrete political benefits.

Proponents of the strategy say bringing up the issues now forces Democrats to cast votes that Republicans can use to demonstrate differences between the parties in an election year. They say the votes are important in re-energizing conservatives who have grown disaffected in the last year or two — a potentially vital step in a midterm election in which turnout is often low and races typically hinge on which side does better in turning out its base.

A poll released Tuesday showed a slide in support for President Bush among members of his party. The survey, by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, found Mr. Bush experiencing steep declines among those calling themselves moderate Republicans, with conservatives turning away from him as well, though more slowly.

The poll, based on a survey of 3,204 adults conducted from April 27 to May 22, found that Mr. Bush's support among moderate and liberal Republicans had declined to 56 percent from 81 percent in December 2004, immediately after his re-election, while conservative approval had fallen to 78 percent from 93 percent.

There are multiple reasons why Congress is taking up the issues now. The legislative calendar is relatively thin. The Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, who controls the Senate's schedule, has been trying to convince social conservatives that he is one of them in advance of a potential presidential bid. And while the leadership wants election-year votes on social issues, they do not want them too close to November in case they backfire.

Republicans skeptical of the value of pushing volatile social issues onto the agenda say the calculation is different when it comes to contentious economic issues, especially tax cuts. They say that taxes touch everyone's lives directly and that debating them helps to highlight what is at stake for individuals, in dollars-and-cents terms, in the November election.

As a result, there is much less debate among Republicans about the wisdom of forcing a vote in the Senate this week on the repeal of the federal estate tax, an issue that ranks at or near the top of the wish lists of economic conservatives.

DOJ_NMG_0032682

The politics are not so clear-cut when it comes to social issues. Even Republicans who see an advantage in the marriage proposal say it is politically risky in some respects and could complicate the re-election chances of endangered Republican incumbents in the Northeast and in other spots like South Florida.

Yet they defend the fight as necessary to solidifying the party's base before any effort to expand Republican appeal. And they say the issue could be used against Democratic incumbents in conservative states like Georgia and should help drive voters to the polls.

But the notion that social issues can influence turnout in a substantial way is a matter of some dispute.

Matthew Dowd, who was Mr. Bush's campaign strategist in 2004, said it was a myth that emphasizing same-sex marriage in battleground states like Ohio was critical to Mr. Bush's re-election. He said turnout patterns were comparable in states where same-sex marriage was a chief topic and where it was not.

"If you vote on it, vote on it for principle, because it is going to have little or no benefit in an election cycle," Mr. Dowd said.

Even as they pressed their case Tuesday, Republican advocates of the same-sex marriage ban acknowledged that they were unlikely to prevail Wednesday in a vote to limit debate, effectively killing the marriage amendment for the year. The House is still expected to consider its own version. Senate backers said they were slowly building support.

"There are very few significant issues around here that just come up and are passed in one year," said Senator David Vitter, Republican of Louisiana, who noted the increase since 2004 in the number of Senate Republicans who would vote for the proposed amendment. "It often takes a work in progress over several years to build toward success."

Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania and a chief proponent of the marriage ban, conceded that the issue was one many Republicans could do without.

"I know in many meetings of our colleagues when the issue of marriage comes up, heads drop," Mr. Santorum said in a floor speech. "It is just an issue that people just feel uncomfortable talking about. It's something that maybe in some respects they feel like, why do we even have to? Why is this even an issue?"

Dismissing the idea that politics had played a role in the timing, he said Senate Republicans had decided to act because the institution of marriage was under threat, and court decisions were slow in coming.

But one Republican strategist, Ed Rollins, said it was a mistake for the president and Senate leaders to focus attention on a marriage ban now, in what could look like a panicked reaction to shrinking public support.

"What the president needs to do is look like a leader, not be somebody who looks like a politician who is overreacting to polls," Mr. Rollins said. "If anything, he is reminding people of what they don't like about the Republican Party."

It was clear that others in the Senate were ready to put the matter behind them, and they appeared to be getting their wish as the leadership set the vote for Wednesday.

"It is the leader's decision as to what the agenda should be," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who opposes the amendment. "I just hope we get to the defense authorization bill as soon as possible."

Bush Chats With Children In Twin Cities Suburb (AP)

By Travis Coleman

The Associated Press, June 6, 2006

ST. LOUIS PARK, Minn. - First lady Laura Bush brought her get-involved message to Minnesota on Tuesday, visiting a community center that's been serving at-risk children for years.

Bush spoke to more than 20 children in the library at the Meadowbrook Collaborative, then examined crafts and played a game that gathered people in a circle to flap the edges of a large sheet.

The brief visit was intended to promote the federal program known as Helping America's Youth.

"This is a really great example of what communities can do when they work together," Bush said.

Meadowbrook offers health, education and safety programs to children in the area. That includes homework help, student attendance tracking, and free dental services and immunization clinics. The collaborative, formed in 1993, is credited with reducing crime in its part of this western Twin Cities suburb.

The children introduced themselves to Bush, showed her artwork, and talked about school. Bush capped her visit by sharing refreshments and cookies before heading to a fundraiser for Minnesota GOP Senate candidate Mark Kennedy.

Afterward, 9-year-old Collin Reece said it was the first time he'd ever met someone important. "This was, like, the best thing to ever happen to me," he said excitedly.

Collin's mother, Crystal Harshe, said she is a single parent who works, so she appreciates Meadowbrook for keeping kids safe and helping them with homework.

"It's awesome," she said. "They really take care of the kids."

Rikardo Thales, 8, said he likes coming to the center for help with his math homework - but also to mix in a little fun.

DOJ_NMG_0032683

"I like 100 percent of it," he said.

Earlier Tuesday, Bush promoted the federal program at a gathering in Indianapolis of hundreds of clergy, social workers, teachers and others. It was the first of several regional conferences for Helping America's Youth.

ON THE NET

Helping America's Youth: http://www.helpingamericasyouth.gov

Government Opens Drive To Offer New Hires Flexibility In Work Locations And Schedules (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

The president's chief civil service adviser yesterday rolled out a new approach to hiring the next generation of federal workers, part of an effort to help agencies better compete for talent in the labor force as baby boomers leave the government.

Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, launched a "career patterns" initiative aimed at making the government a more attractive employer by offering increased flexibility and better work-life balance to potential hires who are less interested in the traditional 9-to-5 job and 30-year federal career.

The initiative seeks to take many workplace practices in use across government -- telecommuting, nonstandard work hours, part-time work -- and treat them as natural employment options rather than as exceptions.

The OPM outlined several scenarios in a briefing book on the initiative. Agencies should consider it normal, the OPM said, to hire mid-career technology experts to spend a few years on a breakthrough project and then rotate them back into industry or the nonprofit sector. Or to hire employees to rule on benefit claims who would work from home at any hour of the day or night rather than let their lives be defined by rush-hour commutes to work at a desk in an office.

Springer said a retirement wave across government -- projections show that 40 percent of the federal workforce will retire by 2015 -- will pitch agencies into a war for talent with corporations, consulting firms and other employers.

The career patterns initiative, Springer said, represents "an entirely different approach and entirely different way of thinking about how we go out and market to an increasingly competitive marketplace for talent." She said: "We can't just necessarily go out and do things the way we did in the past. . . . Everybody else is going to be out there very aggressively with new techniques and new methods."

Springer convened a group of federal hiring officials for the launch of the OPM campaign and suggested that in the future, as many as half of the jobs in the government might be suitable for nontraditional work arrangements.

"We've got to be open to thinking about a wide range of arrangements," Springer told the group, which included Dan Blair , the OPM deputy director; Marta Brito PÃ©rez , an OPM associate director; George Nesterczuk , recently named by the president to be vice chairman of the Federal Salary Council, an advisory group on locality pay adjustments; and Max Stier , president of the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

Officials from the Patent and Trademark Office, Interior Department and the OPM presented testimonials on how they have managed to reshape jobs to benefit the government and employees.

The PTO, for example, has 4,000 patent examiners and plans to hire 1,000 examiners this year to help reduce a backlog in patent applications, said Vickers B. Meadows , the chief administrative officer. In March, the agency started training examiners on how to work at home, an arrangement offered employees in the trademark division for several years.

About 220 examiners have given up their office space and are working at home four days a week, and officials expect the number working from home to increase to about 3,000 by 2011, Meadows said.

Lauren Ailes , a budget analyst at the PTO, said flexible working hours at the agency had permitted her and her husband to care for a newborn without having to turn to day care.

Springer said the initiative will require agencies to report by Jan. 1 on their workforces and what types of jobs could be recast to appeal to the next generation of federal employees.Veto Threat on FAA Bill

Any legislation to change the rules for resolving contract disputes at the Federal Aviation Administration is strongly opposed at the White House, the administration said in a written statement. If Congress sends such a bill to the president, senior advisers will recommend a veto, the statement said.

The FAA on Monday, after a 60-day review period ended with no action by Congress, imposed a contract that would limit pay raises for air traffic controllers. A House bill sponsored by Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio) would set aside the statutory deadline and send the FAA and the National Air Traffic Controllers Association back to the bargaining table.

"Legislative intervention now could increase the pay of federal workers who are already on average the highest paid in government, increase pressure on the deficit, and displace funding for modernization of the air traffic control system," the administration said.

DOJ_NMG_0032684

Hank's Likely Headaches (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

It's hard not to feel some sympathy for departing Treasury Secretary John Snow. He worked tirelessly for President Bush, trudging all over the country to plug the administration's policies. In 2005 Snow spoke at the Detroit Economic Club, the Omaha Chamber of Commerce and the Sony Technology Center in Mount Pleasant, Pa. For all his trouble, Snow earned only perfunctory public gratitude from the president and was subjected to repeated rumors that the White House was unhappy with his performance. Worse, he seemed to have had little effect on policy or the economy.

The same fate may befall Snow's anointed successor, Henry "Hank" Paulson, head of the highly profitable investment banking firm Goldman Sachs. Of course, it's not supposed to be this way. Paulson comes advertised as a Wall Street take-charge guy who will improve public economic confidence and reassert control over policy.

But how is that to happen? Unless he blunders badly, Paulson's role as chief economic spokesman doesn't matter much. Most Americans don't know the name of the Treasury secretary and don't care. What they care about is $3-a-gallon gasoline and 6.5 percent mortgage rates.

It's possible that Paulson will have more influence on policy than Snow had. As economist Roger Kubarych of HVB America points out, there's no shortage of challenges: trying to avert big bankruptcies (GM) in the auto industry; preventing disorderly shifts in global currency rates; curbing federal spending on retirement benefits; fixing the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which insures defined-benefit pensions. The trouble is that Bush's positions on most issues are already set. Even if they weren't, many powerful interests -- Congress, the United Auto Workers, China, AARP -- may limit what Paulson can actually accomplish.

To excel as Treasury secretary, Paulson needs something no one wants: an economic crisis that enables him to act as hero, much as then-Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin (also once head of Goldman Sachs) and then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan did during the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis. Any new upset would spotlight Paulson (assuming the Senate confirms him) along with the new Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke. What are the odds of a crisis? Not great -- but not negligible, either. After three years of strong performance (5.3 million new jobs, 4.6 percent unemployment), the U.S. economy could be at a tipping point. Two problems loom: one traditional, one not.

The traditional problem is inflation. It's increasing, as it often does after a long business expansion. Strong demand allows companies to raise prices. Low unemployment puts upward pressure on wages. In the past 12 months, the consumer price index (CPI) has increased 3.5 percent. It's not just gasoline prices. So-called core inflation -- all items minus food and energy prices -- is 2.3 percent. By contrast, the CPI rose only 1.9 percent in 2003, and core inflation was only 1.5 percent.

All this creates a dilemma for the Fed. Since mid-2004, it has been raising short-term interest rates to stymie inflation by slowing the economy. That might be happening now. Housing construction and sales have weakened; consumer spending could follow. Should the Fed continue raising rates to ensure that inflation subsides? Or would that cause a sharp slowdown, even a recession?

The less traditional problem involves global financial markets -- markets around the world for stocks, bonds and currencies. Since April stock markets have declined. From their recent highs through last evening, the Dow is down 5.5 percent; the Nikkei (Tokyo), 12.4 percent; the Kospi (Seoul), 11.1 percent; and the Bovespa (Sao Paulo), 13 percent. Although these declines are not huge, they all happened together. Meanwhile, interest rates on bonds have risen, and the dollar has dropped against the euro and the yen.

It seems that national financial markets, once fairly compartmentalized, are increasingly interconnected and interdependent. Companies such as Goldman Sachs, mutual funds, pension funds and hedge funds (loosely regulated pools from small numbers of wealthy investors) can move money easily across borders and react to the same events.

The danger is that these two developments will interact to create a chain reaction in financial markets that damages the world economy. Investors worry that tighter credit in the United States -- and Europe and Japan -- will imperil expansion and expose speculative investment practices. Or the trigger could be huge trade imbalances (U.S. deficits, Asian surpluses), high oil prices, terrorism or protectionism against China, says economist Desmond Lachman of the American Enterprise Institute. Just last week the European Central Bank warned that hedge funds posed a "major risk" to financial stability.

As Treasury secretary, Paulson may be frustrated by long-standing problems that elude solution. Or he may grapple with a surprising crisis to prevent some greater calamity. With hindsight, people may conclude that Snow was fairly shrewd. He knew when to leave.

Rope-a-Senator (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0032685

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

THE MOST disturbing thing isn't that Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) accepted free ringside tickets to Las Vegas boxing matches, worth between several hundred and several thousand dollars each. It's that even when pressed the senator didn't see anything wrong with taking the freebies at the same time he was pushing federal legislation to oversee the industry. "I would be criticized if I didn't go," he said after the Associated Press broke the story. "It's just like going to an Ohio State football game, an Arizona State football game -- in Nevada, boxing is it."

Senate rules, which normally limit gifts to $50, don't bar more valuable presents from state and local governments, and the tickets in this case came from the Nevada Athletic Commission, a state agency. The rules don't even require that such gifts be disclosed, which reflects a problem with the rules, not with Mr. Reid's behavior.

Nor was Mr. Reid doing the athletic commission's bidding; to the contrary, he was pushing legislation it opposed, and there's no indication that he changed his position after attending the fights.

But commission officials were eager for an opportunity to lobby the senator -- and where better than ringside? This is the point of rules on gifts: It's unseemly for lawmakers to be accepting benefits from those who are trying to influence them on legislation. The Senate Ethics Manual cautions that lawmakers "should be wary of accepting any gift where it appears that the gift is motivated by a desire to reward, influence, or elicit favorable official action."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who teamed up with Mr. Reid on the boxing legislation, got that point. As reported by the AP's John Solomon, Mr. McCain joined Mr. Reid at a championship fight in 2004 but paid $3,400 for tickets for himself and his wife. Mr. Reid explained the difference this way: "He came here to watch the fight, I came here to work for the state of Nevada and to watch the fight."

Mr. Reid first declared that he would continue to take free tickets, then reversed course the next day "to avoid even the faintest appearance of impropriety." Maybe he got an inkling: It's this culture of entitlement that offends ordinary Americans -- who don't get free ringside seats and who have to settle for pay-per-view.

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Slide Further After Monday's Sell-Off (NYT)

By John Holusha

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Stocks slid further today in after a big sell-off on Monday, as investors continued to be nervous about remarks by the Federal Reserve's chairman indicating that interest rates might keep climbing to keep inflation in check.

The Dow Jones industrial average traded below 11,000 for much of the day for the first time since early March, although it closed barely above that mark.

Investors also remained worried by increasing evidence that economic growth is slowing, said Stuart Freeman, chief equity strategist for A. G. Edwards & Sons.

"We have seen in the week specific data that show that the economy is slowing," he said, citing lower numbers for construction, housing prices and mortgage applications. The housing and construction industries are considered to be particularly sensitive to interest rates.

Asian and European stock markets followed Monday's fall on Wall Street by dropping sharply today. In Tokyo, the Nikkei 225 index fell 1.8 percent, and most other indexes in Asian and Pacific countries lost ground, especially those in Australia and India. Major European markets fell 1.6 percent or more, and the CAC 40 index in Paris dropped 2.4 percent.

In New York, the leading market indexes ended trading lower this afternoon, although some late buying cut their losses. According to preliminary figures, the Dow industrials fell 46.58 points, or 0.4 percent, to close at 11,002.14.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 1.44 points, or 0.1 percent, to 1,263.85. And the Nasdaq composite index dropped 6.84 points, or 0.3 percent, to 2,162.78.

On Monday, the Dow fell almost 200 points, or 1.8 percent, after Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed chairman, said the central bank intended to remain vigilant in fighting inflation.

His remarks were interpreted to mean that the Fed would probably increase its benchmark short-term interest rate for a 17th time when its policymaking committee meets at the end of the month. Investors had been hoping for a halt to the rate increases.

Bond prices were modestly higher this afternoon, pushing down their yields, despite the prospect of another Fed rate increase. Still, the dollar gained some strength against the euro, the Japanese yen and the British pound. Commodity prices, meanwhile, moved lower.

DOJ_NMG_0032686

Stocks Take Hit As Dow Finishes At 3-Month Low (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

Following Monday's selloff, investors continued to flee stocks tied most closely to economic growth, but a late-day rebound helped to soften the blow.

After falling 199.15 points on Monday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 122.30 points in the middle of the trading day, well below the 11000 level that it had traded above for most of this year. Then, the late surge pushed the blue-chip average back above the much-watched 11000 benchmark, leaving it down just 46.58 points, or 0.42%, at 11002.14.

The Dow industrials now are down 640.51 points, or 5.5%, since hitting a six-year high of 11642.65 on May 10. Back then, they were fewer than 100 points below their January 2000 record close of 11722.98. Now, they are at a three-month low, although still up 2.7% this year.

For a second day, the main drag on stocks was Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's surprisingly blunt warning in a speech Monday that key inflation indicators are running above the level he considers acceptable. His comment was taken as a warning that the Fed may move to slow the economy further by pushing its target short-term interest rate up for a 17th time running, to 5.25%, at its next interest-rate meeting June 28 and 29. Some analysts worried the Fed might raise rates further as the summer progresses. Higher interest rates hurt stocks by slowing economic growth and crimping corporate profits.

Investors continued to flee stocks that had shown the sharpest gains in recent years, those that had been propelled higher by booming world economic growth. Investors now fear that those stocks have risen too far, at a time when central bankers led by Mr. Bernanke seem intent on continuing to raise interest rates and mopping up excess cash in order to snuff out inflationary pressures.

"The economically sensitive stocks were getting banged around," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners. But late in the day, as the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index managed to remain above the intraday low it had hit late in May, buyers stepped in and stocks "bounced nicely," he noted.

The S&P 500 finished down just 0.11%, or 1.44 points, at 1263.85, still up 1.3% in 2006. Makers of consumer staples -- daily necessities such as food and household products that are less dependent on economic growth -- actually finished the day with gains. They are heavily represented in the S&P 500. Procter & Gamble rose 0.4% and Colgate-Palmolive gained 1%.

Things looked nasty as the day began. U.S. investors awoke to find foreign stocks down sharply in the wake of Monday's U.S. declines.

Even after the late-day recovery, copper producer Phelps Dodge finished down 1.1%. Construction- and mining-equipment maker Caterpillar fell 1.2%, and aluminum maker Alcoa fell 2.2%. All three have fallen more than 15% since the first half of May. Many banking stocks, whose cost of obtaining money rises when interest rates move higher, continued to decline. J.P. Morgan fell 1.4%, but Citigroup inched up 0.3%.

A wide variety of commodities, which had been soaring amid economic optimism until last month, also continued their pullback, led by copper and gold. Despite continued worries about summer oil supplies and despite export-cutoff threats from Iran, crude-oil futures edged down 10 cents to $72.50 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold futures fell $13.80 to $629.40 a troy ounce.

Small stocks, which once led the gains, were again among the hardest-hit because small companies are more dependent on bank borrowing than large ones. The Russell 2000 small-stock index fell 0.41% to 710.96, its lowest finish in nearly four months. It is down 9.1% since hitting a record May 5, although it still is up 5.6% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.32%, or 6.84 points, to 2162.78, down 1.9% this year.

The dollar, which becomes more attractive to investors when interest rates are higher, rose again against both the yen and the euro. Although short-term Treasury-note prices fell on the rate fears, pushing yields higher, longer-term notes and bonds moved the opposite way. That reflects in part a flight to safety as investors abandon stocks for bonds, but it also suggests that bond investors may be somewhat less concerned about inflation risks than are stock investors.

Measures of market volatility, based on option trading, moved sharply higher. That reflected fears that markets have entered a period when investors and Fed officials alike will be uncertain of how much higher the Fed will have to raise rates, when such decisions will be made based on what hard-to-predict economic data indicate about inflation risks.

In the short term, investors will be watching to see whether the Dow can hold the 11000 mark, and whether other indexes can remain above recent lows. If the market moves sharply below these much-watched levels, another round of selling could follow.

Three more Fed officials spoke yesterday, offering opinions that weren't always fully in line with Mr. Bernanke's.

DOJ_NMG_0032687

William Poole, president of the St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank, and Fed Governor Susan Bies both suggested that higher inflation could force more rate increases, echoing Mr. Bernanke. But Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig said inflation pressures should "taper off" as economic growth moderates, suggesting that he may be less worried about inflation risks.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated; bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.010%. The 30-year bond was up 14/32 to yield 5.083%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, the currency traded at 113.22 yen, up from 112.17, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2838 from $1.2914.

Inflation Fears Mount At Fed As Poole Toughens Rate Posture (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Inflation alarms at the Federal Reserve rang louder yesterday as a top official said slowing economic growth may not be enough to contain inflation if the public's inflationary psychology intensifies.

"If inflation turns out to exceed ... our target range, I do not believe we can count on a slowing economy to bring inflation down, by itself, quickly," William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said in an interview. If inflation expectations rose in "a persistent way...we could expect to see that show up in measured inflation in fairly short order."

Mr. Poole said to keep expected inflation from rising further, the Fed needs "an upside bias" in setting interest rates.

Mr. Poole, who has held his job since 1998, has long been on the hawkish side of the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee. The FOMC consists of seven Washington-based governors and 12 regional-bank presidents, of whom five vote in a given year.

Nonetheless, Mr. Poole's remarks echoed Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, who on Monday indicated he is more concerned about the recent rise in inflation than signs of slowing economic growth. Mr. Bernanke's remarks prompted futures markets to sharply increase the odds that the Fed will raise its short-term interest-rate target to 5.25% from 5% at its meeting on June 28-29. Mr. Poole's remarks, made in an interview Monday and published yesterday on WSJ.com and Dow Jones Newswires, caused those odds to rise further, to 80% from 72% Monday and 48% Friday. They also contributed to a decline in stocks yesterday.

When the public expects higher inflation, it may set prices and wages in a way that makes that expectation a reality. Mr. Poole said that effect is more powerful than the "output gap," the idle capacity that exists when the economy is operating below its potential. "If inflation expectations were to rise ... it might take a very long time before the [output gap] would be able to offset what's going on with inflation expectations."

Mr. Poole noted that investors' expectations of inflation, judging from the behavior of inflation-protected Treasury bonds, have risen about 0.2 percentage point this year. "It's not a huge number, but from my perspective, it's going in the wrong direction" because inflation is already "at the upper end of what I would like to see." Many officials say they prefer that inflation, by their favored price index, remain between 1% to 2%, which Mr. Poole called a "fully acceptable range," though he personally would prefer a lower target. By that measure, inflation was 2.1% in April.

Analysts say Mr. Bernanke's speech may in part have been meant to squelch doubts of his willingness to administer tough anti-inflation medicine. If so, he appears to have succeeded.

Macroeconomic Advisers, a forecasting firm, says expected inflation as measured by inflation-protected bonds has dropped almost 0.1 percentage point in the past two days. Brian Sack, an economist there, called that a "vote of confidence" in Mr. Bernanke but cautioned it was conditional on the Fed raising rates later this month.

Other Fed officials delivered more balanced messages. Governor Susan Bies said at a conference in California yesterday that 2.1% inflation "makes me very uncomfortable" but added that the 16 quarter-percentage point interest rate increases the Fed has made over the past two years are still "making their way through the economy." And Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig, at an event in Montrose, Colo., said, "We know that monetary policy acts with a lag ... that the effects could still be ahead of us," and while inflation expectations have ticked higher, that has happened in the past and not been sustained.

Separately, the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia named Charles Plosser, an economics professor at the University of Rochester, its new president effective Aug. 1. He succeeds Anthony Santomero, who resigned March 31.

Michael Feroli, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase, said Mr. Plosser "likely has a hawkish bent," given his grounding in an economic theory that holds the Fed has little influence on growth and should thus focus exclusively on inflation. Like Mr. Poole before his current job, Mr. Plosser has served on the Shadow Open Market Committee, a group of academics that has often criticized the Fed for being soft on inflation.

Pondering The Bear Necessities (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0032688

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

NEW YORK, June 6 -- Now that the Dow Jones industrial average has slid 246 points in two days and shed 5.5 percent since mid-May, it's time to ask the question: How do you distinguish a short-term stock market correction from a full-blown bear market?

You wait awhile, of course. But already there are clues in technical market data, such as who is doing the buying and selling, the price of stocks relative to corporate earnings, inflation data, and the length of time since the last recession.

Corrections, defined as a drop of 5 percent over a few weeks or a month or two, are pretty common. Since 1900, the Dow has fallen at least that much more than 300 times, or an average of more than three times a year, according to Ned Davis Research Inc. But nine out of 10 such slides bottom out and start rising again. It's the other 10 percent that scare the pants off investors. They turn into bear markets, in which the broad market indicators lose 20 percent or more and take their own sweet time coming back.

Even the professionals have trouble telling the two apart. In 2005, the Dow dropped more than 800 points -- 8 percent -- in March and April before rallying, then dropped an additional 400 points in September and October before climbing some more. In both cases, investors who jumped out prematurely would have suffered losses and missed another good rise.

On the other hand, analysts were full of rosy predictions in 2000 and 2001 that the market was simply resting briefly and would soon resume its dizzying climb. None of the major indicators have ever returned to their early 2000 highs.

"Picking the short-term movement of the stock market is like standing at the roulette table and saying, 'I think red is coming up next' and then congratulating yourself when you are right," said Andrew Smithers, a British economic consultant. Though he published a book in March 2000 that correctly predicted that stocks were overvalued and about to tank, he called the timing "pure luck."

Now, consider today's investing environment.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke spooked the equity markets Monday with comments that suggested the central bank is concerned about inflation and is likely to continue to raise interest rates. That prospect in turn raises fears that a significantly tighter money supply could push the already slowing economy into recession. The Dow shed 199 points on Monday and was down as much as 110 points on Tuesday before climbing back to 11,002.14, down 46.58 points for the day.

The Nasdaq composite index dropped 6.84 Tuesday and is down 3.6 percent since the beginning of January. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 1.44 Tuesday to finish at 1263.85, down more than 4 percent from its most recent high in May. Even the high-flying Russell 2000, which tracks small stocks and gained 13.9 percent in the first quarter, has given back more than half of its 2006 gains.

"There's some panic in the street," said Al Goldman, chief equity strategist for brokerage firm A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc., "but I don't feel it's justified. . . . We don't have any signs that a recession is at hand, and inflation, although it's up, is still pretty well contained."

George Feiger, who runs Contango Capital Advisors, a wealth-management business, looks at the same signals and sees trouble. "All the technical indicators are showing that we must be getting near the end. The economy is slowing down, the dollar is tanking, people are pulling their money out of equities and putting them in cash, huge amounts of debt have been issued by below-grade [high-risk] issuers," he said. "Where else can it go? The real question is not where will it go but how far."

Interviews with nearly a dozen economists and market analysts turned up widely varying views on whether this particular market correction will develop fur and claws. That's partly because each one looks at different signals to determine where the equity markets are going.

Charles Biderman, chief executive of TrimTabs Investment Research, argues that the real answers lie in mutual fund flows and in whether companies are spending money to buy their own stock or that of other companies as part of a merger. He noted that at the market peak in early 2000, individual investors were piling into equity funds but that companies were net sellers of stock. By contrast, at the bottom of the last bear market from June 2002 to February 2003, individuals pulled $100 billion out of equity funds, while companies were net buyers by $30 billion. "Typically, individual investors are always wrong," Biderman said, "and ever since the mid-1990s, for every year when companies were net buyers of their own shares, the market has gone up."

Right now, Biderman notes, companies are again net buyers -- he calculated that in May, 135 companies announced a total of $63 billion in stock buybacks and $40 billion more in stock purchases as part of takeovers. Meanwhile, individuals pulled money out of equity funds in May. His conclusion: "The economy is doing very well, and the market is underperforming."

James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist for Wells Capital Management, also predicts good times ahead for stock buyers. He argues that corporate profits and consumer spending are still relatively strong and notes that even though the Federal Reserve has repeatedly raised the benchmark short-term interest rate over the past two years, the current level of 5 percent is still low by historical standards.

DOJ_NMG_0032689

"I think the odds favor us getting over this and going back up to where we were," Paulsen said. "My bet is that we have not shut down the speed of world growth yet."

Some analysts are far less sanguine. Many of them rely on the relationship between a company's share price and its earnings to determine whether it is over- or undervalued, and they say that rapidly rising corporate earnings were the crucial engine behind the stock market's long rise from late 2002 through the first part of this year. S&P 500 companies are trading around 15 times operating earnings, well below where they were at the last market peak in 2000.

But some analysts are worried that high energy prices and the possibility -- also mentioned by Bernanke on Monday -- of a cooling economy could combine to make it harder for companies to post strong earnings growth. "Earnings are going to be a little harder from now on," said Peter Jankovskis, director of research for OakBrook Investments LLC. Though he thinks the current drop is a correction rather than a bear market, he said small investors with extra money in their pockets might do well to put it in a money market fund or high-interest bank account until the current trend becomes clearer. "The market definitely has cycles: Sell in May, stay away. Markets are generally weak in the summer. . . . It won't hurt you to stay on the sidelines for a while."

On the other hand, investors who are already invested in equities shouldn't run for the exits, market watchers said. "The worst thing that can happen is that people panic at the bottom, and it takes them a year or two to get over that panic. By that time, you've missed most of the next bull market," said Ken Tower, chief market strategist for CyberTrader, a Charles Schwab Co. subsidiary that focuses on active traders.

Ben Bernanke: Tough Guy (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Ben S. Bernanke rattled world financial markets Monday with his tough talk about combating inflation, but he also buffed up his image as a strong Federal Reserve chairman committed to the fight, analysts said yesterday.

"He reintroduced testosterone to the inflation-fighting resolve of the Fed," said Diane Swonk, chief economist of Mesirow Financial Inc., an investment management firm. "This is a pure male thing. He said to the markets, 'You think I'm a wimp? Take me on.' "

Gone, during Bernanke's remarks to a bankers' conference, was any mention of a Fed pause in its two-year series of interest rate increases. Gone was any fretting over the danger of pushing interest rates too far and triggering a slump. Instead, he declared that the recent rise in inflation would not be tolerated.

Bernanke, who took over as Fed chief in February, needed to send such a signal to counter the markets' doubts about his anti-inflation resolve, analysts said -- even though it meant jolting the markets with the implication of higher interest rates. He called recent inflation trends "unwelcome," noting that the Labor Department's consumer price index, excluding volatile food and energy items, had risen at a 3.2 percent annual rate over the three months ended in April and at a 2.8 percent pace in the six months ended in April.

When Bernanke told Congress in April that the Fed might pause in its rate increases, "he sent a bad message that the central bank was going to be soft on inflation, and that was the wrong message to send when energy, commodities and raw materials prices were at multi-decade or historic highs," said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research Corp. "I was pleasantly surprised [Monday]; my beliefs were confirmed that the world's most important central banker was in fact vigilant against inflation. He finally laid that out. I'm surprised he didn't do this earlier."

Bernanke's remarks followed extensive discussion within the central bank about its strategy for communicating with the public. Bernanke has long argued that Fed officials should be more open about their thinking to help the markets anticipate the likely course of interest rates. But that effort may have backfired: Recent attempts to reflect the Fed's internal uncertainty and debate caused some investors to question whether the central bank's commitment to low inflation had weakened with the retirement of former chairman Alan Greenspan.

Most of the Fed's top policymakers believed they were nearly done when they raised their benchmark short-term interest rate to 4.75 percent at their meeting in late March, Bernanke's first as chairman, minutes of that session show. And some of them worried then about the danger of raising the rate too high and causing an economic downturn. But others expressed concern about the inflation risks posed by rising prices for energy and raw materials, tightening labor markets, and robust economic growth -- suggesting that more interest rate increases might be needed.

Fed officials again lifted the rate in May, to 5 percent, and left the door open to more increases. But several also spoke more openly in public about the difficulty of knowing when to stop raising interest rates -- the classic dilemma for any central bank and one that the Greenspan Fed faced three times in his 18-year tenure.

DOJ_NMG_0032690

The problem is that Fed interest rate changes take effect over many months and even years, as consumers take on new mortgages, car loans and credit card debt and as businesses borrow to expand. Higher interest rates eventually crimp spending, causing the economy to soften and inflation to fall -- but the process takes time.

And, as Bernanke observed in a paper he co-authored in 1995, when interest rates go up, economic growth typically slows many months before inflation falls .

This makes it particularly tricky to decide when to stop. The Fed today is close to reaching that "no-man's land of not knowing if you've gone too far because of the lags," Swonk of Mesirow Financial said.

Inflation rose or stayed high for some months after each time the Greenspan Fed finished a series of interest rate increases, in 1989, 1995 and 2000. Twice, in 1990 and in 2001, the Fed tightenings were followed by recession. Only in 1995 did the Fed achieve the central banker's Holy Grail of a "soft landing," in which an overheating economy cools to a healthy pace of expansion without a painful slump.

Greenspan faced higher inflation than Bernanke faces, and he raised the federal funds rate much higher than it is now before stopping: to nearly 10 percent in 1989, to 6 percent in 1995 and to 6.5 percent in 2000.

The Fed has been steadily raising its benchmark federal funds rate, the overnight interest rate on loans between banks, for two years, from a very low 1 percent in June 2004. With rates so low for so long, the housing market boomed through last year and began to soften only in recent months. Consumer spending remained strong through earlier this year and has just recently started to sag.

Bernanke said Monday that the expected economic slowdown "seems now to be underway," but he expressed more concern about inflation and signaled strongly that interest rates will move higher before he is done.

Financial markets, which have been volatile for weeks because of inflation fears and uncertainty over the Fed's likely action, sold off Monday and yesterday on expectations of more rate increases.

"This happens all the time at the end of a tightening cycle, and everybody is all atwitter because they don't know when it will end," said Mark Gertler, the New York University professor who co-authored the 1995 paper on Fed policy with Bernanke. "Our paper tells you there are lags in the effects of policy but doesn't tell you when to stop."

Fed, Bernanke Take Blistering Flak (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff And Adam Shell

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke is finding out the hard way that openness is not the same thing as clarity.

Bernanke took office in February promising to make central bank policy more transparent. Four months later, a number of economists and traders say the Fed chairman and other central bank officials have stumbled by making too many contradictory statements, muddying the outlook and spooking markets.

The complaints got louder Monday after Bernanke told a banking group inflation was at an “unwelcome” level, raising the specter of further Fed interest rate increases. That appeared counter to April congressional testimony in which Bernanke suggested the central bank could pause from its two-year campaign of interest rate increases, even if inflation was a risk.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell nearly 200 points Monday and another 47 points Tuesday.

“Give us a break, please. Can we have just one week, or at least one day, without some Fed official obsessing publicly about containing inflation?” says Ed Yardeni, chief investment strategist at Oak Associates. “They are giving us more information than we need.”

The issue goes beyond language, however. There are a number of reasons the Fed is taking flak as it tries to wind up a drive that has pushed short-term interest rates to 5% from a historic low of 1% in mid-2004:

·The economy is changing. Minutes of the March 27-28 meeting of the Fed's policymaking Open Market Committee show members believed the end of the tightening cycle was near, with some expressing concern the Fed could push rates too high. Bernanke's April testimony echoed those comments. The markets, however, interpreted Bernanke's “pause” statement as soft on inflation. Further, in recent weeks core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy, has been running above the Fed's 2% projection.

As the Fed responded to market concerns and altered conditions, its message necessarily changed.

“The end of tightening cycles are often controversial. We see more disagreement on the Fed committee about what the stopping point is; we see more skittishness in the markets,” says Brian Sack of Macroeconomic Advisers, a former Fed economist. “This was a tricky time to have a transition to a new chair.”

·There are disagreements on policy. While some analysts applaud Bernanke's emphasis on inflation, others say the central bank is not paying enough attention to economic cooling. They fear the Fed will push rates too high, choking growth. “The Fed is overly concerned with inflationary pressures and less concerned with the slowing of economic activity … the consumer is getting whacked" by rising rates and energy prices, says David Lereah, National Association of Realtors' chief economist.

DOJ_NMG_0032691

·There are too many voices. Bernanke doesn't yet have the same control that former chairman Alan Greenspan had over the Open Market Committee. Traders and economists are paying more attention to sometimes conflicting statements of Fed governors and regional bank presidents to try to figure out policy.

"They should really leave it to one spokesman, and that should be the Fed chairman," Yardeni says.

·Bernanke doesn't have Greenspan's inflation-fighting credentials and reputation.

"He needs to quickly realize that the markets around the world care very much about every word that comes out of his mouth," says Gary Kaltbaum, a money manager at Kaltbaum & Associates. "Potentially, it could be a longer-term positive that he is going to stand up to inflation if it is occurring … (it's) better than doing nothing and letting things get out of hand."

Unease Over Fed Policy Has Markets In A Tizzy (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 7, 2006

The bulls and bears are in a heated game of chicken that has the Dow clinging to 11,000 for dear life.

Puzzlement about what appeared to be a threat Monday from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke to head off inflation at any price has Wall Street's mood ranging from nervous to downtrodden. Those fears sent the Dow Jones industrial average below 11,000 for much of Tuesday, before it recovered to close down 47 points at 11,002 — barely extending its longest streak above 11,000 to 61 trading days.

Inflation and the Fed are perplexing investors. "The worry is the Federal Reserve has already made a mistake or … will make a mistake soon," by raising short-term interest rates too high in its efforts to keep inflation in check, says Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors.

Investors have historical reasons to be concerned, says Sam Stovall, market strategist at Standard & Poor's. During the past 36 years, the Fed has had to start cutting interest rates — to help the economy — six months or less after its last rate increase, on average.

"People worry the Fed tightens too much," Stovall says.

Fearing the Fed might be about to dump a bucket of cold water on the economy, investors are running from the risky stocks and assets they were chasing just months ago. Consider how investors have been punishing the riskiest areas of the market since the Dow Jones industrial average topped out this year on May 10, including:

·Emerging market stocks. The biggest losers, by far, have been emerging markets investments in developing nations ranging from Brazil to China. The iShares MSCI Emerging Markets exchange-traded fund, which soared 31% in 2005, has tanked 16.5% since March 10.

·Companies with small market values. The USA's smallest publicly traded firms, as measured by the Russell 2000 index, have cratered 8.4% since May 10. Meanwhile, less- risky large-company stocks, measured by the S&P 500, are down just 4.5%.

·Former winning industry groups. Industries that investors target when the economy is steaming ahead or is expected to be strong, such as basic materials and semiconductors, have been battered. The iShares Dow Jones U.S. Basic Materials ETF is down 10.7% from May 10. That has cut its 2006 gain to 7.0%, which doesn't look bad until you consider it had been up 20% at its peak for the year.

Meanwhile, defensive stocks such as health care have lived up to their names as investors' hiding places. The iShares Dow Jones U.S. Healthcare Providers ETF is up 1.1% since the Dow topped on May 10.

This reminder of the dangers of owning risky stocks was overdue, because investors were almost blindly buying them, says Jack Ablin of Harris Private Bank: "It makes sense to stay on the safe side of the street."

Economic Rehab (WSJ)

By Brian S. Wesbury

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The stock, bond, currency and commodity markets are bouncing around wildly. While there are many crosscurrents, monetary policy and economic data are front and center in day-to-day market volatility. As a result, some market observers are trash-talking the new Federal Reserve Board chairman, Ben Bernanke, and blaming him for all sorts of perceived missteps.

This is unfair. Mr. Bernanke is doing a fine job. The inflationary pressures he is fighting today were baked in the cake before he arrived. Monetary policy was overly accommodative for too long, and even after 16 rate hikes the Fed has not yet reached neutral. Weaning investors, home builders, hedge funds and proprietary trading desks from 50-year low interest rates is like forcing them to quit smoking: It's good for the health of the economy, but it hurts and they are complaining loudly.

DOJ_NMG_0032692

There are two forces that cause the economy to grow. One is real, the other is an illusion. The real force -- entrepreneurial innovation and creativity -- comes naturally as long as government policies do not drive it away. The artificial force is easy money. An increased supply of money, by creating an illusion of wealth, can increase spending in the short run, but this eventually turns into inflation. Printing money cannot possibly create wealth; if it could, counterfeiting would be legal.

For monetary policy makers and investors it is important to determine to what extent growth is due to each force. In the late 1990s, when the economy and equity markets were booming, the Greenspan Fed became convinced that monetary policy was largely responsible. But commodity prices were falling and the dollar was strong -- both signs that Fed policy was not the culprit. The Fed hiked interest rates anyway. This was a mistake. The U.S. economy fell into recession and deflation became the No. 1 fear of financial markets and central banks around the world.

The Fed fought this deflation -- by cutting rates 11 times in 2001 -- eventually pushing the federal funds rate down to 1%. In late 2001, commodity prices began to rise, and in early 2002 the dollar began to fall. But because it was so worried about deflation, the Fed ignored these signs of monetary excess and held rates artificially low well into 2004. This policy has finally come home to roost.

Inflation is on the rise. "Core" consumer prices have climbed 3.2% at an annual rate in the past three months, the fastest growth since 1995. Mr. Bernanke said recently that inflation has "reached a level that, if sustained, would be at or above the upper end of the range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability and the promotion of maximum long-run growth."

What the market is debating is whether fighting this inflation will hurt the economy. With housing activity down sharply, these fears are palpable. But this is likely an overreaction. Housing was stimulated to extraordinary heights by artificially low interest rates (and the 1997 capital gains tax cut) and is now correcting back to more normal levels. Housing starts may be down 18.4% from their peak, but they are still up 12.3% from 1999 levels. It may be painful for participants in the construction industry and those who thought they could make a fast buck flipping houses, but only a recession could send the housing market into a tailspin.

Historically, housing has been a solid leading indicator of business cycles, but the special circumstances of recent years suggest that this time it is sending a misleading signal. And while some believe that a slowdown in housing will undermine consumer spending, this fear is overblown. Cash-out financing (or mortgage equity withdrawal) may have increased spending for those who took advantage of low interest rates to refinance, but every dollar of borrowing was funded with someone else's savings.

With interest rates up and refinance activity down, the savings do not disappear, but instead are used in different ways. Resources that would have been put into housing will be shifted to other sectors of the economy. One area that appears to be benefiting already is business fixed investment. Commercial and industrial loans are up 14.9% at an annual rate during the first four months of this year, and after five years of sluggishness are finally growing at rates similar to those of the late 1990s.

In other words, there is little evidence that rates have reached a level that is detrimental to the economy. The Fed is not tight; it is just less loose. This can be seen in real time by watching market-based indicators. Commodity prices remain elevated and the dollar continues to weaken; both suggest excess money creation. Moreover, the economy has not experienced a recession in over 45 years without the federal funds rate rising above nominal GDP growth. In the past year nominal GDP growth has been 6.9%, so with the federal funds rate at 5%, monetary policy is still accommodative.

Nonetheless, the Fed is very close to a neutral monetary policy. Using nominal GDP as a target, and looking back historically, a neutral rate is likely close to 6%. If the Fed could get rates to this level soon, the economy could continue to grow based on underlying entrepreneurial activity and productivity -- a rate estimated to be 3.5% or 4% per year. A neutral rate would also put a lid on inflation, stabilize the dollar and cap commodity prices, including oil. A 6% federal funds rate would be monetary policy nirvana.

Now that the Fed is close, the future path of short-term interest rates has become less certain. After two predictable years, with a rate hike every six to eight weeks, a great deal of leverage was employed by investors who understood the pattern. Lately, many investors have been betting on an early end to rate hikes, but with Mr. Bernanke remaining vigilant about inflation this leverage has become more risky. The result is volatility. In retrospect, if the Fed had moved rates up faster than it did, it might have been able to stop sooner. Unfortunately, the longer the Fed maintains an accommodative policy stance, the higher the neutral rate becomes.

The good news is that there is no reason to suspect that this volatility is anything more than a short-term phenomenon. During the past two years, the Fed was trying to wean the economy from low rates slowly, so as not to shock the system. But in doing so, it allowed inflationary pressures to accumulate. Ben Bernanke is finishing the job and cleaning up the mess. While this may create some near-term turbulence in financial markets, getting rates to neutral will be a huge benefit to the economy.

Mr. Wesbury is chief economist of First Trust Advisors L.P. in Lisle, Ill.

DOJ_NMG_0032693

Realtors Lower Sales Forecast, Seek Pause In Fed Rate Increases (WSJ)

By Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The National Association of Realtors lowered slightly its forecast for existing and new home sales this year, while the group's chief economist called for the Federal Reserve to pause its interest rate increases.

The slowdown from the previously hot housing market is positive because the economy needs a solid housing sector, and slower price appreciation will improve affordability, said NAR Chief Economist David Lereah.

"But this is a time for the Fed to pause rate hikes because we have some interest-sensitive housing markets that have become vulnerable," Mr. Lereah said.

The group lowered slightly its previous forecast for a slowdown this year in home sales and construction. Existing home sales are now projected to decline 6.8% from last year's record to 6.60 million in 2006, while new home sales are seen down 13.4% from last year's record to 1.11 million. Housing starts are forecast to decline 6.2% to 1.94 million this year.

The Realtors' group also lowered slightly its forecast for 30-year fixed mortgage rates. It now expects them to average 6.9% in the second half of the year, a tenth of a percentage point lower than its previous forecast.

The NAR said the housing boom has ended, but it still expects 2006 to be the third-strongest on record for the market. Existing home prices still are expected to grow by slightly more than the historical trend of house appreciation at 1.5 to 2.0 percentage points above inflation, Mr. Lereah said.

The group forecasts the national median existing home price will rise 5.3% this year to $231,300, while the national median new home price will rise 0.8% to $242,900. It expects inflation measured by the consumer price index to grow 3.1% this year, while the economy grows 3.4%.

In general, rising inventories have eased what was unsustainable home price growth, and for most of the country future home price gains will "be much closer to normal returns we expect from housing," said NAR President Thomas Stevens. Higher interest rates have slowed sales in many high-cost markets, but job growth has boosted sales in some moderately priced areas, Mr. Stevens said.

Gas Prices May Fall A Bit, But Summer Costs Still High (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Although gasoline prices will likely dip a bit in the near-term, families hitting the road this summer will still pay record prices at the pump, the government said Tuesday.

Nationwide, retail gasoline prices will average a record $2.76 a gallon over the April-September summer period for regular. That's up 39 cents from last summer and a nickel higher than the Energy Information Administration, the Energy Department's statistical arm, forecast a month ago.

In April, the EIA estimated that summer gasoline prices would average $2.62 a gallon. But prices early in the season have been higher than anticipated, leading to the increase in the forecast, EIA economist Neil Gamson says.

The U.S. average price for a gallon of gasoline was $2.87 Tuesday, up a penny from the day before, and 76 cents higher than a year ago, according to motor club AAA. Prices exceeded $3 a gallon in 10 states.

The most expensive gasoline was in Hawaii at $3.40 a gallon for regular. The cheapest was in Oklahoma and South Carolina, where the statewide average was $2.64, according to AAA.

EIA said prices will likely fall “somewhat” in the near-term, “barring new, unanticipated supply disruptions.” But analysts at the agency warned that prices could rise midsummer, “if demand growth picks up to higher rates than currently expected or if refinery outages occur at unusual rates.”

Higher gasoline prices have largely been driven by elevated oil costs. Oil accounts for approximately half the cost of gasoline for drivers at the pump.

The price of a barrel of crude oil in New York closed at $72.50 Tuesday, down 10 cents from Monday.

The record high, not adjusted for inflation, was $75.17 on April 21. In inflation-adjusted dollars, the record is $86.99 set in January 1981, according to EIA data.

Oil prices will likely stay high, the EIA said in its monthly report, as the gap between potential supplies and demand remains extremely small, putting oil investors on edge.

“Because of only limited surplus capacity throughout the forecast period, continued concern about potential or existing supply problems in Nigeria, Iran, Iraq, Venezuela and elsewhere, as well as the threat of more hurricane damage and the continued tight supply-demand balance, we expect little change in the current high-price environment,” EIA analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0032694

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke on Monday cited high energy prices as a concern for the economy, reducing consumers' non-energy spending power and driving up inflation. “The volatility of these and other commodity prices is such that possible future increases in these prices remain a risk to the inflation outlook,” he said at an American Bankers Association forum.

Bilbray Close To Victory (AP)

By Philip J. Lavelle And Dani Dodge

The Associated Press, June 7, 2006

Republican Brian Bilbray appeared headed toward a win over Democrat Francine Busby last night in the race to replace imprisoned former Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham in the 50th Congressional District, a contest seen as a gauge of voter attitudes for the national midterm elections.

In another closely watched race, Rep. Bob Filner easily defeated Assemblyman Juan Vargas in the 51st Congressional District Democratic primary. It was their third face-off in what has become a long and bitter rivalry.

Bilbray said in an interview that he believed his long focus on illegal immigration would pay off in the race against Busby.

“It's been ignored for too long,” said Bilbray, a former congressman-turned-lobbyist. “It's been a simmering problem that's come to a head.”

Bilbray also said that running in a heavily Republican district was an advantage, to a degree. “It can also be a big negative, because people were really hurt by Mr. Cunningham. But it was one man's mistake, and we have to remember that,” he said.

“I don't think anyone should be writing the epitaph for the Republican Party based on what's happened tonight.”

Busby, a Cardiff school board member, was far from conceding late last night.

“Tonight we have made history by sending that message for change ... it's time for Congress to work for us,” Busby told cheering supporters at the D Street Bar and Grill in Encinitas. “This will send a message and put the wind in the sails to take us to victory in November.

“We're waiting to see if the people stand up and send a soccer mom from Cardiff to Congress. ... Anyone who writes this off as just being about Cunningham is wrong. This is just the beginning.”

Filner said he expected to have the edge because of “25 years of effective representation. My opponent had nothing positive to say.”

Vargas could not be reached for comment last night.

The winner in the 50th District will go to Washington and complete the last six months of Cunningham's term, but the campaign will continue. Bilbray and Busby seem certain to face off again in November.

The structure of yesterday's ballot underscored the unusual nature of the election. In addition to the special-election runoff, voters in the 50th cast ballots in the primary for the next two-year term. Busby and Bilbray led their parties in this race, and only Bilbray had nominal opposition because most candidates on the primary ballot agreed not to campaign.

Aside from Filner, none of San Diego County congressional incumbents faced primary opposition and all are expected to cruise to victory in November: Republican Darrell Issa of Vista in the 49th District, Republican Duncan Hunter of Alpine in the 52nd District and Democrat Susan Davis in the 53rd District.

Issa has no Democratic opponent. Hunter will be challenged by Democrat John Rinaldi. Davis will face Republican John Woodrum.

Blake L. Miles won the Republican nomination in Filner's heavily Democratic 51st District.

While Filner and Vargas waged one of the nations's toughest primary campaigns, the Bilbray-Busby race attracted national attention because of the Cunningham scandal and the conventional wisdom that the outcome could foreshadow the midterm elections, when the Democrats hope to win back the House.

In November, a tearful Cunningham, once a brash, swaggering Navy fighter ace in the Vietnam War, resigned his seat after pleading guilty in San Diego federal court to conspiracy and tax evasion for taking more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. He was sentenced to eight years and four months in federal prison.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger set a special election to fill the seat, which was held April 11. The district – a political subdivision including some of the city of San Diego's northern communities plus much of suburban North County – is heavily Republican.

Eighteen candidates were on the April ballot, including 14 Republicans. No candidate won a majority, so the top voter-getters of each party moved to yesterday's runoff. Bilbray is a political veteran whose career was spent in the South Bay, as mayor of Imperial Beach, as a county supervisor and then as a member of Congress from 1995 to 2001.

After losing his seat to Susan Davis, he became a lobbyist, spending some of his time working for FAIR, an anti-illegal-immigration group. Bilbray moved to his mother's Carlsbad home last year, shortly after Cunningham's troubles were revealed.

DOJ_NMG_0032695

Busby is an 18-year Cardiff resident and has served on the Cardiff school board since 2000. She ran against Cunningham in 2004, and after losing by a wide margin, immediately started campaigning for 2006.

This year's race pitted a Democrat against a Republican seen by many in his own party as too liberal on social issues, including abortion rights, which he supports. There were nasty TV attack ads financed by both Republican and Democratic national parties and visits by high-profile party leaders.

Despite a substantial Republican voter-registration advantage – 44 Republican, 30 percent Democrat and 22 percent independent – polls suggested a dead heat.

Busby focused her campaign on ethics and the "culture of corruption" in Washington – a popular theme among Democratic congressional candidates this year.

But immigration become the defining issue, reflecting its standing atop public opinion surveys in California.

Busby supports the U.S. Senate's immigration bill, which calls for a comprehensive approach to immigration, including a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants along with enforcement measures.

That bill is pushed by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., which led to an awkward situation for Bilbray, who has said the bill would lead to "amnesty." McCain and others dispute that characterization and McCain canceled a scheduled appearance at a Bilbray fundraiser last week, though he said he continued to support the Republican candidate.

Bilbray supports the harder-line House immigration bill, focused exclusively on enforcement, and has said he favors building a fence from the Pacific Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico.

Late last week, Busby found herself doing damage control for a verbal blunder – telling a Spanish-speaker at a meeting of mostly Latinos that "You don't need papers for voting." Republicans seized on her comments, and she later said she flubbed her words and did not mean to advocate illegal immigrants voting, but that she wanted to say people not registered to vote could help her campaign.

By Monday, the GOP had launched a radio ad that said, "That's right. Francine Busby says you don't need papers to vote."

In the 51st Congressional District, it was Round Three between Filner and Vargas, who faced each other in 1992 and 1996.

Both candidates were in relative agreement on the issues, and the contest was marked more by personal attacks than policy discussion.

Each candidate argued that he would be the better representative for the district, with a particular focus on Latinos, who make up about 40 percent of the registered voters in the heavily Democratic district. The 51st includes the South Bay and all of Imperial County.

Vargas, a former San Diego City Council member being forced from the Assembly by term limits, hit Filner for paying his wife more than $505,000 in campaign money over the years to be his fundraiser. Filner said the practice is legal.

Vargas describes himself as a moderate-to-conservative Democrat.

Filner criticized Vargas as being out of step with Democratic Party orthodoxy.

He also attacked Vargas for taking more than $335,000 in contributions from the insurance industry and voting with the industry over consumers, particularly on bills favored by victims of San Diego's 2003 wildfires. Vargas is chairman of the Assembly Insurance Committee.

Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger In November (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Mark Z. Barabak, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

Westly Concedes; Brown Wins and Preschool Plan Fails

After months of vitriolic campaigning, state Treasurer Phil Angelides laid claim early today to the Democratic nomination for governor and pledged to turn his candidacy into a "fight for the California of our dreams."

"I will not let you down," Angelides told exuberant supporters in Sacramento.

At 1:15 a.m., rival Steve Westly borrowed an aide's cell phone and called Angelides from Los Angeles to concede the contest and congratulate his erstwhile foe.

Facing no serious opposition, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger easily won the Republican nomination for a second term and planned to set out today on a bus trip through the Central Valley as the formal kickoff of his reelection effort.

In other results Tuesday, Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown won the party nomination for attorney general and voters rejected a universal preschool initiative.

Angelides' victory claim followed a long night of suspense as he opened a small but steady lead that he never relinquished. Speaking after midnight to his supporters in Sacramento, the exuberant candidate said he would "hit the road tomorrow as the Democratic nominee for governor."

DOJ_NMG_0032696

Earlier in the evening, Angelides stepped before the same crowd and struck the themes that he has sounded for months.

"I believe we can give hardworking families a chance to climb the ladder of success," he said. "I believe we can give our kids the best education in the world. I believe it is time for a governor that California can count on to stand up for hardworking people."

The climate for Tuesday's election was great voter discontent at the direction of the state and nation, with high gasoline prices, immigration and the Iraq war among the top concerns.

A gauge of the national mood Tuesday — and possible precursor of November's midterm election — was the San Diego County congressional race to fill the seat vacated by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who was convicted in a corruption scandal.

The first wave of returns for the special election showed Republican Brian Bilbray holding a single-digit lead over Democrat Francine Busby in what would have been a romp for the GOP candidate in most years.

In the Democratic primary for attorney general, Brown led Los Angeles City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo, who was making his first run for statewide office, from early in the evening. Delgadillo, who conceded late Tuesday, had faced an uphill fight from the start against the former governor and three-time presidential candidate, a household name to Californians for decades.

"We knew this was going to be a tough race when we got into it, and we gave it our all. But we've come up just a bit short," Delgadillo told supporters at a downtown hotel.

In November, Brown will face Republican nominee Chuck Poochigian, a Fresno state senator who is also little known to most Californians but who has raised enough money to mount a serious campaign against the Oakland mayor.

Another loser in Tuesday's election appeared to be filmmaker Rob Reiner, whose latest ballot measure, Proposition 82, was failing in early returns. It called for raising income taxes on the wealthiest Californians to establish free preschool for all 4-year-olds. Also behind was Proposition 81, a $600-million bond issue to build and repair libraries.

In other races, early returns found that:

· Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante was heading to a wide margin of victory in the Democratic contest for insurance commissioner. But rival John Kraft, who ran virtually no campaign, was winning nearly a third of the vote, a sign of potential trouble in Bustamante's fall race against Republican Steve Poizner, a Silicon Valley millionaire.

· State Sen. Debra Bowen of Marina del Rey was leading Sen. Deborah Ortiz of Sacramento in the Democratic primary for secretary of state. The winner will face Republican incumbent Bruce McPherson in November.

· Another cliffhanger was occurring in the Democratic primary for lieutenant governor, as state Sen. Jackie Speier of Hillsborough and Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi were locked in a tight race, and state Sen. Liz Figueroa of Sacramento was trailing badly. The winner will face Republican nominee Tom McClintock, a Thousand Oaks state senator.

· In the GOP primary for controller, no clear front-runner emerged in the match between state Sen. Abel Maldonado of Santa Maria and former Assemblyman Tony Strickland of Moorpark. In the race for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Joe Dunn of Santa Ana was trailing State Board of Equalization member John Chiang.

· State Supt. of Public Instruction Jack T. O'Connell, a Democrat, appeared headed toward reelection, getting more than half of the vote in the nonpartisan race, which is enough to avert a runoff.

· In the Republican race for treasurer, Board of Equalization member Claude Parrish was leading state Assemblyman Keith Richman of Northridge. The winner will face Democratic nominee Bill Lockyer, now attorney general.

The election also set the field for the fall U.S. Senate race, with Democratic incumbent Dianne Feinstein heavily favored over Republican challenger Richard Mountjoy of Monrovia, a former state senator and leader of the state party's conservative wing.

Across the state, officials reported a few troubles in Tuesday's voting — polling stations that opened late, paper jams in ballot machines and other "standard election day hiccups," said Ashley Snee Giovannettone, a spokeswoman for the secretary of state.

One big glitch was in the Bay Area, where Alameda County was facing an unusually slow ballot count that threatened to delay statewide results until early today. The county, which includes Oakland and the surrounding area, is home to more than 382,000 registered Democrats — about 6% of the party's voters in the state.

The problem was voting machines. The state required the county to scrap its touch-screen machines earlier this year, because they could not produce a paper trail of votes cast, said Guy Ashley, a spokesman for the county's registrar of voters. So the county reverted to optical-scan paper ballots. Tuesday night, the ballots were to be taken from 830 polling stations to a central site to be inserted, one by one, into 60 scanners to tally the vote, Ashley said.

Statewide, turnout was light, although it was too soon to say whether it met projections of a little more than a third of California's 15.7 million registered voters. A huge chunk of the vote came in mail-in ballots, further depleting Tuesday's ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0032697

Los Angeles voter Maria Vasquez, 60, surveyed the deserted polling station at the Islamic Center on Vermont Avenue. "There's nobody here," she said.

For many, the election's main draw was the Democratic contest for governor, a race so spiteful that many Californians cringed at the choice they faced.

In TV ads, Westly portrayed his foe as a former developer who polluted Lake Tahoe, bulldozed wetlands and took campaign money from oil firms.

Angelides, in turn, depicted Westly as an untrustworthy politician who broke his vow not to run negative ads, rewarded a corrupt campaign donor with state favors and backed Schwarzenegger's school and healthcare cuts.

Ads by both Democrats were short on context. In some cases, they misled voters, who were forced to sort out accusations by each man that the attacks from the other were dishonest. In the end, the vicious back-and-forth gave Schwarzenegger a head start in defining his Democratic challenger in negative terms.

"It's hurt the Democrats' chance of beating Schwarzenegger in the fall," said Gary C. Jacobson, a UC San Diego political science professor.

The bitter campaign seemed to hurt both candidates Tuesday, with voters expressing no great enthusiasm for either Angelides or Westly, according to a Los Angeles Times exit poll.

Only about half of those who cast ballots said they very strongly or even fairly strongly supported their candidate, the survey found. Angelides had slightly more solid support than Westly. But Westly had a slightly better image among Democratic primary voters.

The mud fight also came at a time of California voter fatigue, brought on mainly by the 2003 recall and last fall's special election, called by Schwarzenegger. With their bland personalities, Angelides and Westly each struggled to captivate voters. The dry nature of their state finance jobs heightened the challenge.

But neither lacked the fierce ambition that any serious candidate for governor requires.

Angelides, 52, spent years laying the groundwork for his campaign. A former Sacramento home builder and state Democratic chairman, he won the job of state treasurer in 1998 and coasted to reelection in 2002.

The post's duties, like overseeing state debt, are obscure, but Angelides still used the job to polish his political credentials.

As a member of state pension fund boards, he worked hard to build his standing on the environment: He pressured big corporations to take steps against global warming and promoted billions of dollars in investments in solar power and other alternative energy sources.

An important turning point for Angelides was Schwarzenegger's victory in the recall. When the governor took office, Angelides immediately staked his ground as Schwarzenegger's loudest critic, even as Westly and other Democrats were more accommodating to a leader who was then immensely popular. Ever since, Angelides has cited his early willingness to stand up to Schwarzenegger as testament to the strength of his principles.

His top assets in the campaign have been organized labor and top elected officials, such as U.S. Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein. On Tuesday, unions put 5,000 volunteers on the street for Angelides, said the California Labor Federation.

To counter labor's army of volunteers, Westly's main weapon was money: The former EBay executive, who reported more than $225 million in personal income over the last decade, poured more than $35 million of his fortune into his campaign.

Like Angelides, Westly has spent decades building ties with players in the state Democratic Party. He was vice chairman of the party in the late 1980s.

His base is the Silicon Valley. A former investment banker, Westly, 49, served as a manager at several dot-com companies. The last one, EBay, made him an instant tycoon when its stock went public.

In 2002, Westly left EBay and spent millions of dollars in his campaign for controller, a job he won by a margin of less than 1 percentage point. In the race for governor, he has taken credit for collecting billions of dollars in unpaid taxes as controller.

For months, he has used those efforts — and his pledge to raise taxes only as a "last resort" — to contrast himself with Angelides, who has made his plan to increase taxes on corporations and the wealthy a central focus of his campaign.

It was largely the tax issue that enabled Westly to position himself as the more moderate Democrat in the race. That, in turn, led to a series of polls showing that he would perform better against Schwarzenegger than Angelides would. Westly's campaign used those polls to argue to the end that he was the one candidate who could reclaim the governor's job for Democrats.

CONTRIBUTORS

Also contributing to election night coverage were Times staff writers Jonathan Abrams, Juliet Chung, Lynn Doan, Megan Garvey, Arin Gencer, John M. Glionna, Michelle Keller, Patrick McGreevy, Paul Pringle, Valerie Reitman, Lee Romney, Catherine Saillant, Robert Salladay, Nancy Vogel and Nancy Wride.

DOJ_NMG_0032698

On To November (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

NOW THAT CALIFORNIA'S primary season is over, voters have at least one thing to look forward to: silence. And they better enjoy it because it won't last long. The Democrats' shrill and shallow campaign ads may be off the air, but Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger embarks today on a statewide bus tour. Maybe the winner of Tuesday's Democratic gubernatorial primary can take a few days, a few hours — OK, a few minutes — to pause and consider how to articulate a more positive message about the state's future.

The primary did little to boost the enthusiasm Democrats feel for their state candidates, and voters were also skeptical about two ballot measures to increase public spending on preschool and libraries. Regardless of whether the Democratic gubernatorial candidate is state Treasurer Phil Angelides or state Controller Steve Westly — and the race was too close to call even hours after the polls closed — he will have plenty of work to do before the final contest against Schwarzenegger on Nov. 7.

In the next five months, the Democratic candidate must show that he can repair the damage done to himself, his party and electoral politics in general by the recent weeks of cynical and self-defeating campaigning. If he expects to beat Schwarzenegger, he must rally voters by articulating how he can lead California in meeting a host of challenges. He must inspire confidence in his plans to deal with state finances, housing, transportation, healthcare, immigration and the environment, to name but a few of the state's pressing issues.

It's not enough to be smart, innovative and straightforward. He must also earn the trust of voters who are increasingly wary about where candidates get their campaign money and how they pad their resumes. And he must lay out, in greater detail and more convincing fashion, his plan to deal with the state's structural deficit.

Schwarzenegger, too, has his work cut out for him. He's riding high on the back of unexpectedly rosy revenues, and he now looks like a reliable senior statesman next to the squabbling Angelides and Westly. But if voters are to pick Schwarzenegger for four more years, they must know which version they will get.

Will he be the independent who ousted Gray Davis and called for an end to Sacramento politics as usual? Or the partisan who tried and failed to ram a slate of overreaching ballot measures past voters in a special election? Or the consensus-builder who worked with the Legislature to craft a budget and get a massive rebuilding bond on the November ballot? Or all of the above?

Political professionals often like it when voters are disgusted. They like targeting their campaigns to relatively small numbers of high-propensity voters, and Tuesday's election was notable for its low turnout. But both the Democrats and Schwarzenegger would do well to remember Davis and the 2003 recall — and to keep in mind the voters' skeptical attitude toward both ballot propositions on Tuesday's ballot. Voter disgust can be hard to control.

State Elections Are A Midterm Bellwether (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Alabama Gov. Bob Riley easily won the Republican primary contest last night against former state Supreme Court chief justice Roy S. Moore, once regarded as a formidable challenger because of his support from social conservatives who cheered his refusal to remove a monument to the Ten Commandments from the state judicial building.

Riley probably will face Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley, who in early returns in the Democratic primary was burying the comeback attempt of former governor Don Siegelman, who hoped to use a November contest against Riley to showcase his contention that his ongoing corruption trial is a political vendetta by the Republican who unseated him.

The results were among the first to come in a night when primaries and special elections across the nation were being closely watched for signs of the broader political environment that will influence races in this fall's midterm elections.

The contest with the most national significance -- the special election in California to replace imprisoned former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham in a suburban San Diego district -- was too close to call as polls closed last night on the West Coast.

In the final days of the race, polls showed Democrat Francine Busby in a tight contest against Republican Brian P. Bilbray to complete Cunningham's term in a once-solid GOP seat. A Busby victory in a district where Bush won 55 percent of the vote two years ago would be a clear sign of the headwinds confronting Republicans this fall as they try to keep their 12-year control of the House.

In New Jersey, a famous political name -- Tom Kean Jr., the son of a popular former governor -- won a Republican primary for the right to challenge recently appointed Sen. Robert Menendez (D) in the fall. Also in the Garden State, former New Jersey

DOJ_NMG_0032699

Assembly speaker Albio Sires cruised to a primary victory over Assemblyman Joseph Vas in the 13th Congressional District, all but assuring him a seat in Congress because of the heavily Democratic tilt of the district.

Fearing a damaging, high-profile setback, the National Republican Congressional Committee pumped more than $4.5 million into the California race to help Bilbray, much of it in recent weeks. Busby had scored points by tarring Bilbray, a former congressman from a neighboring district, as a Washington lobbyist. But she hurt her own cause with a verbal blunder last week when she told a largely Latino audience, "You don't need papers for voting."

The former school board member quickly followed that slip by saying, "You don't need to be a registered voter to help" the campaign, but conservative talk show hosts burned up Southern California airwaves this week with charges that Busby was encouraging illegal immigrants to vote.

GOP strategists hoped that would bolster Republican turnout, which may have been depressed by the demoralizing spectacle of their congressman, a decorated Vietnam War pilot, going to prison for bribery. At the very least, Democrats conceded, the gaffe halted Busby's momentum at a critical moment and put her on the defensive.

"She needed a flawless finish to pull this off," said one Democratic Party official in Washington last night, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the results of the election were hours away.

Democratic voters in the nation's most populous state were also deciding yesterday who will challenge Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in the fall. The Democratic establishment's candidate, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, was in a dead-heat contest against telegenic state Controller Steve Westly, whose supporters believe he would be a more formidable opponent to Schwarzenegger. The two candidates have spent a combined $60 million.

In Iowa's gubernatorial race, Secretary of State Chet Culver has said he has the best chance of defeating Rep. Jim Nussle (R) in the fall, but he has tough competition from state Rep. Ed Fallon Jr. and former economic development official Mike Blouin.

Democrats in Washington, eager to seize the 15 House seats necessary to wrest control from the GOP, had much at stake in yesterday's primaries. The race to succeed Nussle in Iowa's 1st Congressional District -- where Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) won 53 percent of the vote in 2004 -- is widely seen as one of the Democrats' best chances at a Republican seat. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had backed trial lawyer Bruce Braley against former state legislator Rick Dickinson. But Bill Gluba, the 2004 nominee, was poised to play spoiler yesterday. Under Iowa rules, if a primary contestant cannot win 35 percent of the vote, the winner will be chosen by a convention of local Democrats.

Republicans were choosing their nominee among three candidates who battled over who would be toughest on illegal immigration: state Rep. Bill Dix, Heart of America Restaurants & Inns founder Mike Whalen and lawyer Brian Kennedy.

In California, the DCCC has been boosting Navy veteran and United Airlines pilot Steve Filson as the kind of moderate-to-conservative Democrat who can beat House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo, a high-profile target. But first, Filson must beat Jerry McNerney, a more established face in the district's Democratic politics but a candidate who Democratic strategists on Capitol Hill fear cannot win enough votes in the conservative San Joaquin Valley.

The Democrats' chance to seize control of the Senate is considered more of a long shot, but one of their top targets is Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who has been mired in allegations of ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. State Auditor John Morrison was once supposed to cruise to the nomination, but revelations of an extramarital affair and an investigation his office had conducted into a company with ties to his onetime paramour turned his contest with state Sen. Jon Tester into a horse race. A Mason-Dixon poll last month showed either candidate ahead of Burns, however.

Senate Race '06-Tester Vs. Burns (AP)

The Associated Press, June 7, 2006

State Senate President Jon Tester has been declared the winner in the Democratic U-S Senate primary.

With 53 percent of the precincts reporting, he was leading 61 percent to State Auditor John Morrison's 36 percent.They were the leading candidates in a field that thinned recently when Paul Richards bowed out to throw his support toTester. Richards, Robert Candee and Kenneth Marcure each had one percent of the Democratic vote.

Tester is a 49-year-old Big Sandy farmer. He maintained he was best able to take on incumbent Senator Conrad Burns on the issue of ethics -- the biggest issue so far as Burns gets attacked for alleged ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Morrison is the 44-year-old son of a former state Supreme Court Justice Frank Morrison Junior. He handily outraised Tester, and flooded the airwaves in recent days with advertisements promoting change in the "culture" of Washington D-C.

Meanwhile, incumbent Senator Conrad Burns has been declared the winner in the Republican U-S Senate primary. With 52 percent of the precincts reporting, he had 72 percent o fthe vote to 23 percent for the closest challenger, state lawmaker Bob Keenan.

Burns is running for his fourth term in office.

DOJ_NMG_0032700

Two other challengers -- Bob Kelleher and Daniel Neste Huffman-- garnered four percent and one percent of the G-O-P vote respectively.

Burns' popularity dropped after reports of his ties to convicted lobbyist Abramoff.

Burns has chalked up the criticism to the "Eastern liberalpress." He's also aired a T-V commercial dismissing the lobbyistas -- quote -- "the guy who ripped off his Indian clients formillions and lied to anybody and everybody."

Keenan, of Bigfork, can't run for the state Senate again becauseof term limits.

Menendez, Kean Win Primary Elections (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

The Associated Press, June 7, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) - New Jersey voters will have to decide in November whether they want a veteran Democratic politician or the scion of a well-known Republican family to be their U.S. senator.

Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. easily won their primary races on Tuesday, as expected. With 90 percent of precincts reporting, Menendez had 84 percent of the Democratic vote. Kean had about 76 percent of the GOP vote with 95 percent of precincts reporting.

Low voter turnout helped conservative Republican John Ginty make a decent showing against Kean, a 37-year-old state senator on the moderate side of the GOP who shares his father's name.

A financial data analyst, Ginty, 41, was counting on his supporters voting in droves to show their disapproval of Kean's support of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. With 95 percent of precincts reporting, Ginty had about 24 percent of the GOP vote.

In a telephone interview, Ginty said he had hoped to do better but wished Kean well. However, Ginty would not say whether he would support Kean in November.

"Mr. Kean is going to have to be able to give conservatives and pro-life voters some incentive to support his candidacy," Ginty said. "That's up to him."

Menendez, 52, had only token opposition in James D. Kelly Jr., 50, who unsuccessfully challenged Corzine in last year's gubernatorial primary.

Menendez laid out his campaign strategy in his speech, constantly linking Kean to President Bush, who lost New Jersey in 2004. A Quinnipiac University poll in March showed that nearly two-thirds of Garden State voters disapproved of the job Bush was doing.

"As George Bush and the status quo in Washington have made the wrong choices for our country, my opponent has joined them time and time again in Trenton," Menendez said. "In five years, he's built a record of siding against New Jerseyans that shows exactly why we can't afford to send him to Washington."

Kean in his campaign will try to convince voters that New Jersey's highest-in-the-nation property taxes and other high levies are Menendez's fault. Kean in a victory speech also addressed Menendez's tactic of linking him to Bush.

"He's not running against President Bush, he's running against Tom Kean," said Kean, who also slammed Menendez as a politician who does not fight for New Jersey's residents.

"Washington is broken," Kean said. "After a decade and a half of Bob Menendez, New Jersey needs to elect a proven reformer that will fight for our security, our families and our values," Kean said.

After hearing his son speak, Thomas Kean said his son has the qualities that make him the best candidate for the job.

"He's thoughtful. He's independent. He's intelligent and he's ethical," Kean Sr. said. "That's what you want in a U.S. senator."

Menendez has a slight edge over Kean in recent polls and a big one in fundraising. As of May 17, Kean had raised $2.97 million, had $1.84 million cash on hand, and a debt of $19,801, according to the Federal Election Commission. Menendez had raised $7.16 million, $6.3 million cash on hand and no debt, according to the FEC.

Several House primaries also were decided Tuesday. In the 13th Congressional District - Menendez's old seat - former Assembly speaker Albio Sires defeated Joseph Vas in the race for the full two-year term. Sires also won the special election for the unexpired term that begins in November.

With about 90 percent of precincts reporting, nearly 16 percent of registered Democrats and Republicans cast ballots - a number that will rise as more returns are recorded. That still beats 2002, the last time a U.S. Senate seat was the main draw, when just 11 percent of the state's registered Democrats and Republicans showed up.

Menendez And Kean Sail Past Primary (NSL)

By Deborah Howlett And Joe Donohue

DOJ_NMG_0032701

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), June 7, 2006

Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. shook off their primary challengers last night and immediately took aim at each other in a campaign that has begun to heat up five months before the general election.

Unofficial returns showed Kean beat a conservative opponent by better than 3-to-1 and Menendez defeated a little-known candidate by more than 5-to-1. In acceptance speeches to their supporters, the nominees set out campaign strategies that foretold a long, hot summer of intensely personal and partisan campaigning for a six-year term in the U.S. Senate.

Kean promised to conduct a referendum on ethics and taxes. "New Jersey needs strong leaders who have character and core principles which will not be compromised for personal profit," he told supporters in Mountainside.

Menendez vowed to stand up to the Bush administration and the status quo in Washington. "Over the next five months, New Jerseyans will have a choice between two candidates with very different visions," he said at a victory celebration in East Brunswick. "The stakes could not be higher."

New Jersey's Senate race will play out against the backdrop of a national battle for control of Congress. Democrats are especially hopeful about making gains in the House, where Republicans hold a 231 to 201 majority, with two vacancies.

One of those vacancies is in New Jersey's 13th Congressional District. Former Assembly Speaker Albio Sires defeated Perth Amboy Mayor Joe Vas yesterday for the Democratic nomination to fill that seat, which Menendez held before his appointment to the Senate. Sires will face Republican John Guarini in the overwhelmingly Democratic district.

In the 5th Congressional District in the state's northwest corner, Republican Rep. Scott Garrett easily won nomination to a third term. He will take on Paul Aronsohn, a former aide to President Bill Clinton and Gov. James E. McGreevey who won the Democratic nomination last night.

Turnout was reported to be light in most parts of the state, although Division of Elections spokesman Jeff Lamb said the total wouldn't be clear until well after vote-counting began.

Slightly more than 2million of the state's 4.8million registered voters are affiliated with a major party, and less than 25 percent of those partisan voters cast ballots in the 2002 midterm primary election. Preliminary results last night indicated an even lower turnout.

Menendez overwhelmed his opponent, James D. Kelly, Jr., a perennial candidate who spent almost no money. With 90 percent of the ballots tallied last night, Menendez had 84 percent of the Democratic vote.

Kean faced a bit tougher challenge from John Ginty, a self-described conservative from Bergen County who was championed by New Jersey Right to Life and other groups he described as "values" voters. With 96 percent of the ballots counted, Kean had 76 percent of the GOP vote.

"I did everything I could," Ginty said at a rally at the Elks Lodge in Edison. "My campaign was brief and I didn't have as many resources as I wished when I first got in, but it's been a pleasure and a privilege to be involved in this process."

The results pit a son of Cuban immigrants, who pushed his way to the top of Hudson County Democratic politics and a 14-year stint in Congress, against a son of a popular former governor, whose term in public office began when he was appointed to fill an Assembly vacancy five years ago.

A GOP win in the Senate race would be a costly upset as Democrats seek to gain seats in Congress. New Jersey has not elected a Republican senator since Clifford Case in 1972.

"This is a Democratic seat. It's very important to the Democrats that they hold it," said Joseph Marbach, the chairman of the political science department at Seton Hall University. "It will be interesting to see what issues comes up -- if Kean runs from the president; if Menendez runs from the governor."

Menendez clearly means to make the Bush administration an issue. He has emphasized his willingness to stand up to President Bush and has sought to portray Kean as a toe-the-line Republican on issues such as stem cell research and the war in Iraq.

In his acceptance speech last night, Menendez referred to Kean by name nine times. The only name he invoked more often -- and not by coincidence -- was the president's.

"This campaign will be about who will side with New Jerseyans against the Bush status quo," Menendez said. "Tom Kean Jr.'s record shows he cannot be trusted to make the right choices. On issue after issue, the facts are clear: Tom Kean Jr. and George Bush are perfect together -- perfectly wrong."

Menendez was joined on the stage by his children Alicia and Rob, both college students, and by Democratic state chairman Joseph Cryan and Assembly Majority Leader Bonnie Watson Coleman.

Menendez also stood with Gov. Jon Corzine, who introduced him to the cheering crowd of about 200 people. Five months ago, Corzine appointed Menendez to finish out his term in the Senate. "Governor, thank you so much for your commitment," Menendez said.

DOJ_NMG_0032702

Kean will make their connection a central theme of his campaign, painting Menendez as a longtime political boss now beholden to Corzine and Democrats in Trenton who are trying to foist tax increases and higher spending on already overburdened New Jerseyans.

In his remarks last night, Kean rebuffed Menendez's effort to link him to the president: "I've got news for Bob Menendez. He's not running against George Bush, he's running against Tom Kean."

He also mentioned Menendez by name nine times, harping on Menendez's 30 years of political affiliation with Hudson County.

"Fourteen years ago, Bob Menendez brought his party-boss tactics to Washington. ... Today he is working to expand that machine across New Jersey," Kean said. "The people of New Jersey can no longer afford party bosses who put politics first and people second."

Kean was introduced to a crowd of about 150 partisans chanting, "Go, Tom, go," by his brother, Reed, who said his sibling is "tough as nails" and the ideal candidate to "reform a broken system."

The level of intensity in both camps is remarkable for this early in the election cycle and is likely to be ratcheted up as Menendez and Kean prepare for unusually early televised debates, scheduled for June 25 and June 26.

Said Marbach, "It's going to get ugly fairly soon."

Menendez, Kean Clear Party Rivals To Face Off (PHI)

By Cynthia Burton

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

The field is set: The youthful scion of a family with a history of public service and a self-made man who pulled himself up from a Union City tenement to the rarefied air of the U.S. Senate will struggle bitterly against each other until Nov. 7.

In a light turnout yesterday in the U.S. Senate primary, New Jersey voters rubber-stamped the party bosses' choices of Thomas H. Kean Jr. as the Republican nominee and U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez as the Democratic nominee.

Menendez, a former U.S. representative from Hudson County, defeated an opponent, John D. Kelly Jr., who did not campaign. Kean, a Union County state senator, fought off a challenge from John Ginty, a conservative Republican.

Of the 33 U.S. Senate seats up for election in November, Republicans will defend 15 and Democrats 18, counting the seat of Vermont's Jim Jeffords, an Independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

New Jersey has one of five open seats. Menendez, appointed by Gov. Corzine in January to finish Corzine's term, is running for a full term.

Neither Menendez, 52, of Hoboken, nor Kean, 37, of Westfield, has been tested in a statewide race. At the moment, Menendez is better financed, with $7.3 million to Kean's $2.6 million. However, Kean's campaign has been gaining ground, convincing party leaders that it can pick up this seat, which could open the financial floodgates.

Reflecting their close standings in opinion polls, both primary winners came out last night with vitriolic attacks against the other, each positing himself as the only one who can rescue New Jersey from his opponent.

Drawing on a fundamental theme of his campaign against Menendez, Kean told a crowd in a Mountainside catering hall: "Do you want a Hudson County boss or a proven reformer?"

He accused Menendez of being more interested in using power to benefit himself than the citizens.

"Is there anyone who thinks Bob Menendez is fighting for us?" Kean asked. "Bob Menendez lives off the public and not for it. Ladies and gentlemen, enough is enough."

Kean promised to "bring a true moral compass to office" and attacked Menendez for voting against tax cuts.

Taking a page from Corzine's playbook in the 2005 governor's race, Menendez painted Kean as a puppet of the Bush administration in a state where the president has low approval ratings.

At the East Brunswick Hilton, Menendez told the crowd at his victory party: "Tom Kean Jr. may try to portray himself as a different kind of Republican, but when it comes time to choose sides, he always makes the same wrong choices... . Tom Kean Jr. will choose to side with George Bush, and New Jersey needs a senator who will stand up to President Bush - and I will be that senator."

He said Kean had voted against raising the state's minimum wage while supporting cuts in federal taxes for millionaires and oil companies, supported embryonic stem-cell research but voted against state financing of a research center, and supported the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq.

Kean, though, unwilling to cede any turf to Menendez, stated his case for the fall election. He said the country needed to bulk up homeland security, protect its borders, and cut government spending.

Both men also did a little legacy "borrowing" yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0032703

Menendez introduced a bill in the Senate that would award homeland-security money based on terrorism risks. He touted it as a continuation of the work of former Gov. Thomas Kean - the father of his Republican opponent and, most recently, head of the 911 Commission.

Kean Jr. quoted Robert F. Kennedy in the second paragraph of his acceptance speech, using the words of a beloved Democrat to set up a standard for judging Menendez: "The problem of power is... how to get men of power to live for the public rather than off the public."

In his first public statement on the race, Kean Sr. - who watched his son from the front row, and not on the stage - said in an interview: "We need people who are new who have new ideas. This, I think, is the most unified the party's been since I left office."

Menendez also sought to inoculate himself from Kean's attacks.

"The Bush administration and its allies here in New Jersey have their backs to the wall, and they are sure to resort to the same playbook they always use against anyone with the courage to question them," he said.

Seeking to blunt Menendez's populist appeal, Kean said that while voters are paying more to live, "Menendez is running up $80,000 in meal tabs at fancy steak houses - while wining and dining the special interests that fuel his political machine."

Joe Cryan, an assemblyman and the Democratic State Committee chairman, said Kean's attacks could backfire. "People expect a better campaign from a Kean," he said in an interview.

Tom Wilson, chairman of the Republican State Committee, said: "The Menendez strategy is make this race about anybody but Bob Menendez."

Also yesterday, Menendez's former House seat went to Albio Sires, mayor of West New York and a former Assembly speaker. Sires fought off a fierce battle from Joseph Vas, an assemblyman and mayor of Perth Amboy. Sires also won the Democratic primary for a shot at a full term. John Guarini is the Republican nominee.

Viola Thomas-Hughes beat Henry David Marcus in the Democratic primary to face Republican U.S. Rep. Frank LoBiondo to represent the district that covers the southernmost end of the state and the Shore.

The U.S. Senate candidates are scheduled to have their first televised debates at the end of this month.

They've Been Nicked By Scandal, But No Signs Of Bleeding Yet (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Last week, Out There looked at the Members of Congress and governors who are grappling with the most serious ethical allegations this election season. This week, we take up the next tier.

The "risk factor" below is designed to gauge how vulnerable the politician's career is right now, or, if the politician is retiring, how difficult the seat will be for his or her party to hold.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.)

Not much new has developed on the ties between Burns and Abramoff. Earlier this year, Burns acknowledged that language favorable to an Abramoff client, the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan, was included in a spending bill he was responsible for, though Burns said the language was added without his knowledge.

Risk factor: medium. Burns caught a big break when it was revealed that state Auditor John Morrison, the frontrunner in the Democratic primary, had an extramarital affair that became tangled up in a case his office was involved in. Whether Morrison or state Senate President Jon Tester won Tuesday's Democratic primary (results were too late for Roll Call's deadline) the news about Morrison's past helped take the ethical spotlight off Burns for several weeks. Despite recent Democratic gains in the state, Burns' good-ol'-boy persona has carried him through tough races in the past, and it could again this time.

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D)

For a good-government state, Wisconsin is beset by a number of medium-sized ethical troubles this year. A legislative corruption scandal has produced guilty pleas by former leaders from both parties. Doyle's administration is undergoing state and federal probes over linkages between campaign donations and state travel contracts. And Doyle's use of state planes to attend events with a significant political component has been scrutinized by newspapers in the state; unfortunately for Doyle, it was an issue he rode to victory in 2002 against then-Gov. Scott McCallum (R).

Risk factor: medium. Doyle himself is embattled, but not as much for the ethical questions as for his record as governor and the strong challenge he faces from Rep. Mark Green (R). On the ethics front, he's helped by the fact that the legislative scandals were fully bipartisan and that he hasn't been directly implicated in them.

Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D)

Blagojevich, a one-time Congressman, won office four years ago by promising a change from the corruption scandals that surrounded outgoing Gov. George Ryan (R). Earlier this year, Ryan was convicted on federal corruption charges, but Blagojevich and members of his administration have themselves been blanketed by federal, state and local subpoenas (a few of them covering the period when Ryan was governor) on such matters as questionable state hiring practices and allegations of "pay to play." The governor has denied any wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0032704

Risk factor: medium. Recently, the key investigations have been relatively quiet and as a result, the ethics issue "has faded some in the public mind," said one observer in Springfield. This helped Blagojevich dispatch former Chicago Alderman Edwin Eisendrath in the Democratic primary, and his lavish spending on ads has given his candidacy a boost at a time when his Republican opponent, moderate state Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka, cannot keep pace. Blagojevich still faces a tough race, but at least for now, ethical problems seem less likely to doom his candidacy than they once did.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.)

Menendez comes from Hudson County, a jurisdiction known for its old-fashioned machine politics. Attention has focused on former Menendez aide Kay LiCausi, who started a lucrative consulting firm called K.L. Strategies Inc. The firm's clients included a number of Menendez supporters. But no investigations or ethics complaints are known to have been filed against Menendez.

Risk factor: medium-low. While Menendez's vulnerability has risen since he was appointed to the Senate, that has mainly stemmed from a frustration with newly elected Gov. Jon Corzine (D) and the attractiveness of his GOP opponent, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.

Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed (R)

Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition, is battling fallout from the Abramoff scandals. According to news reports, Reed acknowledges receiving more than $4 million for cooperating with Abramoff on anti-casino campaigns in Texas, Louisiana and Alabama. But Reed has said he was unaware that those funds were secretly paid by tribes trying to protect their existing gaming businesses from competition by rival tribes.

Risk factor: medium-low. This is one of the few races on the list that has barely changed since December. Though the questions surrounding Reed have enabled state Sen. Casey Cagle (R) to make an unexpectedly strong primary bid, Reed has "avoided indictments, so he has a good chance of winning, because much of the GOP base in Georgia looks at him as a hero," said one Georgia political observer.

This month, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, arguably the most liberal Republican in the 2008 presidential mix, headlined a fundraiser for Reed. But Reed may have to worry about President Bush's decline in popularity, said another political observer in the state, "because identification with Bush was Reed's strong suit with suburban voters."

Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.)

Taylor has faced a number of ethical questions in the past, most notably during investigations into Blue Ridge Savings Bank, which he founded in 1978. Hayes Martin, the bank's former president, was convicted in 2001 and alleged that Taylor was involved in bank fraud and money laundering. But Taylor vigorously denied those allegations, and he was never questioned, much less charged, in the case.

Risk factor: medium-low. Taylor, buoyed by personal wealth and a 57 percent Bush district, has consistently won re-election against plausible challengers. Democrats recruited former University of Tennessee star and NFL quarterback Heath Shuler, who, according to Democratic polls, has gained ground as local support for Bush has eroded. Still, Shuler, a political novice, faces an Appropriations member who has delivered big-time to his district — no easy task.

Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.)

Aside from an Abramoff-related subpoena to Doolittle's wife, Julie, the questions surrounding Doolittle — who serves on the House Appropriations Committee and as GOP Conference secretary — have remained within the media sphere.

Doolittle wrote letters that advocated positions helpful to clients of Abramoff, who was a major donor. Doolittle also steered federal money toward a company owned by another donor, defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who is being investigated in connection to the bribery case of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). Doolittle's political action committee and re-election campaign committee reportedly paid for baby-sitting services. And Julie Doolittle's home-based fundraising firm, Sierra Dominion Financial Services, has raised eyebrows for receiving close to $200,000 in payments for raising money for Doolittle-linked entities. The practice is legal, but the sums are unusually large. Doolittle has denied any suggestion of wrongdoing.

Risk factor: low. There is little indication so far that Doolittle is a major target of prosecutors in the Abramoff case. Moreover, Doolittle's electoral position seems solid, and his aggressiveness as a fundraiser means he'll have a large war chest. Retired Air Force Lt. Col. Charles Brown was expected to prevail in Tuesday's primary, but winning in November will take an enormous Democratic wave.

Others With Low Risk Factors:

DOJ_NMG_0032705

· Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.), who allegedly assaulted a Capitol Police officer in the Longworth House Office Building after she was not recognized at a security checkpoint. She later apologized. Despite the current national controversy, she's still favored over two primary challengers due to her loyal base in the solidly Democratic district.

· Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), the powerful House Appropriations chairman who has become the latest Member to be linked in media reports to the bribery case involving Cunningham. The Justice Department is looking into the relationship between federal contracts overseen by Lewis and former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), a lobbyist whose clients benefited from federal largesse. Subpoenas have been issued to several clients, but Lewis has denied any wrongdoing. For this year, Lewis is free of serious electoral opposition.

· Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.). Several ex-aides claim that Conyers forced them to perform campaign work on government time, to baby-sit his children and to tutor his wife for law school. Conyers has denied any wrongdoing. The ethics committee has so far shown no interest in probing the case, and he faces only nominal opposition in November.

Technology Sharpens The Incumbents' Edge (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In Ohio's 1st Congressional District, Republican incumbent Steve Chabot is running up against his toughest reelection challenge in years. But his Democratic opponent is running up against Chabot's computer.

In one of the lesser-known perks of power on Capitol Hill, lawmakers are using taxpayer-funded databases to cultivate constituents more attentively than ever. Chabot -- a six-term legislator from Cincinnati who finds himself imperiled this year after years of easy races -- has a list of e-mail addresses of people who are most interested in tax cuts. His office recently hit the send button on a personal message to alert them to the congressman's support for extending tax breaks on dividends and capital gains.

Chabot's computer is one factor to keep in mind when assessing the odds that Republicans will get evicted this November from their 12-year majority in the House. Anti-incumbent sentiment, as measured by polls and voter interviews, is stronger than it has been in years. But so, too, are certain structural advantages that overwhelmingly favor incumbents.

Some are well known, such as the superior ability of incumbents to raise campaign funds and the fact that most lawmakers come from districts that have been carefully drawn to favor one party. Other benefits -- including the ways that lawmakers are using the latest "micro-targeting" techniques in their official communications -- are more obscure, virtually unheralded beyond the people who use them.

"A major reason fewer incumbents lose is we have perfected the use of information technology," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.). "As incumbents, we have unlimited access to the most up-to-date technology in the world" free of charge, he said.

One way to think of this midterm election year, analysts say, is a collision between a wave and a wall.

The wave overwhelmingly favors Democrats: an unpopular war in Iraq, job approval ratings for President Bush at record lows, corruption scandals that have engulfed GOP congressional leaders, and polls showing voters favoring Democrats and their positions on the issues by distinct margins.

But Republicans still benefit from the wall: a long-term trend that for years has led to steadily fewer competitive districts.

Democrats are growing increasingly confident that this year the wave will be higher than the wall, but they acknowledge that the challenge of picking up the 15 seats they need to take control is daunting. Analysts have been watching yesterday's special election in California to replace resigned and convicted representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) for an early indicator of the year's trend. The San Diego area district is traditionally Republican, but recent polls have shown Democrats well positioned for an upset. No result was expected until early today Washington time.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), head of the House Democrats' reelection efforts, said that the party faces a "rigged system" and that only a pitched level of public discontent gives them a "fighting chance" to overcome it.

In a memo delivered to House Democrats last week, Emanuel told lawmakers that redistricting could impede their takeover hopes, noting that respected political handicapper Charlie Cook estimates there are 35 truly competitive races -- compared with 100 in 1994.

One way to look at how incumbents have grown entrenched is to compare this election year with 1994 -- the year Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and his "Republican Revolutionaries" roared to victory by picking up 54 House seats. Although Democrats had held the majority for four decades, there was ample evidence long before Election Day of how vulnerable many of them were.

Democrats that year defended 61 seats in which the lawmaker had won no more than 55 percent of the vote in the previous election, a threshold many strategists and political scientists use to identify at-risk incumbents. Democrats lost 29 of the 61 seats.

DOJ_NMG_0032706

This year, Republicans are defending only 19 seats in which their House member won 55 percent or less in the previous election.

In 2004, only five of the 404 incumbents seeking reelection lost -- a reelection rate of 99 percent.

In California, all 101 incumbents who ran for reelection in 2002 and 2004 won, and all but two clobbered their opponents by 20 percentage points or more. The story is the same in most states.

At the same time, the polarized electorate tends to reduce fluidity on Capitol Hill, an advantage for the party that benefits from the status quo. Thanks to packed districts and a decline in split-ticket voting, there are fewer districts that vote for a president of one party but elect a member of Congress from the opposite party. Bush carried 255 House districts in the past presidential election, compared with Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's 180. "There has been a big increase in party-line voting at all levels," said Gary C. Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California at San Diego who studies political trends.

In many state legislatures, which draw congressional districts, politicians have joined in an unspoken bipartisan alliance to protect incumbents. Often this has been accomplished by packing Democratic-trending voters -- especially African Americans -- into a few urban districts, rather than spreading them in ways that would make more districts truly competitive. Some Democrats, including Rep. Brad Sherman (Calif.), lament the trend. Sherman said he fears that "a majority of those casting votes will vote Democratic in November" but that votes will be distributed in a way that does not necessarily produce a majority of House seats.

Chabot is an illustration of the way lawmakers settle into their seats. He won by campaigning against then-President Bill Clinton's tax increases in 1994, taking 56 percent of the vote. He had tight races in 1996 and 1998. But after the 2000 census, Ohio's Republican governor and the GOP-led state legislature made life easier for him. His new district was shaped to include more Republican neighborhoods. In an interview, Chabot said he estimates the new lines added about five percentage points to his November returns.

Democrat John Cranley, a Cincinnati City Council member, is bidding to change that. He and other Democrats have been hitting Chabot for supporting the Iraq war and an overhaul of Social Security.

The national winds are gusting in Cranley's direction. A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 56 percent of voters said they want Democrats to control the House, and a majority said they preferred Democrats to handle every domestic and foreign issue they were asked about. But these broad trends in public opinion will not mean much, strategists say, unless Democrats succeed in translating them into an expanded number of truly competitive races.

Chabot said he is not concerned about the toxic political environment because "I know my district very well."

Like all incumbents, he has some important tools in knowing his district, ones not easily replicated by challengers trying to reach the roughly 600,000 people who live in a typical congressional district.

One of these tools is the congressional account each lawmaker can use to communicate with constituents. In the past, this money went mainly for sending newsletters or other mailings to voters, who often turned around and tossed them in the trash. But technology has allowed lawmakers to track the interests of individual voters, file the information into a database and then use e-mails or phone calls to engage directly with voters on issues they know they care about. In essence, this is the traditional "franking" privilege updated -- and made far more powerful -- for the digital age.

There are some restrictions, such as requirements that official office communications are not overly political. But there is a fine line between politics and constituent service, legislators acknowledge.

The practice is so commonplace that a cottage industry of consultants has emerged to assist House members in their micro-targeting strategies. Aris McMahon of Constituent Services Inc. advises several lawmakers on the latest techniques, including increasingly popular "virtual town halls" or "tele-town halls."

Using taxpayers' money, legislators employ a new technology that allows them to call thousands of households simultaneously with a recorded message, asking people in their districts to join in on a conference call with their representative. With the push of a button, the constituent is on the line with the House member -- and often 1,000 or more fellow constituents. More important, the lawmaker knows from the phone numbers where the respondents live and, from what they say on the call, what issues interest them.

At a retreat in St. Michaels, Md., in January, Rep. Daniel E. Lungren (R-Calif.) briefed Republicans on how to host these tele-town halls using their office budget, participants said. Information gathered from the events, as well as e-mails and phone calls from constituents, gets plugged into a database, giving the incumbent something a challenger could only dream of: a detailed list of the specific interests of thousands of would-be voters. E-mail then allows for personal interaction -- and a free reminder of why the incumbent should be reelected.

Senate Contender In Florida Presses On (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032707

VENICE, Fla. — Undaunted by a run of horrific poll numbers, staff turmoil and public doubts from leaders of her party, Representative Katherine Harris is thinking confidently beyond November.

Once Ms. Harris wins her race for a Senate seat, she says, she plans to travel everywhere with a guide dog.

"Before I hire anyone to work for me in the Senate, I tell them I'm going to do this," said Ms. Harris, the former Florida secretary of state best — or worst — remembered for her role in the state's election recount of 2000.

Ms. Harris explains that she intends to participate in a program that provides guide dogs for volunteers to train. While cynics may assign unflattering symbolism to a politician who is not blind being led around the Capitol by a guide dog, Ms. Harris is undeterred — by this or by the perception that her role in 2000 makes her too divisive to lure the swing voters necessary to defeat the incumbent Democrat, Bill Nelson.

In her insistence on running, Ms. Harris has become something of a pariah among many of the people whose power she indirectly helped ensure five and a half years ago, as overseer of the recount that sealed George W. Bush's victory.

Top White House officials, Republican operatives and Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida have urged her not to run. When Ms. Harris ignored those entreaties, a Who's Who of national Republicans begged a Who's Who of Florida Republicans to oppose her in the primary, to no avail.

Her campaign has been marked by aides leaving en masse, disclosures of her ties to a contractor caught up in a lobbying scandal and the fund-raising handicaps inherent to any enterprise perceived as a lost cause or, worse, a joke.

Ed Rollins, one of Ms. Harris's many former campaign consultants, claimed she had told him that God wanted her to stay in the race. (Ms. Harris denies making the statement.)

She promised to finance her campaign with $10 million of her own money. Popular wisdom says that will not matter. Mr. Nelson led Ms. Harris by more than 30 points in recent polls.

"She has absolutely no chance of winning," said former Representative Joe Scarborough, a Pensacola Republican who was courted strongly by the National Republican Senatorial Committee to oppose Ms. Harris but declined. Mr. Scarborough, the host of "Scarborough Country" on MSNBC, said Ms. Harris "seems to be detached from reality these days."

Because of her role in the 2000 recount, Ms. Harris still enjoys devotion from many Florida Republicans, enough to make her the likely winner over three little-known opponents for her party's nomination. Her supporters applaud avidly at Republican events and cannot understand her sudden unpopularity among party leaders.

"She acted exactly the way the Republicans wanted her to act," said Stanley Tate, a Miami businessman who serves as her campaign's finance chairman. Mr. Tate said he was "completely confused" by the party establishment's snubbing of Ms. Harris. He tells of a recent Republican dinner in Miami where Ms. Harris received a standing ovation from the crowd yet was not acknowledged in a speech by Governor Bush.

On Memorial Day, Ms. Harris rode in a parade and visited two Veterans of Foreign Wars halls and one American Legion post, and was not audibly jeered or heckled by anyone, a fact that surprises even her, "based on the press I get."

Between stops, Ms. Harris portrays herself as something of a populist under siege from "Washington Republicans" and a liberal news media. "I don't have the Beltway mentality," she said. "And I never go along to get along. So I think it's a little threatening to those in power."

She said that given the difficult environment for incumbent Republicans in November, it could be an asset to be perceived as a nonfavorite of the party establishment.

"O.K., so President Bush does not support her," said Representative John L. Mica, a Florida Republican who is close to Ms. Harris. "President Bush is at 30 percent." Mr. Mica added that Ms. Harris was previously criticized for being "a tool of the Bushes," which should not be a problem anymore.

Even so, the role of anti-establishment figure is unusual for Ms. Harris, the product of a well-to-do Central Florida family and a granddaughter of a cattle and citrus baron. She became a well-known socialite in the Sarasota area and has long been active in the state's Republican Party. She is married to a Swedish businessman, Anders Ebbeson, and they have listed assets of as much as $37 million.

In Congress, Ms. Harris has been a reliable ally of the Bush administration on issues like tax cuts, Iraq and opposition to same-sex marriage. She has done little in her three-and-a-half-year tenure to win notice beyond her district — one exception being a speech in which she spoke of a foiled terrorist plot against the city of Carmel, Ind. (Federal officials said the plot never existed; Ms. Harris later said she had heard of it secondhand.)

The belief among top Republicans was that Ms. Harris's presence in 2006 would galvanize Democrats still eager for revenge after 2000.

"The campaign can't be about her," Governor Bush told reporters last month. "I gave her that exact advice. Since then, it's gotten worse."

DOJ_NMG_0032708

Like most politicians who are behind in polls, Ms. Harris says she does not pay attention to them. But she cited her own "internal polls," which she said showed that she could get 53 percent of the vote "if my base turns out."

She says she has moved on from a string of fiascoes early this year, including the disclosure that a military contractor who has pleaded guilty to bribery in the corruption case involving former Representative Randy Cunningham has also admitted to making $32,000 in illegal donations to Ms. Harris's campaign. She has said she had no idea the contributions were illegal; she donated the money to charity.

She has also seen a drain of top aides, campaign managers and consultants, many complaining on the way out the door about her management style and unwillingness to follow their advice (including not to run).

Ms. Harris says voters are indifferent to stories about staff turnover. What matters, she said, is "my total commitment to Floridians" and "getting the word out about how liberal Bill Nelson is."

In interviews, Ms. Harris projects a somewhat frenetic personality, speaking in rapid-fire cadences, fussing incessantly with her hair and barraging aides with questions and road directions ("We have a detour to Starbucks on the way. ... Quickest way to Venice is down Fruitville"). Sometimes she will burst forth midsentence upon noticing something out the window ("Hey, there's one of my bumper stickers!").

She attributes much of how she is viewed to the "silliness" of the media. This dates from 2000, when Ms. Harris's perceived overapplication of makeup became a recurring punch line.

"They had trucks in Florida bringing the ballots to Tallahassee," Jay Leno said on "The Tonight Show." "In fact, it's the same trucks they used to bring the makeup to Florida Secretary of State Katherine Harris."

Ms. Harris is adamant in her claim that news organizations have doctored photographs to exaggerate the amount of makeup she wears. "I haven't worn blue makeup since seventh grade," she said, referring to photographs she said she had seen of herself on the Internet.

She is especially animated when the topic turns to animals, including the guide dog she plans to train starting in November. She will care for the dog for 18 months, spending nearly all her waking hours with it. "You can't let them sleep in bed with you," Ms. Harris said. "Which is going to be harder on me than the dog."

When a supporter in a Venice veterans hall said he once witnessed Ms. Harris leave her vehicle to escort a turtle across a highway, she became gravely serious.

"All of my life I have stopped for turtles," she said firmly, even defensively, as if someone had challenged her commitment to turtle safety.

As Ms. Harris hugged and hand-shaked her way toward the hall exit, the song "Y.M.C.A." came on. The mostly empty dance floor filled with aging veterans and their wives, one of whom spotted Ms. Harris and summoned her.

She obliged. And then commenced another unforgettable moment, Katherine Harris, arms over her head, dancing to "Y.M.C.A."

His Support Waning, Weld Quits New York Governor's Race (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

William F. Weld, the former governor of Massachusetts who undertook a rare bid to lead another state, dropped out of the race for governor of New York yesterday. He had been deserted by Republicans who once supported him as their best hope against Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in the November election.

Mr. Weld, a moderate Republican in the mold of Gov. George E. Pataki, ran a lackluster campaign and was never able to convert his early advantages into real campaign muscle. At the same time, Mr. Pataki's behind-the-scenes effort to help Mr. Weld last month proved too late and too thin to do any good.

Mr. Weld's departure sets the stage for an ideological clash between the presumptive Republican candidate, former Assemblyman John Faso — a conservative intent on cutting taxes — and the likely Democratic nominee, Mr. Spitzer, who is backed by a unified Democratic establishment that is determined to regain the governor's mansion after 12 years.

Mr. Weld dropped out after lengthy debates with his staff on Monday. The central issue was whether he could rebound from recent setbacks and raise enough money to win the Sept. 12 primary, running as a moderate outsider against the party's choice, Mr. Faso, and then go on to beat Mr. Spitzer in November. His decision to withdraw reflected a stunning political defeat for a man considered presidential material by some just a decade ago. [Page B4.]

Several Republican moderates urged Mr. Weld to stay in on Monday; one senior Pataki aide even e-mailed Mr. Weld a quote from the Roman emperor Marcus Aurelius, in Latin, that urges digging in and fighting.

Mr. Weld mulled setting up a new political party, devoted to tax relief, to amplify his call for income tax cuts. And he was even prepared to spend up to $5 million of his own money on the race, according to several of his advisers. Yet his loss of the Independence Party endorsement on Saturday to Mr. Spitzer, the desertion of key supporters in recent days and the realization of looming costs convinced Mr. Weld that he would end up losing to Mr. Faso — who corralled the party's support at the Republican convention last week — or to Mr. Spitzer.

DOJ_NMG_0032709

"If John and I had been head-to-head between now and Sept. 12, I guarantee you one thing: We would have had a very tired, very broke Republican candidate on Sept. 13, no matter who it was," Mr. Weld said at a news conference yesterday.

Republican concern about contested primaries is so great that the state party chairman, Stephen J. Minarik III, is expected to ask one of two Republicans running for the United States Senate, Kathleen Troia McFarland, to drop out today. Her advisers said last night she planned to say no.

Among the assets Mr. Weld, 60, had coming into the race were tacit support from Mr. Pataki and from a closer, older friend, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Mr. Weld had expected their endorsements, the advisers said, but neither was forthcoming. Some Weld advisers accused Mr. Pataki and Mr. Giuliani of caring more about protecting their own presidential ambitions in 2008 than risking their political capital on Mr. Weld, even though he shared their fiscally conservative, socially moderate views.

"I think Pataki and Rudy are constrained — they have a little touch of Potomac fever and they couldn't do anything too overt to help Weld if it could backfire on them," said Arnold L. Burns, a fund-raiser and old friend of Mr. Weld's, who is also chairman of the QuanStar Group.

Four advisers who granted anonymity said that Mr. Weld felt more betrayed by the governor than by the former mayor because he was led to believe that a Pataki endorsement was in the offing this spring.

In mid-May, Mr. Pataki held a dinner at the governor's mansion in Albany with his senior political advisers. According to participants at the dinner, Mr. Pataki said that in order to endorse Mr. Weld, he would have to see more hustle and political momentum from the candidate, such as new endorsements from Republican county leaders. In an effort to show the aggressiveness that Mr. Pataki sought, some members of the dinner group worked with Weld aides later that week to attack some Faso votes in the Assembly as "extremist."

At that time, Republicans close to Mr. Pataki told a reporter that an endorsement was imminent. Yesterday, however, they said that Mr. Pataki never followed up on the mid-May dinner by leading the charge, and that he decided against endorsing Mr. Weld when he realized it would not guarantee a major Weld victory at the convention.

Pataki advisers said Mr. Weld was hobbled most of all by his own problems. He never regained the artful political touch he showed in Massachusetts, and was unable to shake Republican concerns about his leadership of a Kentucky trade school, Decker College. The school is now under federal and state investigation into financial aid fraud.

Mr. Pataki, speaking to reporters yesterday, insisted that his endorsement had not been a crucial issue in the contest. "It was a question of — I said from the beginning — of candidates making the case and going out there and doing the hard work to win," Mr. Pataki said. "The fire in the belly counts for a lot, and John Faso had it."

As for Mr. Giuliani, his spokeswoman issued a statement praising the Republican unity around Mr. Faso; it did not mention Mr. Weld.

The major challenge facing Republicans now is Mr. Faso's money: He had $933,000 on hand in January, the last time fund-raising records were made public, while Mr. Spitzer had $19 million. Mr. Faso focused heavily on courting convention delegates this spring, and the four Weld advisers say they believe Mr. Faso is grappling with raising cash, based on the chatter in the insular world of New York Republican fund-raising.

At a joint news conference yesterday, Mr. Weld and Mr. Faso made a point of emphasizing that Mr. Weld would help his former rival raise money. Still, Cathy Blaney, a Pataki fund-raiser who worked for Mr. Weld, said last night that it was hard to predict if Mr. Faso would raise enough money to have a chance to defeat Mr. Spitzer. "Bill Weld was able to play on a bigger stage, and we raised money that isn't usually available in New York," she said. "What the future holds money-wise for John Faso, I don't know."

Yesterday, at a news conference in Mr. Weld's Manhattan campaign office, Mr. Weld and Mr. Faso complimented each other, professed a lack of ill will, and clasped and raised their hands in a victory pose at one point. Both men said that, with enough in campaign money, Mr. Faso could turn 2006 into a pocketbook race against Mr. Spitzer, who leads the Republican candidate by at least 50 points in public opinion polls.

"The fact of the matter is, New York cannot take a governorship of Eliot Spitzer, who will raise taxes," Mr. Faso said. "Spitzer has already promised billions in new spending and billions in new borrowing that simply cannot be paid for unless taxes are raised."

In assessing Mr. Weld's campaign, his advisers said that, while he may be an uneven campaigner, he was also the victim of Republicans and conservatives who had been shut out of power by the Pataki camp.

DOJ_NMG_0032710

"Our state Republican Party is increasingly under control of the right wing, exclusionary elements of the party, and Bill is really increasingly at odds with those people on social issues," said Mr. Burns, the Weld ally.

Frist Cementing Bush Alliance (RC)

By John Stanton And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Less than six months before leaving the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has thrown his legacy chips in with President Bush, inextricably aligning himself with the White House on key domestic and international issues, even as many in his own party distance themselves from the unpopular president.

Although his Senate position makes him one of the GOP's four most prominent national leaders, Frist will face significant challenges in winning the 2008 presidential nomination — from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as well as from such Senators as George Allen (R-Va.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) who are darlings of the conservative movement.

Given the already crowded field of potential GOP White House aspirants, Frist's decision to firmly tie his political fate to Bush's could result in a boon to his presidential hopes, despite Bush's current weakened state.

Frist could benefit if Bush rewards his loyalty by handing off his substantial political and fundraising operations to Frist. In addition, having the backing of Bush — who remains personally popular with much of the GOP's base despite their concerns about how he has handled his job — could be Frist's ticket to undercutting McCain's early frontrunner status and the natural support among conservatives for Allen and Brownback.

GOP sources say that Frist's allegiance to the president is no surprise, given that he arguably owes his rise to Majority Leader to Bush and his operation. Bush was among those who helped propel Frist into the top job in early 2003 after then-Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) stepped down in the wake of racially toned remarks he made about the late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

One Republican Senator, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said that Frist understands Bush is largely responsible for his political fortunes in the Senate. Even with Bush's popularity now at record lows, the lawmaker said that Frist cannot turn his back now on a key ally.

"It's part loyalty, and it's partly because he's so closely hitched himself to this star," the Senator said.

Some Republican insiders suggest that Frist may be banking on Bush to give him the needed support in a prospective 2008 presidential bid. Bush not only has a tested political team but also a fundraising machine unmatched in GOP circles. A source close to Frist acknowledged that should the Majority Leader end up making a run for the White House, his decision to align himself with Bush could put him in the potentially enviable position of inheriting Bush's massive political and money network.

Frist must show that he can manage the Senate at a highly partisan time and when other Senators in his conference are also eyeing White House bids. Although as Majority Leader, Frist has spearheaded a number of significant victories — including the passage of bankruptcy reform, class-action reform, an energy bill, a transportation bill, extensions of several Bush tax cuts and Senate approval of sweeping immigration legislation — Democrats, and critics within his own party, have painted Frist as ineffective, and, to an extent, the label has stuck.

Part of that appearance problem stems from Frist's style, say those close to the lawmaker, arguing that his clinical approach to politics has often left him ineffective at trumpeting his own successes.

Additionally, unlike hot-button issues like gay marriage and judicial reform that appeal to the GOP's core voters, most of Frist's victories have been too dry or technical in nature to be easily translated into sound bites or to engage base voters' passions.

In an effort to reverse this public perception, Frist has tried to be more aggressive this year both in touting his own agenda and defending the White House from Democratic attacks. Likewise, the White House has been much more cooperative with Frist than it has in the past, Senate aides said.

On issue after issue this year, Frist and Bush have teamed up, including on a spate of judicial and executive nominations, immigration reforms and on how much should be spent in the emergency supplemental spending bill to pay for Hurricane Katrina recovery and the war in Iraq. On the latter, Frist even asked for — and Bush agreed to — a veto pledge if the bill came in too bloated.

A Frist aide points to the recent immigration debate in the Senate as an example of this cooperation.

Unlike last year's disastrous Social Security debate — in which Bush essentially dumped the issue on the laps of Congressional Republicans and did little to help move the political ball forward — the White House agreed to play a supporting role and allow Frist to lead on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0032711

White House officials and Frist's office coordinated the timing and substance of statements by the president on the issue, so that Bush's positions could complement Frist's efforts to nudge conservatives in his party into line.

Similarly, despite the harm the gay marriage debate this week could inflict on endangered moderate Republicans such as Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), Frist wholeheartedly agreed to take up the amendment again this year.

A close link to Bush could also strengthen Frist's muscle among other Republicans in charting the party's agenda, as well helping advance his own personal platform, once he leaves the Senate.

But there are equally obvious dangers inherent in the strategy, because the entire gambit turns on Bush recovering much of the popular support he has lost in the past year and a half, Republicans acknowledge.

"It's a gamble," said one GOP political operative. "You are gambling that hopefully there will be a rebound of some sort — a steadying of the [president's] approval ratings and popularity going into '08."

Frist's strategy also has required him to be so loyal to the White House that he has increasingly served as one of Bush's few defenders on controversial issues.

For instance, Frist earlier this year quickly released statements praising a National Security Agency wiretapping program, even as Republicans and Democrats in both chambers were blasting the effort as an illegal invasion of privacy.

And Frist has thus far been the only major Republican to defend the Department of Justice's decision to raid the office of Rep. William Jefferson (R-La.) last month. That put Frist in direct conflict with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who, despite some backlash from members of his conference, has been vocal in criticizing the raid.

In fact, while Frist has often found himself at odds with House leaders this year, he has put up an all-but-united front with the White House. Perhaps the only notable divide between the two came earlier this year when Frist joined scores of other lawmakers in challenging the Bush administration's decision to authorize Dubai Ports World to manage several major U.S. ports.

Frist's decision to keep close to the president "may have an appeal to some people for staying loyal, but if not, you look like you are just more of the same," the operative warned.

Democrats have increasingly looked to tie Republicans in the House and Senate to Bush, constantly referring to them as "Bush Republicans" in statements and press releases and attempting to paint Bush and his political adviser, Karl Rove, as the masterminds of every move Congressional Republicans make.

It appears that Democrats are taking notice of the alignment between Bush and Frist, repeatedly questioning the Majority Leader's motives as he shepherds legislation through the Senate.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Tuesday that ballot-box hopes are certainly influencing the GOP Senate agenda, but he is unsure of the exact culprit.

"I don't know how much of it is dictated by Frist's '08 ambitions or by [White House adviser] Karl Rove's political strategy," Durbin said, adding that he also couldn't say whether the two were coordinating behind the scenes to set Congressional priorities.

"I don't know what's driving it," Durbin said.

By any measure, Frist must negotiate a difficult path. He is trying to show he is a capable leader despite his lame-duck status in the Senate and his possible presidential ambitions. He must also compete against at least four of his GOP colleagues who are similarly interested in residing at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.

"It's Frist's job to push the president's agenda forward," the GOP operative noted. "It's a very difficult position to be in."

Still, the Republican source said, Frist might lose by so closely aligning himself with Bush.

"It certainly seems, at least for the short term, that there's not a lot of political risk in distancing yourself, because even the base right now is uncomfortable with where the president is," the source said.

Faith-Based Initiative (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In 1995, Sam Brownback sacrificed part of his body and wound up closer to God. He discovered a melanoma and had to have two surgeries, during which a "big hunk of flesh" was taken out of his side.

"It was a great season in life," the Kansas senator says in his soft lullaby of a voice. "Season" is one of his favorite words. He sometimes sounds as though he's quoting the Bible even when he isn't.

"I can identify now better with people that have cancer, 'cause when you're told that, it's kind of like -- where else? What else is going on in this body?" Brownback says. He is sitting on a couch in an office in the Capitol and once or twice smiles a serene smile. "But that's mind focused on the flesh. That's death. Literally, you almost can worry yourself to death."

Instead of dying, the first-term Republican congressman had a revelation. In a speech once, he likened the melanoma to God pounding on his hardened heart, even bringing a hunk of concrete and an ax onstage to make the point. He says now it produced "a wonderful and radical transformation of focus." When he ran for the Senate the next year, his spiritual awakening gave him the determination to run an aggressive campaign and crush his opponents at the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0032712

Everything has its season, and now is the time when presidential aspirants sprout like stalks of tall Kansas wheat. Brownback thinks 2008 might be his moment, though in interviews he emphasizes his humility. He calls himself a "flawed man," and says the longer he pursues his faith, the more he finds his own sin. It seems contradictory -- all that ego and all that modesty.

"I could be the right person with the right message at the right moment. And I could be completely wrong and I'll still be happy about it," he says, sounding way too mellow for a wannabe president.

In the meantime, amid the fundraising and the visits to Iowa and New Hampshire, Brownback is focused on spreading light when he enters a room. He has said he tries to see Jesus in his fellow senators.

Three years ago he gave a speech at the Archdiocese of Denver. He spoke of the need to "convert the culture" by spreading God's love. He posed a question: "When we walk up to the McDonald's counter, what if we looked at that person in the eye . . . and we said, 'God bless you for that Big Mac?!' "

Then Brownback quoted Burt Bacharach.

"What the world needs now," the senator said, "is love, sweet love."A Religious Experience

Four years ago, Brownback -- who'd been a Protestant all his life -- had another spiritual transformation. He decided to become a Catholic.

"Just felt a real deep calling," he says.

He won't talk much about this aspect of his religious life. "It's kind of a divisive issue," he says, perhaps conscious of his many evangelical supporters. "People divide along churches instead of trying to look at how you pull together. Like, okay, this church is better than that church. You can find the Lord in a lot of places if you're willing to look for Him."

Brownback says he felt drawn to Catholicism for several years before he converted. (He had been raised a Methodist, and later belonged to a nondenominational evangelical church.) He describes the decision as an organic process, less a journey away from his faith and more a return to its roots. He doesn't call it a conversion.

"A conversion is if I became a Buddhist," he says. "Joining the Catholic Church was joining the early church. This is the mother church. This is the church out of which orthodoxy and Protestantism came."

He was sponsored by his friend in the Senate, Rick Santorum (R-Pa.). The ceremony was performed by the Rev. John McCloskey, a member of the controversial and strict Opus Dei sect who has helped convert a number of high-profile people, including columnist Robert Novak and former abortion provider Bernard Nathanson.

Sundays back in Topeka, the senator, who says he is not himself Opus Dei, attends two services. First he goes to Mass by himself, then to his old nondenominational church with his family, who did not convert. His wife, the former Mary Stauffer, comes from a wealthy family that used to own a media conglomerate. They have five children, the two youngest adopted after the Brownbacks applied in China and Guatemala simultaneously and both applications -- unexpectedly -- came through.

He invoked his adopted daughter recently during the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis, where potential '08 candidates gathered to speechify.

"Tomorrow, because a woman in China saw that abortion was killing a child, Jenna Joy Brownback, my daughter, will have an eighth birthday party," he told the crowd, prompting applause.

Brownback has a folksy, reassuring presence: He might be lamenting Roe v. Wade or he might be tucking you in and reading "The Berenstain Bears." He grew up on a farm and uses agricultural analogies and words like "skedaddle." He keeps a Mother Teresa quote about not judging people on the back door of his home in Topeka.

"So easy to judge people," he says. "I see you coming in the hallway and my mind just automatically goes, 'Okay, reporter, Washington Post, that's a primarily liberal publication, be careful.' Well, now I've automatically judged you. So I've spent my time judging you instead of thinking, 'Oh, here's a great person that I can interact with. I pray to love 'em.' "

Love, sweet love. Brownback examines his soul for hate and tries to excise any malignancies. Some years back, he says, he apologized to Hillary Clinton at a prayer breakfast for having despised her and her husband.

"I'm ashamed to say it but I did. And I felt -- justified in my hate," he says, his tone bitter, as if reliving an ancient betrayal. "I disagree politically but there is no call to hate. And it was wrong, it's a sin, and I went to her and I apologized."

He practices prayer when he finds himself in heated situations, as he did recently during a meeting on a constitutional amendment he supports, which would ban same-sex marriage. (Marriage, he says, is "a man and a woman bonded together for life and grandparents surrounding 'em.")

"Instead of getting angry at somebody for opposing you on something, you're just praying for them," he says. "You just pray blessings on them, blessings on their family."

DOJ_NMG_0032713

Because of his emphasis on compassion, Brownback does not fit the stereotype of the angry Christian conservative. This persona was embodied sensationally by "Pitchfork Pat" Buchanan and his talk of America's "religious war," by Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, who once imagined "rampant" lesbianism in his state's schools, by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, who said abortionists, feminists, gays and pagans helped cause the 9/11 terror attacks. (Falwell later took it back.)

Brownback has teamed up with some of the most liberal members of the Senate to help victims of sex trafficking, and suffering Sudanese. He quotes Bono on the struggles of the poor and encourages college students to take their spring breaks in Africa. He has worked for women's rights in Afghanistan and for North Korean refugees. When the issue of illegal immigration blew up in the Senate earlier this year, Brownback embraced President Bush's plan for comprehensive reform, infuriating some conservatives who see it as too lenient. He has pushed for an African American history museum on the Mall, saying he became committed after a "divine intervention" came to him during prayer.

"It's a consistent kind of a viewpoint that he has that's across the spectrum, and I think a lot of political leaders sort of pick and choose," says Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

"The wonderful thing about Sam is yes, he is ambitious, but it doesn't change anything," says David Barron, who coordinates a consortium of environmental groups called the International Conservation Partnership and has worked with Brownback on conservation issues. "He doesn't worry that someone's going to think he's a squishy liberal because he wants to feed people."

It would, in fact, be a grave error to characterize Brownback as squishy.

When he entered the House as part of the Republican sweep of 1994, Brownback argued for dismantling the departments of Commerce, Education, Energy, and Housing and Urban Development as part of an effort to downsize the federal government. Some years later he put forward the theory that part of the problem with the Social Security system was abortion, because too few children were growing up to become workers who could pay into the system.

During the 2004 Republican convention, Brownback told a closed-door rally, "We must win this culture war," according to the New York Times. "I say we fight."

"He has this kind of soft physical presence," says Burdett Loomis, a political scientist at the University of Kansas. "I think Sam Brownback is a very tough customer."

Brownback believes that research on embryonic stem cells is immoral. In a hearing in 2000, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) argued that research could save lives, and pointed out that the embryos in question were left over from fertility treatments and were going to be discarded anyway.

Brownback compared Specter's argument to the gruesome medical experiments performed on victims of the Holocaust.

"You had the Nazis in World War II saying, of these people, 'They are going to be killed,' " Brownback said. " 'Why do we not experiment on them and find out what happens with these experiments? They are going to die anyway.' "

"But they were living people," said Specter, whose parents were Jewish immigrants.

"These are living embryos," Brownback countered. He then hastened to reassure his opponents that he knew they meant well.

"I do not think our hearts are any different," he told one.A Humble Leader

During visits to Israel, Brownback used to study the Torah with Ariel Sharon, calling it "each of us feeding our souls." Lately he has been reading the Koran. He says Islam's holy book talks a lot about weighing people's good deeds against their bad deeds, and this has made him appreciate Christianity more.

"That's why I love grace so much. And mercy," he says. "Think of the burden that is on a person, that you're going to be weighed. And all of us fall short."

This notion of falling short is a big part of Brownback's identity. He's even humble about his own humility, saying there are others who surpass him in this virtue. Once, years ago, he washed the feet of a staffer at a farewell party to demonstrate respect and humility. When he feels his staffers need guidance, he gives them index cards with Scripture encouraging them to follow Christ's model of servant leadership, or reminding them that "Pride goes before destruction."

He says he struggles "to be really fully committed to the faith -- to die to self," to "pick up His cross daily and carry it." He talks about a visit he made earlier this year to Gospel Rescue Ministries downtown, where he stayed overnight in a room full of men participating in a substance abuse program.

"But for the grace of God," he says three times, "there go I."

Brownback grew up one of four kids on a Kansas farm outside Parker, which had 281 residents in the last census. His childhood friend David Prentice recalls herding cattle with Sam on motorcycles. In high school Brownback was a quarterback ("Wasn't much of one," the senator says), and maintained a lustrous afro he likes to joke about now.

DOJ_NMG_0032714

But if the young Sam was, as high school friend Joe Atwood describes him, "extremely overboard humble," he was also highly ambitious. He held leadership positions through law school at the University of Kansas and was state president of Future Farmers of America. At 30, he was appointed the youngest agriculture secretary in Kansas history.

And now, at 49, he's considering a run for president. Across the country, not many people know who Sam Brownback is. His fundraising has been lackluster, though it's still early. Even if he doesn't get close to winning, though, his support in the conservative Christian community may affect what other candidates are talking about.

"One of his major contributions would be to anchor the moral issues in the Republican Party," says Rob Schenck, an evangelical minister and president of the conservative National Clergy Council. "He in a way could hold the evangelical and the traditional Catholic vote hostage if the party began to waver on those issues."

Brownback says his model for the presidential race would be the way he ran for Senate in 1996, after discovering the melanoma.

"If I win, I win. If I lose, I lose," he says. "It's a great liberation. . . . And then you run on the topics that you really feel called to do. And the beauty of it is, is that people really like that. They may not agree with you on things but they really do like that. The purpose-driven life."

He talks about the presidency with a sense -- as his former chief of staff David Kensinger put it -- that "what is supposed to happen will happen." He believes America is a special place destined for special things, and that it is undergoing a "renewal of the soul."

"If Sam's headed for higher office it's because he thinks the mission is headed for higher office," says Barron, the conservationist.

But how can a person be humble and also believe he should be president of the most powerful country in the world?

"It's one of the most humbling things on Earth," Brownback says, his voice soft. "Look at the nature and the difficulty of that job and the greatness of this country and the need to be humble and wise to serve. Plus it's just, it's like, pride was the first sin and humility's the first grace . . ."

"I think Reagan had it right that you don't pursue the presidency, it pursues you."

But a man who expects a crop must first till the soil. Brownback knows this. He still goes home to his childhood farm for the spring planting and the fall harvest of the wheat.

He used to keep a tennis ball can filled with Kansas dirt in his office as a symbol "of what I physically return to," he says. "It's just a great reminder that you serve for a period, you serve for a season and then you move on."

Brownback says he imagines future generations walking the halls of Congress and nobody knowing who he was. He imagines people passing a "Brownback Room" and someone saying, "Who was he?"

Perhaps someone else might answer that Sam Brownback was a complicated man, who thought himself a servant and a potential president at the same time, who imagined his life forgotten even as he dreamed of a room named after himself.

Harvard, Boston Hospital To Attempt Embryo Cloning (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Scientists at Harvard and Children's Hospital Boston announced Tuesday they have the green light to clone human embryos that could generate stem cell lines for specific diseases.

The researchers join a small cadre of scientists worldwide attempting to do what a South Korean scientist claimed to have done, only to have his work unravel when it was exposed as a fraud.

“We are convinced that work with embryonic stem cells holds enormous promise,” Harvard's Steven Hyman said.

Embryonic stem cells are the precursor cells to almost every tissue in the body; growing them could provide replacement tissues for diseases such as diabetes and cancer. In theory, the body would not reject the tissues from cloned embryos. Cloning requires inserting a cell from a patient into an egg and chemically triggering division of their union.

A South Korean team claimed in 2004 to have grown a cloned cell line, or colony, but key members face prosecution for the discredited work.

Opponents call the research immoral because the cells are harvested from embryos that are destroyed in the process. President Bush banned federal funding of stem cell lines created after Aug. 9, 2001, but privately financed work is permissible in many states.

Two research teams led by Douglas Melton and Kevin Eggan of Harvard and George Daley of Children's Hospital will attempt to create cells cloned from patients with juvenile diabetes and blood disorders such as sickle cell anemia.

The Harvard approval, by the institutions' oversight boards, took two years and followed a review process recommended by the National Academy of Sciences. The teams will use eggs collected from unpaid donors and fertility treatments.

DOJ_NMG_0032715

"The announcement is important for stem cell science globally and also important for the debate over the ethics of stem cell research," says British stem cell researcher Michael Whitaker of the University of Newcastle, one of at least four universities making similar attempts. The University of California-San Francisco began a smaller attempt this month.

Any cell treatments, Eggan said, are at least a decade away.

Harvard Joins New U.S. Push In Stem Cells (WSJ)

By Sylvia Pagán Westphal

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

Researchers at Harvard University said they are beginning experiments to clone human embryos for making stem cells, a move that lends clout to renewed U.S. efforts to master the technology.

The announcement marked the culmination of lengthy preparations designed to keep the effort within the ethical and legal boundaries of what is considered to be one of the most controversial areas of medical research.

It is illegal to use federal money for research in which human embryos are harmed. Harvard says its effort will be privately funded.

Harvard's effort mirrors that of other U.S.-based researchers who have also announced recent cloning initiatives in the wake of a major scientific scandal in South Korea, where researchers falsely claimed they had created stem cells from cloned embryos. The Korean debacle has renewed U.S. hopes that the country will regain prominence in world-wide efforts to master the difficult technology.

In cloning, a person's cell is introduced into an egg whose own DNA has been stripped. Inside the egg, the cell starts to divide and form an embryo that is genetically identical to the person who donated the cell. At its earliest stages -- when it's only a few dozen cells in size -- the embryo contains special cells known as "stem cells," which have the unique ability to become all the tissues in the body.

The Harvard experiments aim to take cells from patients with diseases such as diabetes and neurodegenerative disorders to create genetically identical embryos. Because stem cells from those embryos carry the genetic defects of people with the diseases, the scientists hope to study the cells to understand how to repair the problems.

Harvard's announcement comes after scientists at the University of California in San Francisco and closely held Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass., said in May they would also be resuming efforts to clone human embryos for research purposes.

"The science is moving forward in the face of significant hardship," said Arnold Kriegstein, director of the UCSF Institute for Regeneration Medicine, which has started to work on the technology. Scientists in the United Kingdom and Sweden are also working on creating stem cells from cloned embryos.

Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the Harvard effort "will likely be a waste of money and a waste of lives....People think this is some kind of miracle cure around the corner, but for now they'll be exploiting women and killing embryos."

In the type of research planned at Harvard, the embryos created via cloning would be destroyed at an early stage and their stem cells would be extracted. In the laboratory, the scientists would hope to coax the cells into becoming specialized tissue cells, such as insulin-producing pancreatic cells.

One of the Harvard researchers, George Daley, wants to make cloned embryos from patients with blood diseases and derive stem cells from the embryos so he can repair the defect in the laboratory. The cells could then be placed back -- without fear of rejection -- in those people. In similar experiments done in mice, Dr. Daley's team has been able to treat a blood disease using this approach.

But any medical applications of the technology are still many years away. After yesterday's announcement, the Harvard researchers will attempt to take the very first step of the process: getting a human cloned embryo to develop to the stage where stem cells can be extracted from it. It's a goal that has so far proved elusive for several teams around the world.

Harvard said millions of dollars were being devoted to the cloning effort, but declined to be specific. The school said its funding sources include the Howard Hughes Medical Institute, of Chevy Chase, Md.; Boston's Children's Hospital; the New York Stem Cell Foundation, and private individuals.

Douglas Melton, co-director of the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, whose team will be working with cells donated by diabetic patients, maintains a separate facility at Harvard for work he has been doing with human embryonic stem cells derived from IVF embryos. This is where some of the new cloning experiments will take place as well.

Dr. Daley said his laboratory has a separate room where "every single pipette, Petri dish and reagent bottle" has been bought with private money and is marked with a sticker. "We have careful administrative and financial accounting methods in place to insure that none of the experiments that involve [cloning] use any materials purchased with federal funds." At UCSF, the cloning work is also conducted in facilities that receive no federal funds, a spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0032716

The Harvard experiments were approved after a lengthy review by eight different boards and committees at five different institutions involved in the work. These included two Boston area hospitals, a local IVF clinic and Columbia University, where cells from diabetic patients will be grown for the Harvard experiments.

According to Leonard Zon, director of the stem-cell program at Children's Hospital, the two-year process not only involved an extensive ethics review but also consideration of legal and intellectual-property issues. One of the issues was the risk to women from the hormone treatments used in the process of egg donation. According to Harvard researcher Kevin Eggan, it was decided that women would be given hormone doses tailored toward not producing too many eggs, in order to minimize their risk of side effects.

Massachusetts, where Harvard is located, passed a law last year making it illegal to pay for eggs for stem-cell research. For the Harvard experiments, two of the three teams will procure eggs donated by women. At Dr. Daley's laboratory, as well as the UCSF facility, scientists will instead use leftover eggs from failed in vitro fertilization treatments.

Either strategy has pitfalls. Robert Lanza, vice president of research at Advanced Cell Technology, says the company has, since December 2005, placed "over 100 ads" looking for egg donors. Initially there were many replies, but as women realized the discomfort and risks involved in hormone treatments, the numbers have dwindled to two or three potential candidates. "We don't have a single egg at this point," he says.

On the other hand, eggs from failed IVF treatments are plentiful but their ability to form embryos might be compromised. "It might not even be possible" to use them, says Dr. Lanza. He says the company's experience as well as published research suggests that eggs for cloning should be used within hours of obtaining them. Eggs from failed IVF treatments tend to be one to two days old, he says.

2 New Efforts To Develop Stem Cell Line For Study (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Scientists at two universities — Harvard and the University of California, San Francisco — will try to develop embryonic stem cells from the adult cells of patients suffering from certain diseases.

Their purposes in creating the cell lines, which require making an early human embryo, are to study how the diseases develop and also to see if replacement cells can be generated to repair the patient's own degenerating tissues. But the field, despite its much emphasized promise, faces many serious uncertainties.

"Clinical applications may be a decade or more away," said George Q. Daley, a Harvard expert on blood diseases.

Harvard announced its plans yesterday at a news conference; the University of California, San Francisco, did so less conspicuously a month ago, resuming a program abandoned in 2001. Both universities, having received required approvals, will at first obtain the human eggs needed for cloning from fertility clinics, starting with eggs deemed too low quality to produce a successful pregnancy. Both programs are privately financed because federal support for human stem cell research is available only for cell lines made before August 9, 2001.

Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass., also has a human nuclear transfer program "well under way," said Robert Lanza, the company's vice president, but has run into problems in recruiting egg donors. Under guidelines issued by the National Academy of Sciences, which are voluntary but widely observed, donors may not be paid anything beyond expenses.

The new efforts, if successful, would accomplish what the disgraced South Korean scientist Woo-Suk Hwang claimed he had achieved in articles published in Science in 2004 and 2005. Both papers turned out to be based on forged data. But the flaws remained undetected by scientists involved in the cloning field, raising doubts about the rigor and expertise with which the new field was being conducted. The problems came to light not through criticism by scientific peers, but only after a whistle-blower in Dr. Hwang's lab contacted a Seoul television station.

The University of California, San Francisco, said last month that one of its researchers, Renee Reijo Pera, would start the cloning procedure, which involves transferring the nucleus of an adult cell into an unfertilized egg whose own nucleus has been removed.

A composite egg of this kind should develop in glassware into an early embryo, or blastocyst, from which embryonic stem cells could be isolated. There is no evident reason why this should not work in people as it has already done in several animal species, yet so far no one has succeeded. Dr. Hwang used no less than 2,000 fresh eggs donated by a healthy women but failed to accomplish anything useful.

Dr. Reijo Pera will switch to using donated eggs if those rejected by fertility clinics do not work, a university spokeswoman said. Harvard researchers said yesterday that they too would seek to derive eggs from healthy donors in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0032717

Dr. Lanza, of Advanced Cell Technology, said that freshly harvested human eggs were "much better" for nuclear transfer experiments but that a six-month campaign by his company to recruit donors "appears to be a losing effort."

Many women had come forward, saying they would donate their eggs for research without compensation but, after seeing the battery of tests required, "most of the donors change their mind once they realize what's involved," Dr. Lanza said.

If research should establish that replacement tissues can be developed for a patient through the nuclear transfer technique, probably tens or hundreds of donated human eggs would be needed for each operation. Some scientists regard such a requirement as impractical, arguing that researchers should learn how to reprogram an adult cell's nucleus back to embryonic state without the use of human eggs. But this requires a far deeper understanding of human cells than is yet at hand.

Three Harvard scientists described their proposed research yesterday, promising not to discuss it further in public until they had firm results ready to be published. Dr. Daley hopes to develop, via nuclear transfer, embryonic stem cells from patients with blood diseases. He will try to correct the genetic defect behind the disease, then develop blood stem cells that could be engrafted in the patient's marrow.

The two other scientists, Douglas Melton and Kevin Eggan, said they would develop embryonic stem cell lines from diabetic patients, hoping to understand the development of the disease from its earliest moments at the cellular level.

Many Americans Headed For Money Struggles In Retirement (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Almost one in two American families are headed toward years of financial struggle in retirement, according to a new report that says workers are unprepared for cuts in pension and Social Security income.

The Boston College study presumes that most people need to replace 65 percent to 85 percent of their annual income in their working years to stay secure in retirement. But 43 percent of U.S. households will fall at least 10 percent short of that range, the study found, using what it said were conservative projections.

The percentage of households at risk of an insecure retirement rises to 66 percent under a less rosy set of assumptions -- for example, if workers retire at age 63 instead of at 65.

"Unless Americans change their ways, many will struggle in retirement," said Alicia H. Munnell, director of the study and a former member of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. "There is no silver bullet," she added. "The answer is saving more and working longer."

Saying it hoped to draw attention to the issue, Boston College unveiled a new National Retirement Risk Index based on survey data from 4,500 households in the Federal Reserve's 2004 Survey of Consumer Finances. Researchers calculated that the risk index has risen from 31 percent in 1983 to 43 percent in 2004.

Baby boomers born between 1946 and 1964 are generally in better shape than members of Generation X, born between 1965 and 1972, the report said. That's primarily because these younger workers face the prospect of diminished Social Security income, and fewer of them will have pensions.

"Americans weaned on post-war affluence have come to expect an extended period of leisure at the end of their work life," the report noted. "And, indeed, the majority of today's retirees are able to afford a decent retirement. However, this group is living in a 'golden age' that will fade as Baby Boomers and Generation Xers reach traditional retirement ages in the coming decades."

The study is the latest addition to a growing body of research that suggests households headed by working-age adults are poorly prepared to meet their financial needs of retirement.

In April, the Employee Benefit Research Institute cautioned that many Americans "have accumulated only modest retirement savings, under-estimate the share of their pre-retirement income they are likely to need in retirement, and have made no estimate of how much they will need to live comfortably once they retire."

The institute said that people's expectations for retirement are "like a piece of Swiss cheese -- full of holes."

The Boston College report said the grim outlook is being driven by a variety of factors, including:

-- Social Security will replace a smaller share of people's pre-retirement income in the future. The reasons include increased taxation of benefits and higher Medicare premiums. In addition, the retirement age for full benefits will increase to 67 for people born after 1959, up from 65 now.

-- Companies have abandoned costly traditional pensions, which guarantee monthly income for life, in favor of contributions to individual 401(k) plans overseen by the employees themselves. In 2004, the typical older worker nearing retirement had just $60,000 in 401(k) and individual retirement accounts, a sum that would yield less than $400 per month in retirement, according to the researchers.

-- People save too little. "Most of the working age population saves virtually nothing outside of their employer-sponsored pension plan," according to the report.

DOJ_NMG_0032718

-- Retirement lasts longer as longevity increases. The price tag of retirement goes up with its increased duration, particularly for health-care expenses. At the same time, future retirees may find it difficult to make their nest eggs grow through investing, the researchers said.

On the hopeful side, the picture can change significantly by working longer and saving more. For example, retiring at 67 instead of 65 reduces a household's risk by 11 percentage points, the report found. Saving more also can help a person's long-term outlook, particularly if the added savings start when a worker is young.

"If workers consistently set aside 6 percent of their paychecks (with a 3 percent employer match) invest prudently, and leave the money alone, they should have enough," the report said.

At the same time, a recent report by consulting firm McKinsey & Co. found that four out of 10 workers are forced to retire earlier than they intended, usually because of health issues or loss of their job.

Meanwhile, those employees still lucky enough to have pensions may get less than they expected.

In a separate report issued Tuesday, financial rating company Standard & Poor's said federal employee programs are short roughly $4.5 trillion of the money they need to make good on their pension promises. In addition, companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 stock index have about $140.4 billion less set aside than the amount they're expected to need, S&P said.

That's an improvement over 2004, when pension plans were $164.3 billion short. However, corporations have fallen further behind in funding so-called "other post retirement benefits" which include retiree health care programs. These programs are now $320.9 billion short of what they need to back promises made to retirees, senior analyst Howard Silverblatt said. That's likely to lead to cutbacks and caps that retirees may not have planned for, he said.

Study: 43% Not Saving Enough To Retire Well (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, June 7, 2006

A new retirement study provides further evidence that a growing number of Americans are at risk of a diminished standard of living once they stop working.

The Center for Retirement Research's new retirement-risk index, released Tuesday, shows 43% of working households were in danger in 2004 of having too little income to fund their retirement.

But the study probably understates the proportion of retirees at risk. Its projections assume that people retire at age 65, cash in on their home equity through a “reverse mortgage” and exchange their assets for a stream of income by buying an immediate annuity.

Yet many people retire before 65, according to the center, and don't necessarily buy immediate annuities or take out reverse mortgages. Nor does the research take in account the “wild card” of health care costs — and how these expenses will affect retirees' standards of living, says Alicia Munnell, director of the center at Boston College.

The percentage of “at risk” households has surged in the past two decades, from 31% in 1983, according to the center's analysis, which was funded by Nationwide Mutual Insurance. Two factors that have raised the risks are the growing uncertainty of Social Security payouts and the increasing burden on employees to save for their own retirements.

The index, which uses data from the Federal Reserve, is part of a stream of recent sobering conclusions about workers' abilities to finance their golden years. The studies come as the first of 79 million baby boomers — the generation born from 1946 to 1964 — are turning 60 this year.

The center's analysis found that nearly half of today's workers, at their current savings rate, will be unable to fund a comfortable retirement. People will need to work longer or save more, Munnell, one of the authors of the research, said in a conference call.

Boston College says its retirement index goes a step beyond other research in taking into account the income that people would get, theoretically, from tapping their home's equity.

The center assumes that households will need 65% to 85% of their pre-retirement income replaced each year once they stop working, to maintain their pre-retirement standard of living. A household whose projected replacement rate fell below 10% of the target rate was considered “at risk.”

Younger households, and those with low income levels or without traditional pensions, are particularly vulnerable to having too little money for retirement, according to the research.

Jack VanDerhei of the Employee Benefit Research Institute says the center's calculations leave a key question unanswered: How much more income do workers need to save? EBRI's own research says that most future retirees must put away 5% to 25% more of their pay each year to cover basic needs, as well as health care expenses, in retirement.

New Campaign Shows Progress For Homeless (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0032719

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

DENVER — Arthur Sena spent years living in a hole that he had dug near the railroad tracks. He would probably still be there, defying offers of help from social workers and using cardboard to ward off the chill, if Denver had not adopted a radical strategy of putting homeless people into apartments of their own, no strings attached.

The "housing first" policy that this city adopted last year is part of an accelerating national movement that has reduced the numbers of the chronically homeless — the single, troubled men and women who spend years in the streets and shelters — in more than 20 cities.

In this campaign, promoted by a little-known office of the Bush administration, 219 cities, at last count, have started ambitious 10-year plans to end chronic homelessness.

The cities include New York, which is stepping up efforts to house the estimated nearly 4,000 people huddling on sidewalks or sleeping in parks, and Henderson, N.C., population 17,000, which recently counted 91 homeless people, 14 of them chronic cases.

Many of the early starters are reporting turnarounds. In Philadelphia, street dwellers have declined 60 percent over five years. In San Francisco, the number of the chronic homeless is down 28 percent in two years, in Dallas 26 percent and in Raleigh-Durham, N.C., 15 percent.

If it is not always clear who will pay for the plans, the burst of effort has buoyed a field long accustomed to futility.

"I've sensed a new energy in city halls and state houses around the issue of ending homelessness," said Robert V. Hess, who just took over as homeless services commissioner in New York City after years of similar work in Philadelphia. "This is unprecedented in my lifetime."

Part of the credit, Mr. Hess and others said, goes to Philip F. Mangano, a Bush appointee who has spent five years visiting every mayor and governor he can, brandishing successful examples, cost-benefit studies and his own messianic fervor along with modest amounts of federal money.

"We're conspiring to undo what we'd been told for so many years, that this was an intractable issue," Mr. Mangano told 150 mayors, state and city officials and private leaders here in May. They were gathered for the first "national leadership summit," sponsored by the once-dormant office that Mr. Mangano leads, the United States Interagency Council on Homelessness.

Wherever he goes, Mr. Mangano, 58, who was director of the Massachusetts Housing and Shelter Alliance, emphasizes that it is cheaper to put the chronically homeless right into apartments, and provide medical and addiction treatments there, than to watch them cycle endlessly through shelters, soup kitchens, emergency rooms, detoxification centers and jails.

"Cost-benefit analysis may be the new expression of compassion in our communities," he said at the Denver meeting.

Typically, people in such programs are put into sparsely furnished apartments free. Soon after, as they are helped into jobs or sign up for disability or other government benefits, they are required to pay modest rents.

Outreach workers had spent months persuading Mr. Sena, 69, to move to an efficiency apartment downtown. He finally did in 2005, after injuring an arm. His room still has bare walls, and Mr. Sena, who remarkably retains a head of dark hair, has not lost his crustiness.

"I never had any alcohol addiction," he told a visitor. "I just copped a little shot now and then. As a matter of fact, I was just heading out right now to get a half pint. It's the only thing that helps the pain in my arm."

Mr. Sena refused to disclose more about his history or use of public services. But in a study here, officials found that 25 men were taken into emergency detoxification centers for an average of 80 nights each in one year, at a total cost of $772,000. Officials have found that they can provide housing and most medical and other services for about $15,000 a year per person.

The growing focus on housing the chronically homeless was driven, many officials said, by a study in 1998 by Prof. Dennis P. Culhane, a sociologist at the University of Pennsylvania. Professor Culhane showed that a vast majority of people staying in shelters did so briefly and got on with their lives and that 10 percent were in and out repeatedly for years, accounting for half of total bed use.

National estimates of the chronic homeless run about 200,000, among an estimated total of 750,000 homeless people on any given night that includes families and other people in temporary trouble, said Nan Roman, president of the National Alliance to End Homelessness, a group in Washington.

Some advocates and state officials have questioned the intense focus on chronic cases, fearing that it detracts from programs for families. Mr. Mangano responds that homeless families continue to receive the bulk of public money and are the subject of promising experiments, too.

More important, he said in an interview, visible progress against the most visible face of homelessness will inspire more financing. Already, Mr. Mangano added, documented gains have persuaded the White House and Congress to increase spending. Federal money to work on homelessness has climbed over the last five years to more than $4 billion, from $3 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0032720

Mr. Mangano "is great at spin," said Bob Erlenbusch, chairman of the National Coalition for the Homeless, an advocacy group based in Washington. But Mr. Mangano is glossing over the broader trend, Mr. Erlenbusch said, because federal programs for low-income housing, which can prevent homelessness, have languished in the Bush years or been cut.

To start their new plans, cities have combined federal and local public money with foundation and corporate grants. But many officials say a lack of money will hamper the development of needed housing and support teams.

The "housing first" approach was pioneered in the 1990's by a group in New York, Pathways to Housing.

In a first step, confirmed street dwellers are coaxed into rooms of their own, a more attractive proposition to many than the drug treatment programs or transitional group homes they had been offered in the past. Some skittish people take along their shopping carts.

Once drawn into so-called supportive housing, the participants are monitored by social workers and offered psychiatric and other services that might stabilize their lives. But breaking addictions or seeking other needed treatment is not a prerequisite for entry.

New York City, a leader in supportive housing, recently counted 3,843 people living in the streets, a 13 percent decline from the previous year. The state and city governments are also joining to build 9,000 supportive housing units in New York over 10 years.

Some "tough-love" groups have opposed housing first, saying that without more discipline, addicts will never succeed. But in experiments around the country, 80 percent or more of those housed participants remained in their quarters after a year.

Workers at the Colorado Coalition for the Homeless, which runs Mr. Sena's building, said they knew that some tenants were using drugs or alcohol.

"It's better that they pass out here than in the streets," said John Parvensky, director of the coalition.

In many cities, the approach has also drawn fire from agencies that run shelters and drug treatment programs. Those agencies bristle at the suggestion that their emergency aid just perpetuates problems.

"It was very tough to buck the status quo and tell service providers that we're not going to do it your way anymore," said Angela Alioto, a lawyer and Democratic politician who oversees the 10-year plan in San Francisco on behalf of Mayor Gavin Newsom.

Among some groups, Ms. Alito said, "there was hysteria" when the city said it would stop financing groups that did not send participants to housing. But by the end of 2006, she predicted, 2,200 of the estimated 3,000 chronically homeless will be in apartments.

As much as they talk excitedly about ending homelessness, experts know that change will come in fits and starts, for cities as well as for individuals.

By early 2005, Philadelphia had pushed down the number of homeless in the streets to 250, compared to 824 five years earlier, Mr. Hess said.

After a Live Aid concert there last July, however, the number spiked, for reasons that are not clear to the experts, to more than 400, and the city has been whittling it back down.

In Denver, Deborah Johnson, 52, is more openly grateful than Mr. Sena for her new apartment, saying that after 11 years in shelters and recovery programs "it feels great because I'm an independent person."

But her craving for alcohol is a recurring threat, Ms. Johnson conceded. Two times in the last two years she entered housing but was ejected because of "behavior problems" involving her or her guests, a coalition official said.

After another stay in an addiction center, Ms. Johnson moved to her latest apartment in April. She uses an overturned supermarket basket for a table and keeps a Bible near her mattress. She meets her case manager three times a week, Ms. Johnson said, and hopes some day to resume work as a cook.

C.I.A. Knew Where Eichmann Was Hiding, Documents Show (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — The Central Intelligence Agency took no action after learning the pseudonym and whereabouts of the fugitive Holocaust administrator Adolf Eichmann in 1958, according to C.I.A. documents released Tuesday that shed new light on the spy agency's use of former Nazis as informants after World War II.

The C.I.A. was told by West German intelligence that Eichmann was living in Argentina under the name Clemens — a slight variation on his actual alias, Ricardo Klement — but did not share the information with Israel, which had been hunting for him for years, according to Timothy Naftali, a historian who examined the documents. Two years later, Israeli agents abducted Eichmann in Argentina and flew him to Israel, where he was tried and executed in 1962.

DOJ_NMG_0032721

The Eichmann papers are among 27,000 newly declassified pages released by the C.I.A. to the National Archives under Congressional pressure to make public files about former officials of Hitler's regime later used as American agents. The material reinforces the view that most former Nazis gave American intelligence little of value and in some cases proved to be damaging double agents for the Soviet K.G.B., according to historians and members of the government panel that has worked to open the long-secret files.

Elizabeth Holtzman, a former congresswoman from New York and member of the panel, the Nazi War Crimes and Japanese Imperial Government Records Interagency Working Group, said the documents showed that the C.I.A "failed to lift a finger" to hunt Eichmann and "force us to confront not only the moral harm but the practical harm" of relying on intelligence from ex-Nazis.

The United States government, preoccupied with the cold war, had no policy at the time of pursuing Nazi war criminals. The records also show that American intelligence officials protected many former Nazis for their perceived value in combating the Soviet threat.

But Ms. Holtzman, speaking at a news briefing at the National Archives on Tuesday, said information from the former Nazis was often tainted both by their "personal agendas" and their vulnerability to blackmail. "Using bad people can have very bad consequences," Ms. Holtzman said. She and other group members suggested that the findings should be a cautionary tale for intelligence agencies today.

As head of the Gestapo's Jewish affairs office during the war, Eichmann put into effect the policy of extermination of European Jewry, promoting the use of gas chambers and having a hand in the murder of millions of Jews. Captured by the United States Army at the end of the war, he gave a false name and went unrecognized, hiding in Germany and Italy before fleeing to Argentina in 1950.

Israeli agents hunting for Eichmann came to suspect that he was in Argentina but did not know his alias. They temporarily abandoned their search around the time, in March 1958, that West German intelligence told the C.I.A. that Eichmann had been living in Argentina as Clemens, said Mr. Naftali, of the University of Virginia.

The West German government was wary of exposing Eichmann because officials feared what he might reveal about such figures as Hans Globke, a former Nazi government official then serving as a top national security adviser to Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, Mr. Naftali said.

In 1960, also at the request of West Germany, the C.I.A. persuaded Life magazine, which had purchased Eichmann's memoir from his family, to delete a reference to Mr. Globke before publication, the documents show.

Ironically, in view of the information the C.I.A. received in 1958, documents previously released by the C.I.A. showed that it was surprised in May 1960 when the Israelis captured Eichmann. Cables from the time show that Allen Dulles, the C.I.A. director, demanded that officers find out more about the capture.

Since Congress passed the Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act in 1998, the Interagency Working Group has worked to declassify more than eight million pages of documents.

Norman J. W. Goda, an Ohio University historian who reviewed the C.I.A. material, said it showed in greater detail than previously known how the K.G.B. aggressively recruited former Nazi intelligence officers after the war. In particular, he said, the documents fill in the story of the "catastrophic" Soviet penetration of the Gehlen Organization, the postwar West German intelligence service sponsored by the United States Army and then the C.I.A.

Mr. Goda described the case of Heinz Felfe, a former SS officer who was bitter over the Allied firebombing of his native city, Dresden, and secretly worked for the K.G.B. Mr. Felfe rose in the Gehlen Organization to oversee counterintelligence, a Soviet agent placed in charge of combating Soviet espionage.

The C.I.A. shared much sensitive information with Mr. Felfe, Mr. Goda found. A newly released 1963 C.I.A. damage assessment, written after Mr. Felfe was arrested as a Soviet agent in 1961, found that he had exposed "over 100 C.I.A. staffers" and caused many eavesdropping operations to end with "complete failure or a worthless product."

The documents also provide new information about the case of Tscherim Soobzokov, a former SS officer who was the subject of a much-publicized deportation case in 1979 when he was living as an American citizen in Paterson, N.J. He was charged with having falsified his immigration application to conceal his SS service, which ordinarily would have barred his entry. But the charge was dropped when a C.I.A. document turned up showing that he had disclosed his SS membership.

The newly declassified records show that he was employed by the C.I.A. from 1952 to 1959 despite "clear evidence of a war crimes record," said another historian at the briefing, Richard Breitman of American University.

Because it valued Mr. Soobzokov for his language skills and ties to fellow ethnic Circassians living in the Soviet Union, the C.I.A. deliberately hid details of his Nazi record from the Immigration and Naturalization Service after he moved to the United States in 1955, Mr. Breitman said.

DOJ_NMG_0032722

But Mr. Soobzokov ultimately did not escape his past. He died in 1985 after a pipe bomb exploded outside his house. The case has never been solved.

CIA Ties With Ex-Nazis Shown (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

The CIA organized Cold War spy networks that included former Nazis and failed to act on a 1958 report that fugitive Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann was living in Argentina, newly released CIA records show.

The records were among 27,000 pages of documents made public yesterday at the National Archives. They shed new light on the secret protection and support given to former Nazi officials and Nazi collaborators by U.S. intelligence agencies as fighting communism became the central aim of American foreign policy in the years after World War II.

"It was not U.S. policy to track Nazi war criminals once the Cold War began," said historian Timothy Naftali of the University of Virginia, a Cold War expert who has studied the new documents.

"The CIA based its decisions about using former SS men or unreconstructed Nazis solely on operational considerations. . . . Hiring these tainted individuals brought little other than operational problems and moral confusion to our government's intelligence community," he added.

The subject of postwar collaboration between U.S. intelligence and former Nazis that the government sought to use in the struggle against the Soviet Union has been documented, but historians said the previously inaccessible documents have enabled them to fill in many blanks in the historical narrative.

About 60,000 pages of CIA records had already been released since 1999, after a 1998 federal law opened up secret government files relating to war crimes by the German and Japanese governments during World War II.

Historians reviewing the records for the government published a 2004 book, "U.S. Intelligence and the Nazis," based on 240,000 pages of FBI records, 419 CIA files and 3,000 pages of U.S. Army information. It detailed the Army's postwar relationship with former officers of the German Wehrmacht's intelligence service, which are available at the National Archives.

The materials released yesterday include operational documents detailing the activities of the CIA and its contacts abroad, historians and other officials said during a news conference at the National Archives.

"It's a rare release of operational files," said Allen Weinstein, head of the National Archives and chairman of the interagency working group overseeing the declassification of records about World War II crimes and criminals. "The files are also more inclusive than any other CIA files made public before. . . . This time, the documents are nearly all without redactions, providing researchers and historians the clearest view yet of the postwar intelligence world."

The release of the records stalled last year with the deadline for the interagency project approaching when the CIA balked at declassifying more detailed documents about the agency's postwar ties to Nazis. But the CIA caved in under pressure from Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), an author of the original legislation, and other prominent backers of that law. Congress passed a new law extending the life of the interagency panel by two years, to early 2007.

Some of the newly released documents show that between 1949 and 1955, the CIA organized "stay-behind" networks of German agents to provide intelligence from behind enemy lines, should the Soviet Union invade western Germany.

One network included at least two former Nazi SS members -- Staff Sgt. Heinrich Hoffman and Lt. Col. Hans Rues -- and one was run by Lt. Col. Walter Kopp, a former German army officer referred to by the CIA as an "unreconstructed Nazi." The network was disbanded in 1953 amid political concerns that some members' neo-Nazi sympathies would be exposed in the West German press.

In a March 1958 memo to the CIA, the West German foreign intelligence services (BND) wrote that Eichmann, a top Gestapo official who helped orchestrate the mass murder of Jews, "is reported to have lived in Argentina under the alias CLEMENS since 1952." The memo also mentioned a rumor that Eichmann lived in Jerusalem.

In fact, Eichmann was in Argentina and was using the name Ricardo Klement -- but apparently neither the CIA nor the West Germans acted on the information, Naftali said.

"Tragically, at the moment the CIA and the BND had this information the Israelis were temporarily giving up their search for Eichmann in Argentina because they could not figure out his alias," Naftali wrote in an analysis of the documents.

Eventually, Israeli Mossad agents abducted Eichmann in Buenos Aires on May 11, 1960. He was tried in Jerusalem, sentenced to death and hanged on May 31, 1962.

Robert Wolfe, a former federal archivist and an expert on captured German records, said the new CIA documents illustrate the "sorry results" of recruiting former Nazi intelligence personnel to U.S. efforts to keep the Soviet Union in check.

DOJ_NMG_0032723

"The alleged intelligence those recruits peddled was mostly hearsay and gossip designed to tell their American interrogators what they wanted to hear, in the hope of escaping retribution for past crimes, or for mercenary gain, or for political agendas not necessarily compatible with American national interests," Wolfe said.

Health Insurance Doesn't Have To Hurt (USAT)

By Laura Vanderkam

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Like most young people, I like to believe I'm invincible. Every so often, though, an e-mail shows up in my inbox that reminds me I'm not. Another twentysomething acquaintance has suffered a ski accident, appendectomy or electric-saw mishap. The worst reports share a line: "He doesn't have health insurance." Then I know this young person is not only in pain, he's also wincing as his hospital time ticks by at $7,000 per day.

At least these young people can take comfort that they're not alone. A third of Americans ages 21-24 lack health insurance, more than any other demographic. A quarter of those ages 25-34 do without.

Given hospital costs these days, it's not surprising that young people and their families are agitating for government to "do something." Some states are listening. New Jersey legislators, for instance, passed a law this spring that lets certain residents stay on their parents' plans until age 30. In theory, raising the age of dependency could reduce the coverage gap.

In theory. Looking closer, though, I'm reminded of Ronald Reagan's adage: Government is not the solution to our problem. Government is the problem, at least when it comes to health insurance. Well-meaning but misguided states such as New Jersey and Massachusetts have priced young people out of the market by keeping laws on the books that force plans to cover everything, take all comers or treat young and old, healthy and sick, roughly the same. It's nice that legislatures then try to mop up the mess by passing "slacker mandates" that pretend 30-year-olds are dependents, or, in Massachusetts, forcing people to carry coverage. But if this country truly wants to cover the uninsured, we should remember that rates aren't high everywhere. Insurance companies have come up with cheap ways to get young people covered in states that don't tie insurers' hands. The answer is not to pass more laws.

The answer is to get government out of the way.

Sticker shock

Few young people graduating this spring — and leaving their parents' plans or state plans for children — will think much about health insurance as they collect their diplomas. That's one of the reasons such a high percentage wind up uninsured. Most eventually land coverage the way most Americans do — through a full-time job at a big employer. But not all young people can, or want to, work full-time for such places.

Unfortunately, responsible folks who then shop for their own coverage encounter massive sticker shock in some states. The only individual plan available for a 27-year-old New York City woman on eHealthInsurance.com, a website that lets you comparison shop for policies, runs a whopping $365.50 a month — and it doesn't cover office visits. I conducted a similar search in Manhattan a few years ago and finally found a group plan I could join. My monthly rate ran a not-much-lower $286.

Recalling the appendectomy e-mails, I paid (until I got married and joined my husband's plan). But, boy, did I fume about it. I had previously paid about $70 a month in Washington, D.C. Looking online now, I can still find rates that low in states from Illinois to Texas.

So why the four-to-fivefold price difference? The answer stems from a few policies imposed by state legislatures that raise insurance costs considerably:

· Guaranteed issue. In the handful of states with this policy, such as Massachusetts and New Jersey, plans have to take all comers — you and your 58-year-old obese neighbor with a motorcycle-racing hobby alike.

· Community rating. In states, such as New York, with versions of this rule, plans can't notice that you and your neighbor have different risk profiles. So they have to charge you similar amounts (and it's rarely the lower-risk person's rate).

· Mandates. These are goodies from hair prostheses to massage therapy visits that states force plans to cover. All states have some mandates, though the number and their costs vary widely.

States presumably mean well when they pass these laws. They don't want plans to discriminate against old people or sick people, and they want residents to have all their medical needs covered. But in states where plans have to take all comers, charge them similar rates and cover things such as in vitro fertilization treatments, it's no wonder rates skyrocket beyond young people's ability to pay.

Better models

Insurance doesn't have to cost an arm and a leg, though. In California, for instance, Blue Cross launched a policy in 2004 called TONIK that's aimed specifically at twentysomethings who want coverage for catastrophes but don't need a lot of other care. A plan with a $1,500 deductible and unlimited $40 doctor visits runs $90 a month. A $5,000 deductible plan with four $20 visits is $69. TONIK quickly became the company's second best-selling policy in California. Even better: 70% of buyers were previously uninsured. You can now buy versions of TONIK in low-regulation states from Texas to Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0032724

There is fine print, of course. TONIK doesn't cover maternity benefits (pregnant members get bumped to a different plan). California TONIK policies also don't cover brand-name drugs. But once you expect insurance to cover everything for everybody — as in New Jersey — and when you don't let plans treat people differently based on risk profiles, insurance stops being cheap. When it stops being cheap, young people decide to risk going without.

That choice is bad news for the unlucky young people who then endure expensive ski accidents and appendectomies. But it's bad news for older folks, too. Not only do all taxpayers foot hospital bills for uninsured people who can't pay, shoving young people out of insurance pools also raises rates for everyone else. If states truly want people covered, that's something to keep in mind.

Laura Vanderkam, who lives in New York, is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

A Positive In Going Negative? (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Economist John Kenneth Galbraith died this year, but he left behind the conventional wisdom. Galbraith coined the phrase in 1958 to denote those comfortable ideas "which are esteemed at any time for their acceptability."

Coincidentally, in the weeks after Galbraith's death, I came across assaults on two pillars of the conventional political wisdom: that negative attack ads are bad and that disclosure of campaign finance information is good. Neither argument is ultimately convincing, but both serve as provocative warnings against the complacent repetition of accepted verities.

The first challenge comes in a book by Vanderbilt University political science professor John G. Geer, "In Defense of Negativity: Attack Ads in Presidential Campaigns." Geer disputes the notion that rampant negativity is a new phenomenon; the writers of the Declaration of Independence, he says, went negative in 70 percent of the document. He argues that, despite media fixation on the subject, modern voters are not "drowning in a sea of negativity." Even in the 2004 presidential race, the most negative one in his analysis, Geer found equal numbers of positive and negative appeals.

In fact, Geer contends, negative advertising is a force for good, sharpening public debate and informing voters. Analyzing presidential campaigns from 1960 through 2004, Geer finds that negative advertising tends to be meatier than gauzy positive spots. Nearly three-quarters of the claims in negative ads involve issues, not attacks on candidates' character or values.

Geer's perspective is a valuable antidote to the usual hand-wringing, but his paean to negativity goes overboard. Geer counts only ads by the candidates themselves, not the rapidly proliferating spots from outside groups -- the Willie Horton ad in 1988 or Swift Boat Veterans' attacks in 2004 -- with more freedom to be vicious. And he shies away from assessing the legitimacy of negative attacks, which may be moored to facts but wrenched entirely out of context.

Nor does he consider how the fear of being the target of a 30-second attack ad can distort policymaking. I attended a lunch with Geer on the very day the House of Representatives approved a sham lobbying reform bill with the help of jittery lawmakers who feared that a vote against the bill would produce ads assailing them as lobbyists' handmaidens.

The fact that Geer's analysis is limited to presidential campaigns, where negative attacks are somewhat constrained by the scrutiny they are guaranteed to draw, may diminish his damage assessment. Consider North Carolina, where Democratic congressman Brad Miller is the subject of a radio ad attacking his stances on gay rights and immigration. "If Miller had his way, America would be nothing but one big fiesta for illegal aliens and homosexuals," says the ad, to the accompaniment of mariachi music. Hardly the high-toned issue-sharpening of Geer's optimistic depiction.

If negativity's negatives are part of the received wisdom, the value of disclosure is a veritable article of faith. In a recent paper, Democratic election lawyer Robert F. Bauer, my favorite campaign finance sparring partner, takes on the popular view of disclosure as an "efficient, relatively innocuous method of managing concerns about money in politics."

The notion of disclosure as a useful tool for the well-informed voter, he says, is "almost quaint" in a data-drenched world where even the most diligent citizen can't digest all the available information. Rather, disclosure has become the province of journalists and professional do-gooders who mine the data to produce a cynical -- and cynicism-inducing -- narrative of the pernicious influence of money on the political system.

Worst of all, according to Bauer, disclosure is increasingly a mere first step in the relentless march toward an ever-expanding regulatory regime governing political speech: "the stake that the state drives into the ground to mark out new territory."

Bauer's case in point involves 527s, the independent groups that drew attention in 2004, when financier George Soros lavished $24 million on efforts to oust George W. Bush, and when the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth helped defeat John F. Kerry. Perhaps disclosure in those cases produced the cynicism that Bauer laments. But it can't be that the political system would have been better off if such spending had been cloaked in secrecy, as was the case before Congress required reporting in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0032725

In the case of 527s, Bauer correctly argues, those disclosure rules only presaged demands for additional regulation; Congress is now considering legislation that would require these groups to abide by the same campaign finance rules as other players.

This is where Bauer and I part company: Congress was right when it moved to end unlimited "soft money" donations to political parties, and it would be wise -- now that such activity has shifted to 527s -- to act there as well. But the fact that some disclosure rules precede substantive regulation doesn't mean that all such reporting requirements do, or should, lead to more. In some cases, sunlight is sufficient.

Writing nearly half a century ago, Galbraith described the "articulation of the conventional wisdom" as "a religious rite . . . an act of affirmation like reading aloud from Scriptures." In that vein, Geer and Bauer proffer useful heresies. Negativity isn't an unadulterated evil. Disclosure isn't a panacea. But when it comes to these tenets, at least, the conventional hymnal contains a good deal of wisdom.

Bush Optimistic About Iran's Reaction To Nuke Plan (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration was cautiously upbeat Tuesday about Iran's initial reaction to incentives aimed at persuading it to freeze its efforts to make nuclear fuel.

"It sounds like a positive step to me," President Bush told reporters in Texas after visiting a Border Patrol facility. "We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously."

The proposal was finalized last week by diplomats from the United States, Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana presented the incentives package to Iranian officials in Tehran. Top Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said the proposals had "positive steps" but said talks were needed to clear up "ambiguities."

The Iranians told Solana that they would consider the proposal but would need time to review it, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. Solana said that he would be in contact with the Iranians in the coming days.

Larijani promised to seriously study the proposals but gave no time frame for a response.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said Iran has weeks, not months, to take up the offer. The deal threatens penalties, which have not yet been made public, if Iran does not comply.

Iran watchers said Larijani's comments, which came after several days of often-contradictory rhetoric about the proposal from leaders in Tehran, mark the first significant sign that Iran is at least taking the offer seriously.

Trita Parsi, an Iran expert at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, said the fact that Iran did not immediately disclose the contents of the proposal indicated that the prospective deal was enticing.

The administration has offered to take part in talks with Iran about its nuclear program as part of the proposal, a significant U.S. policy shift that is considered to be the primary incentive in the proposal.

Unlike previous European and Russian overtures to Iran, this offer does not require that Tehran give up its nuclear enrichment program — only suspend it.

If Iran rejects the proposal, the United Nations Security Council will consider a resolution threatening sanctions against the nation.

The United States says Iran is using the enrichment program to try to make a nuclear weapon. Iran insists its program is for peaceful purposes.

Administration officials refused to describe the enticements to Iran contained in the proposal.

"I've seen a lot of reports flying around the past couple days about what may or may not be in this package. I would just caution everybody, until we actually are able to discuss what is in the package in public, (to) take reports with a grain of salt," McCormack said.

He said the coalition of diplomatic partners who made the proposal have agreed not to discuss it publicly in order to give Iran "a little bit of space to consider what's in the package, both on the positive as well as the negative side."

The Associated Press, citing anonymous diplomats familiar with the proposal, reported that the United States is offering to provide Iran with some civilian nuclear technology.

The wire service also reported that Washington has agreed to sell Boeing aircraft parts to Iran and that the proposal offers the possibility of Europe selling Tehran new Airbus planes. Boeing spokeswoman Amanda Landers had no comment.

Iran's commercial aircraft fleet is largely made up of Boeing planes purchased before the 1979 revolution. The nation has long complained that U.S. sanctions have created safety hazards for its aircraft.

Bush: Iran's Initial Response Positive (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0032726

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday that Iran's initial response to a package of incentives and threats on the nuclear impasse "sounds like a positive step to me."

"We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously," Bush said in Laredo, Texas, where he was speaking about immigration overhaul. "The choice is theirs to make.

"I have said the United States will come and sit down at the table with them so long as they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way," Bush said. "So it sounds like a positive response to me."

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana laid out the potential rewards and consequences in a visit to Tehran. He later told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice by phone that the Iranians had said they would need time to consider the proposal, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Solana called the discussions "very useful and constructive," McCormack said.

Bush said in Laredo that he wanted to resolve the issue with Iran diplomatically.

Earlier in the day, the administration said it would give Iran "a little bit of space" to consider the package but added that the offer was not open-ended.

"It's a matter of weeks, not months," McCormack said, echoing the vague deadline set out by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice before the package was presented to Tehran.

U.S. officials would not discuss specifics, saying that Iran needed time to review the package and ask questions in private.

"We want to give this every opportunity to succeed," McCormack said. "The diplomacy, I would say, is at a sensitive stage."

The package includes a promise of Western technical help in developing peaceful civilian nuclear energy if Iran stops enriching uranium, a waiver of U.S. legal restrictions to allow export of some agricultural technology, access to U.S. aircraft parts or new Boeing Co. planes to upgrade Iran's aging fleet and U.S. and European backing for Iran to join the World Trade Organization, diplomats and others said.

The proposal was agreed on last week by the United States, Britain, France, China and Russia — the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany. Those nations would be expected to move for Security Council sanctions such as travel and financial restrictions on Iranian officials if Tehran does not take the deal or if negotiations fall apart.

Top Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said the initiative contains "positive steps" but also some "ambiguities."

"There are robust measures on both sides, both the incentive side as well as the disincentive side," McCormack said. "It presents the Iranian government with a very clear choice on both sides of the road."

___

Associated Press writers George Jahn in Vienna and Nedra Pickler in Laredo contributed to this report.

Proposal Would Let Iran Enrich Uranium (WP)

By Karl Vick And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

TEHRAN, June 6 -- The confidential diplomatic package backed by Washington and formally presented to Iran on Tuesday leaves open the possibility that Tehran will be able to enrich uranium on its own soil, U.S. and European officials said.

That concession, along with a promise of U.S. assistance for an Iranian civilian nuclear energy program, is conditioned on Tehran suspending its current nuclear work until the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency determines with confidence that the program is peaceful. U.S. officials said Iran would also need to satisfy the U.N. Security Council that it is not seeking a nuclear weapon, a benchmark that White House officials believe could take years, if not decades, to achieve.

But the Bush administration and its European allies have withdrawn their demand that Iran abandon any hope of enriching uranium for nuclear power, according to several European and U.S. officials with knowledge of the offer. The new position, which has not been acknowledged publicly by the White House, differs significantly from the Bush administration's stated determination to prevent Iran from mastering technology that could be used to develop nuclear weapons.

"We are basically now saying that over the long haul, if they restore confidence, that this Iranian regime can have enrichment at home," said one U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "But they have to answer every concern given all that points to a secret weapons program."

Iran built its nuclear program in secret over 18 years. The effort was exposed by dissidents in 2002, setting off a U.N. investigation that has not found proof of a weapons program but has been unable to rule one out. Iran maintains that the program was designed for nuclear energy, not weapons.

In private discussions among the United States and its allies concerning possible action against Iran, Germany had suggested that Iran could be allowed to continue, under strict U.N. monitoring, its current enrichment research while negotiations commenced. But the Bush administration, as well as the governments of France and Britain, disagreed, arguing that Iran must suspend the program until suspicions regarding its true nature are cleared up.

DOJ_NMG_0032727

The list of incentives that European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana detailed to Iranian officials here on Tuesday was endorsed by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany. It contains not only the revamped American promises on enrichment but a U.S. offer to join negotiations directly if Iran suspends its program, as well as pledges of European assistance in building additional light-water nuclear power plants and support for Iranian membership in the World Trade Organization.

"We had constructive talks," Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, told reporters after the two-hour meeting in the palatial offices of Iran's Supreme National Security Council. "There are some positive steps in it and also some ambiguities."

Larijani did not elaborate, but diplomats said the atmospherics surrounding the meeting appeared to reinforce recent assurances by Iranian officials that the new proposal would be considered seriously. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, appointed by hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, vowed to study "Europe's incentive package," a description that accentuated the proposal's positive elements.

Speaking privately, a senior Iranian official said that the offer appeared to have much worthy of consideration.

European and American diplomats expressed relief.

"Our first aim was already achieved because they didn't reject" the offer, one European diplomat said.

Talking with reporters in Laredo, Tex., President Bush said Larijani's reaction to the proposals "sounds like a positive response to me."

"I want to solve this issue with Iran diplomatically. . . . We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously. The choice is theirs to make," Bush said.

The new package embodies the "robust diplomacy" that Bush endorsed, according to U.S. officials, in hopes of broadening policy options that had been narrowing to two unattractive options: military strikes on Iran's known nuclear facilities, or acquiescence to an Iranian nuclear program that was only lightly monitored by the IAEA.

Diplomats said the bid also includes elements mentioned in earlier rounds of negotiations: Washington would selectively relax long-standing economic sanctions to allow the sale of spare parts for civilian airliners to Iran, as well as technology for earthquake early-warning systems and meteorological study. Like the American offer to join the talks directly, the moves signal at least the potential for further future engagement between Washington and Tehran.

But a deal will pivot first on Iran's decision whether to suspend enrichment, a move it has repeatedly insisted it will not make. A diplomat said the offer reflected weeks of intense and high-level discussions in Washington and in Tehran aimed at deflecting confrontation.

"Each side has taken a more serious look at what the other wants and how compromise can be reached," a Western diplomat said.

In the Bush administration's view, the possibility for Iran to one day enrich uranium was "a very important part of the deal, and it's what will allow Iran to accept it," said a U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Iran always spun previous offers as an attempt to keep it from exercising its rights to enrich. Now that is explicitly not the case."

The move also reflects a new reality: Iran announced in April that it had made advancements toward industrial-level enrichment of uranium. Iranian officials boasted that the achievement "changed the facts on the ground."

Tehran likely will fight to retain that capability on a small scale. "This will be the big issue, and the Iranians will hold out, since they are already doing it anyway," the U.S. official said.

To allow Iran to proceed with other elements of its nuclear program, such as bringing online a power plant nearing completion at Bushehr on the Persian Gulf, the proposal suggests that Iran import enriched uranium from Russia for the duration of its own enrichment moratorium.

Diplomats in Washington and European capitals now expect weeks of private contacts among European, Iranian, Russian, Chinese and U.S. officials to work out details for negotiations over the package -- talks about talks, since the package is intended to reopen formal negotiations. Officials said the latter could begin as soon as next month, if Iran agrees to take a first step forward by suspending its current research and development work.

"They need time to swallow and actually digest not only the proposal but also the American moves, especially the latter," said a European diplomat resident in Iran who asked not to be identified further.

"The most significant part of the package is that the Americans said they're willing to sit at the table. Everything else, I think, is minor compared to that."

No formal deadline has been announced for Iran's response, although Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described a time frame of weeks rather than months. Other diplomats said a "natural deadline" would be the summit of the Group of Eight industrialized nations set to begin July 15 in St. Petersburg.

DOJ_NMG_0032728

Diplomacy Moves To The Fore Over Iranian Nuclear Issue (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin, Kasra Naji, And Paul Richter

Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran — The Iranian government suggested Tuesday it would seek changes in the package of incentives offered here on behalf of world powers by European Union Foreign Minister Javier Solana; but comments made by both sides also made clear that for now, diplomacy had replaced confrontation over Iran's nuclear aspirations.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and Solana, who was accompanied by the political directors for England, France, Germany and Russia, said they would be talking again in the coming days.

"We had constructive talks," said Larijani. Solana "delivered certain proposals that they had been working on. These proposals contain a number of positive steps, and there are also ambiguities that have to be cleared up."

"I hope after we've had a chance to consider the proposals, we could have more talks so that we can reach a balanced and logical outcome," Larijani added.

Speaking to reporters in Laredo, Texas, President Bush described Iran's reaction as "positive."

"We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously," Bush continued. "The choice is theirs to make."

The world powers are demanding that Iran halt its uranium enrichment related work in return for economic goodies and more intangible support such as backing from the West for Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization.

Key to the entire offer however, is the United States' commitment, announced last week, to join the Europeans, Russia and China in talks with Iran if the Islamic Republic suspends uranium enrichment related ctivities. Many of the economic offers, some of which the European Union also made nearly a year ago, cannot be delivered without U.S. backing because of legal and treaty requirements.

Among them is a guarantee that the United States would facilitate a European offer to provide Iran with a light water reactor and other civilian nuclear technology. Much of the light water nuclear technology originates in the United States and without American government approval, the Europeans could not provide it to Iran. The decision to offer Iran help with a nuclear reactor is bound to be especially controversial because it is possible to harvest spent plutonium from such a plant and use it to manufacture material for an atomic bomb, according to scientists.

"Spent fuel from a light water reactor is harder to process," for use in a bomb, said David Albright, a former United Nations weapons inspector. "But nothing isproliferation proof."

Western powers are convinced that Iran's nuclear program is aimed at achieving the capability to make bombs. Tehran insists it wants nuclear technology only for civilian purposes.

The United States and the other countries have also committed to help Iran obtain new agricultural technology and to help Iran's "civil aviation" sector, said foreign diplomats. The U.S. currently refuses to sell anything to Iran and the nation's aging fleet has suffered several fatal crashes and Tehran's air authority routinely is forced to cannibalize parts from one plane to keep another running. Because the U.S. owns the licenses to a number of parts, its endorsement is needed for the sale both of parts and planes manufactured in other countries -- such as Airbus, which is manufactured in France. Technical assistance could also be part of the package, diplomats said.

A full list of incentives has yet to be unveiled and vaguer still are the penalties to which Iran might be subject if it does not accept the deal. It is not clear whether Russia and China, which have assiduously resisted economic sanctions, have changed their opposition to them.

Diplomats in Europe and people close to the Iranian government said they expected Iran to fight the demand that in order to obtain the incentives, it halt altogether its centrifuge operation and stop conversion of uranium yellow cake into uranium gas. Uranium in its gaseous form is what is fed into the centrifuges for enrichment which, when highly enriched, can be used in a bomb.

"It's unlikely they are going to give on that," said a European diplomat in Vienna, noting that the last time Iran halted its centrifuge operation, a number of the delicate machines broke.

For the past two weeks, Iran has not been enriching uranium; its cascade of 164 centrifuges have been spinning without any uranium gas in them, according to diplomats close to the International Atomic Energy Agency. However, when centrifuges are stopped altogether, unless the operation is done carefully, and seals are kept and all gaseous material removed, they can break. It is unclear the reason for the Iranians' pause in enrichment but it could be either for technical reasons while they test other parts of their operation or for political ends.

Furthermore, Iran will almost certainly refuse to halt enrichment before beginning talks, said Iranian commentators -- a precondition of the offer as it is currently formulated.

DOJ_NMG_0032729

Upbeat Iran Finds "Positive Steps" In Offer (WT)

By David R. Sands

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Iran's top negotiator yesterday gave a cautiously upbeat review of a package offered by the United States and five world powers designed to halt Tehran's uranium enrichment program, a package that could allow Iran access to some sensitive U.S. nuclear technology.

In marked contrast to recent defiant comments from Iranian leaders, nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani told a delegation to Tehran headed by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana that the offer "had some positive steps," but added there were still "some ambiguities, which should be removed."

U.S. officials have refused to discuss the incentives being offered Tehran for its cooperation, but diplomats in Europe told the Associated Press they include a new concession by the United States that it would share technology for civilian nuclear programs with Iran if Tehran agrees to stop enriching uranium, a critical step in developing a nuclear bomb.

The Bush administration has led the drive to suspend Iran's enrichment programs, saying they are a cover for a vast nuclear weapons program. Iran claims its extensive research programs are for peaceful uses only.

Iran also would be offered a light-water nuclear reactor and a guaranteed source of fuel for civilian nuclear power if it accepts the international offer. The United States agreed to a similar package in the mid-1990s to North Korea, only to discover years later that Pyongyang had secretly pursued a nuclear bomb program anyway.

President Bush told reporters that Tehran's restrained first reaction to the details of the offer was "positive," but U.S. officials declined to comment on the substance of their offer, saying the diplomacy had reached a particularly sensitive stage.

"We want to give the Iranian government some time to consider what is in this package," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Mr. McCormack declined to comment on whether the United States has offered to share at least some forms of nuclear technology with Iran.

"I've seen a lot of reports flying around the past couple of days about what may or may not be in this package," he said, cautioning that such reports should be taken "with a grain of salt."

Mr. Solana briefed both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier on the Tehran discussions. Mr. Steinmeier said afterward he expected an Iranian answer on the offer by the end of June, when foreign ministers of the Group of Eight nations meet ahead of next month's summit in St. Petersburg.

The package also includes trade and other incentives if Iran cooperates. The United States for the first time has agreed to participate in the multilateral talks, but only if Iran halts all uranium enrichment programs.

Wayne White, a lead Middle East analyst for the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research from 2002 to 2005, said Iran's leaders may still be trying to decide whether Washington is genuinely seeking a deal or just laying the diplomatic groundwork for tougher action.

"There was a hot debate in the United States and Europe over whether this was an offer designed to self-destruct," said Mr. White, now an adjunct scholar at the Washington-based Middle East Institute. "I expect the same debate is going on in Iran."

Najmeh Bozorgmehr, an Iranian scholar at the Brookings Institution's Saban Center for Middle East Policy, said Iran was never likely to reject the package outright because it had been endorsed by both Russia and China.

"If this deal does not work out, Iran may need Russian and Chinese help against even tougher measures," she said.

But Ilan Berman, vice president for policy at the American Foreign Policy Council, said Mr. Larijani's comments about "ambiguities" could be preparing the ground for what U.S. opponents of the Iranian offer say will be endless talks while Iran preserves its nuclear programs.

"That should be setting off alarm bells all over the place," Mr. Berman said.

Iran To Study EU Incentive Plan On Nuclear Issue (FT)

By Gareth Smyth And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, June 7, 2006

Iran said on Tuesday it would study a package of incentives delivered by Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, designed to entice Tehran to curb its nuclear programme.

“The proposals contain positive steps and also some ambiguities, which must be removed,” said Ali Larijani, Iran’s top security official, after a two-hour meeting with Mr Solana.

“We hope we will have negotiations and deliberations again after we have carefully studied the proposals to reach a balanced and logical result.”

DOJ_NMG_0032730

President George W. Bush told reporters in Texas that the initial Iranian response sounded positive. “We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously,” he said, repeating the US offer of joining the negotiations if Iran suspended its uranium enrichment in a verifiable way.

Mr Solana later told Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, on his return to Brussels that his talks in Tehran had been “very useful and constructive”, the State Department said. Mr Solana said the Iranian government had told him it would need time to consider the proposal and that he would be in contact again in the coming days.

The US repeated that Iran had “weeks, not months” to reply.

Mr Solana called Tuesday’s meeting with Mr Larijani “very, very constructive” and said he hoped for “negotiations based on trust, respect and confidence”.

While Iran insists its programme is purely peaceful, the US and the EU suspect Tehran is seeking to acquire a nuclear weapons capacity.

Last week, the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany agreed the package, which focuses on a call for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme.

For many in Tehran, this remains unacceptable. Hussein Shariatmadari, editor-in-chief of the state-owned Kayhan newspaper, told Fars news agency the “main point” of the package ran against Iran’s national interest. “We have already officially and clearly announced we would no way stop uranium enrichment,” he said.

The package has not been publicly revealed but includes trade concessions, help in building nuclear reactors and a guaranteed fuel supply. The US, which said last week it would join multilateral talks if Iran stopped enrichment, has re-portedly revived last year’s offer to lift a ban on the sale of spare parts for Iran’s ageing civilian aircraft which could include components from Boeing and Airbus.

Western diplomats emphasise Iran faces the prospect of “disincentives” should it decide not to suspend enrichment, which can produce weapons-grade material.

Ideas the EU and the US have worked on include travel bans for Iranian officials linked to the country’s nuclear programme and restrictions on Iranian financial institutions’ activities in Europe.

EU officials also highlighted the contrast with the previous time the EU put forward an offer to Iran – in July and August last year.

On that occasion, Tehran immediately rejected the proposed deal as inadequate and moved ahead with its programme. This time, the Europeans hope that the proposal will lead to negotiations rather than to another deadlock.

The current state of play also echoes an EU memo in March that called for a new package to be put to Iran and for the US to consider joining the talks – both suggestions that Washington resisted at the time.

However, while Russia and China have endorsed the package, they are reluctant to back US and European talk of UN sanctions should Iran not suspend uranium enrichment. Additional reporting by Guy Dinmore in Washington

Iran Open To Incentives On Nuclear Talks, With A Hedge (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

TEHRAN, June 6 — Iran on Tuesday welcomed an array of international incentives aimed at persuading the country to freeze crucial nuclear activities, but stressed that there were issues that needed to be resolved before any agreement could be reached.

"We had constructive talks," Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, told state television after meeting with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief. "The proposals contain positive steps and also some ambiguities which should be removed."

He did not elaborate on the ambiguities. But officials with knowledge of the talks in Tehran said they centered on Iran's insistence that it will continue its production of enriched uranium, which can be used to make electricity or weapons.

The offer made by the United States, Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany requires Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment and reprocessing or face an array of possible penalties.

Mr. Larijani is seeking clarifications over the terms, timing and duration of the suspension, the officials added, speaking on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to divulge details.

Clearly both sides were on their best behavior and determined to nudge each other back to the negotiating table. "Neither side wanted to push the other to the brink today," said one senior Iranian official. "There was no real change in the position of either side, but both sides stressed their points of commonality and not their points of contention."

Mr. Solana, who was accompanied by the political directors of the foreign ministries of France, Britain, Germany and Russia, was also cautiously upbeat after he emerged from the glittery headquarters of Iran's Supreme National Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0032731

"The proposal is on the table now," he said before flying to Germany. He added, "We hope that Iranian officials will examine all the aspects carefully, avoid hasty reaction, and reflect on their opinion afterwards."

The package, agreed on in Vienna on Friday, includes specific rewards to Iran like new commercial planes and light-water nuclear reactors if it suspends enrichment and reprocessing activities while talks over the deal are continuing, the officials said. But it does not say just how long the suspension would last, they added.

The United States gave crucial heft to the package by offering to remove certain economic sanctions against Iran that date from more than two decades ago, and to talk directly with Iran if the country agrees to an enrichment freeze.

In Laredo, Tex., President Bush was also upbeat, saying that remarks by Iranian officials sound "like a positive response to me." He repeated his new offer for the United States to "sit down at the table" with the Iranians, but only if "they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way."

Several weeks ago, the administration rejected entreaties by the other powers to give Iran explicit security guarantees that the United States would not intervene politically or militarily in Iran's internal affairs, senior officials involved in the negotiations said. The United States has not ruled out military action against Iran.

Instead, it has committed itself in the incentives package only to support the creation of a vague regional forum to discuss issues of mutual concern, officials said.

The Iranian foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, also welcomed the initiative and said after a separate meeting with Mr. Solana that the talks had "ushered in a new prospect," according to Iran's official IRNA news agency.

But he characterized Iran's enrichment program as solely designed for "research," suggesting that it must be allowed. "What is important in giving the incentives is supporting Iran's rights on research in technology," he said. "This issue should be very clear and without any ambiguity in the negotiations."

Iran is still continuing to enrich uranium at its vast site at Natanz, and Mr. Solana told the Iranians they had only "weeks" to decide whether to accept the offer, officials said.

However, he has not ruled out another meeting or even another trip to Iran, the officials added.

Mr. Larijani indicated that the Iranian side was in no rush to decide, saying, "We hope, after we study the proposal in detail, we will have another round of talks and negotiations to reach a balanced and logical conclusion."

Still, it was striking that both sides characterized the talks in positive terms. And in his brief but temperate public response, Mr. Larijani did not repeat Iran's longstanding position that it would never relinquish what it considers its sovereign right to nuclear energy, nor did he automatically reject any demand for a freeze on its enrichment-related activities.

The crisis over Iran's nuclear program, which Iran insists is for peaceful purposes, reached new urgency in April after Iran announced it had enriched uranium to the low levels needed to fuel a nuclear reactor. But Iran has run into technical difficulties and has made little progress since then, which may make it more willing to slow its program.

France, Germany and Britain announced after the collapse of their 2004 agreement with Iran to freeze its nuclear-related activities that they would be willing to engage in new talks only if Iran returned to a complete freeze of uranium enrichment at Natanz.

The United States is demanding that all enrichment-related activities be suspended before any negotiations start.

So it is unclear what exactly would constitute "negotiations" and whether the Iranians will use talks with Mr. Solana as a way to continue their enrichment activities while seeking even more concessions.

Iran has offered to freeze plans for large-scale enrichment of uranium, which it probably is not technically capable of carrying out. It has tried repeatedly during the negotiations that started in 2003 to continue what it has called "research" involving a limited number of fast-spinning centrifuge machines.

"The trick is to get into a dialogue," said one senior European diplomat involved in the discussions. "Both sides have preconditions for talks and we have to find a way out. We have been asking for suspension of all enrichment-related activities as a precondition for negotiations and that is exactly what they said they cannot do."

U.S. Risks Political Backlash In Iran Nuclear Offer (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A package of U.S-backed incentives presented to Iran includes proposals for wide-ranging civilian nuclear cooperation as well as new trade perks such as allowing Tehran to replace its aging fleet of commercial aircraft.

If Iran is willing to abide by international nuclear rules, the deal also calls for sweeping European involvement in Iran's oil and gas industry and for Iran's "full integration into international structures" such as the World Trade Organization, according to a draft of the package whose contents were confirmed by a senior U.S. official.

DOJ_NMG_0032732

But if Iran refuses to go along, the document says, the international community would adopt "proportionate" punishments ranging from travel bans on high-ranking officials to a possible arms embargo and "a general freeze of assets of Iranian financial institutions."

Some of the nuclear provisions could stir opposition both on Capitol Hill and among conservatives in President Bush's own party.

In their bid to get Tehran to end its uranium-enrichment program and return to multiparty negotiations, the U.S. and its international partners are offering "state of the art" light-water reactor technologies for electricity generation, including components under U.S. patent but built by European companies, according to U.S. officials. The deal put to Iran also promises to provide "a substantive package" of nuclear research and development cooperation.

Under the deal, which the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, presented yesterday to Iranian authorities in Tehran, U.S. officials say they would desist from sanctioning foreign companies that transfer controlled nuclear technology to Iran. The U.S. would also agree, possibly with certain restraints, to allow the sale of certain components containing U.S. technologies. "It's a licensing issue," said one senior Bush administration official.

General Electric Co., for one, could benefit from such an agreement. The company manufactures nuclear reactors, most recently building reactors in Japan and Taiwan. GE is eyeing the market for new reactors in China and India, and is partnering with electric utilities that are looking at building new plants in the U.S., where the market has been dormant for more than two decades.

In a major shift in policy, the Bush administration last week offered to join European-led talks with the Iranian government so long as Iran suspends its uranium-enrichment work.

After meeting with Mr. Solana, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, gave a relatively upbeat assessment that omitted Tehran's usual insistence on its right to enrichment. The international proposals -- presented by the U.S., Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany -- contained "some positive steps in them and some ambiguities which should be removed," he said, adding that Iran was prepared to enter "another round of talks and negotiations to achieve a balanced and logical conclusion."

President Bush yesterday said the reaction from Tehran "sounds like a positive response to me."

Sales of U.S.-licensed nuclear technologies to Iran would almost certainly require changes to U.S. law. Suggestions that the U.S. might be prepared to go down that road drew a quick response from one ardent nuclear opponent, Democratic Rep. Edward Markey of Massachusetts, who said in a statement that "the U.S. is barred from exporting nuclear reactors, nuclear materials or nuclear technology to any country that is a state sponsor of terrorism."

Some conservatives also drew parallels to a similar Clinton administration-led effort to stem North Korea's development of nuclear weapons by agreeing to provide Pyongyang with nuclear fuel and advanced reactor technology. That agreement later fell apart as North Korea moved ahead on developing nuclear warheads. "Having finally killed the reactor deal with Pyongyang, we can't seem to control our urge to cut another similar deal with Iran," said Henry Sokolski, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program.

Critics fear the Iran deal could replicate mistakes the Clinton administration made in cutting its arrangement with North Korea. Under that deal, the U.S. agreed to help North Korea build two light-water reactors in return for Pyongyang giving up its pursuit of plutonium-based nuclear fuel. But in 2002, the Bush administration nixed the deal after U.S. intelligence said North Korea was pursuing a separate clandestine nuclear weapons program using highly-enriched uranium.

Others worry that the new U.S. approach toward Iran is still too incremental and too focused on the nuclear issue to be of much effect. Robert Einhorn, a proliferation expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, argues that the main issues for Iran are prestige and security. And the only way the U.S. can address those, he said, "is for the administration to hold out the possibility of normalized relations with Iran."

Those Were The Days, When Reform Was In Flower (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

TEHRAN — The windowless room was crowded and hot as Mostafa Moin, former reform candidate for president of Iran, worked his way past the folding chairs filled with people applauding his appearance.

Mr. Moin lost his bid for the presidency last year. Actually, he came in fourth, a distant fourth, signaling the collapse of his party, the Islamic Participation Front, once a promising force for change in Iran.

But this was a celebration, marking the day on the Iranian calendar called the Second of Khordad, May 23, when Mohammad Khatami was first elected president in 1997, shocking the status quo and ushering in hope of a kinder, gentler, more democratic Iran. Every year since that historic day, those self-identified as reformers have joined together to celebrate the anniversary.

DOJ_NMG_0032733

But the Khatami era has passed, and now this party sits on the sidelines, celebrating — mourning, actually — in a cramped basement, as elements of a new Iran continue to emerge in many ways in spite of those years, not because of them. In the end, it seems, Mr. Khatami and his conservative opponents had the same end in mind: to preserve the theocratic system.

Many people here are now realizing that real reform in Iran, such as it is, will be driven from the bottom up, slowly, stubbornly, no matter how repressive or punitive the rulers choose to be. It is a cliché, for sure, but the phrase on the lips of weary Iranians in Tehran is "evolution, not revolution." No one seems to have the stomach for starting over again.

The change is glacial in pace but forward moving. Political analysts here say the hard-liners of today are promoting ideas introduced by the reform camp two decades ago.

"It is not possible to make a very big jump," said Emadedin Baghi, director of a prisoners' rights group, who studied religion for many years. "Some reformers thought that they could make a big jump. But it is an evolution that will proceed millimeter by millimeter."

At the party meeting, there was music and poetry reading and upbeat talk about looking to the future, even while every speaker seemed to focus on the past, and the whole thing seemed more like a funeral than a pep rally.

People loitered outside, smoking cigarettes and looking a bit dazed, as though they had just bumped into the former star of the high school baseball team stocking supermarket shelves while telling stories about the glory days gone by.

It was not just Mr. Moin's defeat that shocked the reformers; many sensed that was coming. It was the victory of the un-Khatami, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the tough-talking, Holocaust-denying apparatchik who catapulted from obscurity to become the head of state. Reformers insisted that with his less-than-diplomatic approach to diplomacy and his willingness, perhaps eagerness, to antagonize the West, Mr. Ahmadinejad was going to dial back to the earliest days of the revolution.

But even if that was his plan, Mr. Ahmadinejad has been foiled. There has been a tightening of political speech and a general sense of unease around the country as the West confronts Iran over its nuclear program. But in political terms, Iran's opponents have taken a page from one another's books.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has emerged, at least in words, as a defender of women's rights, trying unsuccessfully to allow them into stadiums for the first time since 1979 and refraining from cracking down on women in relatively revealing dress.

For their part, the remnants of the Islamic Participation Front have begun to follow Mr. Ahmadinejad's lead, suggesting that he understood the electorate far better than they did. After recoiling from public life, the reformers have set aside their lofty talk of religious democracy and social freedoms and are instead focusing on the issues that have come to define the president: security, the economy and nuclear development.

"I am looking to the future," insisted Abdullah Ramezanzadeh, Mr. Khatami's former spokesman, as he hurried off after his speech. Asked why there was no talk of democracy or social freedoms during the anniversary, but instead a heavy emphasis on the economy and security, he said, "The public is looking for something like this now."

Yet speaker after speaker said everything was better under the Khatami administration. And they suggested that they would return to power not because of new ideas, but because the new president would ultimately fail on his bread-and-butter programs.

Even on the nuclear confrontation, Mr. Ahmadinejad's signature issue, the reformers said, his combative approach has actually diminished the chances of opening a nuclear power plant anytime soon because of international hostility to Iran.

"We ran the nuclear policy to a very proud spot," said Mohsen Aminzadeh, a former special envoy of President Khatami's. "This policy was damaged, and we hope there will be no more damage done."

But if the reformers are hoping to return to power, they may want to consider plain old pothole politics. It may be a lesson, too, for Mr. Ahmadinejad, as his public waits for him to deliver on his campaign promises of jobs and low-cost bank loans. The reformers still talked at this meeting about participatory democracy; Mr. Ahmadinejad likes to talk about enriching uranium.

Hamid Shahrabi is waiting for a bank loan, and a job.

"I helped Ahmadinejad for 15 days, putting up posters during his campaign," said Mr. Shahrabi, 33, who lives with his wife and two small children in one small, unfurnished room in East Tehran. "But it was no use. Nothing happened for me."

Mr. Shahrabi said he had already given up on clerics, like Mr. Khatami, and had thought that by campaigning for Mr. Ahmadinejad he might at least qualify for a low-cost loan that would help reduce his $14 a month rent, which he has trouble paying. His only source of income is ferrying passengers on his scooter around the traffic-choked streets of Tehran.

His bank loan was denied three times and, for the moment, he has lost faith in the system, but he is open to anyone who will actually help him find a job, pay his medical bills and buy him a chair to sit in.

When asked to identify Iran's primary problem, he replied, "It's the leadership."

Bush Worried About Instability In Somalia (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0032734

AP, June 7, 2006

President Bush expressed concern on Tuesday that volatile conditions in Somalia could lead al-Qaida to use it as a staging ground to plan attacks.

"There's instability in Somalia," Bush said in Texas where he was traveling. "The first concern, of course, is to make sure that Somalia does not become an al-Qaida safe haven — it doesn't become a place from which terrorists can plot and plan."

Bush said he talked on Monday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about the instability in Somalia where Islamic militiamen have claimed control of Mogadishu, the capital.

"We're watching very carefully the developments there, and we will strategize more when I get back to Washington as to how to best respond to the latest incident there in Somalia," Bush said.

In Washington, the State Department rejected widespread media reports that U.S. policy in Somalia has suffered a severe setback with the militant Islamic group's takeover in Mogadishu.

The situation in Mogadishu is "very fluid" and has been for years, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Without offering specifics on the nature of U.S. activities in Somalia, McCormack said the United States has a strong interest in fighting foreign terrorists in the Horn of Africa.

He recalled that al-Qaida chieftain Osama bin Laden sought refuge a decade ago in Sudan, located to the west of Somalia, before heading for Afghanistan.

Somalia's Islamic Extremists Set U.S. Back (AP)

By Chris Tomlinson

AP, June 6, 2006

The success of Islamic extremists fighting for control of Somalia's capital is an important setback in the U.S. war on terrorism, with the defeat of a counterterrorism alliance providing hope for militants elsewhere in the region.

Somalia's location in the Horn of Africa and its role as a cultural bridge with the Middle East gives the country strategic importance, so much so that the United States has posted troops in neighboring Djibouti to try to prevent terror groups from taking hold in the Horn of Africa.

But U.S. efforts to influence chaotic, clan-riven Somalia have consistently fallen flat, sometimes with deadly results. The United States has not carried out any direct action in Somalia since the deaths of 18 servicemen there on a humanitarian mission in a 1993 battle in Mogadishu depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

Islamic radicals seized control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, on Monday, defeating U.S.-backed warlords in weeks of fighting that left more than 330 people dead.

Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, U.S. officials have expressed concerns that Somalia could become a haven for terrorists, a concern State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeated on Monday.

"We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia, and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia," McCormack said in Washington.

A U.S. official told The Associated Press recently that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering three al-Qaida leaders indicted in the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The same al-Qaida cell is believed responsible for the 2002 suicide bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya, which killed 15 people, and a simultaneous attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner over Kenya.

Now men willing to shelter al-Qaida suspects have established their authority, if limited to Mogadishu.

The U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, confirmed the U.S. was cooperating with the secular warlords to capture the men. But the warlords took that narrow goal and turned it into a bid to defeat the Islamic leaders who had within two years developed the most powerful militia in Somalia.

The Islamic extremists — some of whom had contacts with al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden in the 1990s — had co-opted an Islamic court system that provided the only means of justice since Somalia's last effective central government collapsed in 1991.

The Islamic Courts Union portrayed itself to a war-weary public as a neutral, religious organization capable of bringing peace and prosperity. The union's leaders condemned the warlords for being responsible for 16 years of chaos and anarchy and rejected a U.N.-backed government formed in Kenya as being too secular and not authentically Somali.

When the warlords formed the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism, the Islamic leaders immediately dismissed it as the work of U.S. agents, who were often seen visiting the alliance's leaders.

Appealing to Somali nationalism, while exploiting public hatred for the warlords and anti-American sentiment common among Muslims across East Africa, the Islamic leaders garnered widespread support.

DOJ_NMG_0032735

Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Court Union, told supporters on Tuesday that his group would continue fighting until all of Somalia falls under the union's authority. The courts have already made alliances with rebels from outside of Somalia to accomplish their goal.

Residents of Mogadishu, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal, have reported seeing hundreds of non-Somali militia — including non-Africans — fighting alongside the Islamic forces. At least 600 Ethiopian rebels from the predominantly Muslim Oromo National Liberation Front have been seen manning checkpoints in Mogadishu.

The Oromo "share the Muslim faith with Somalis and if someone convinced them that this revolution in Somalia will eventually become an Islamic state across the whole region, including the Oromo region of Ethiopia, they will think it is worth fighting for," said Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., a hub of expatriate Somalis.

There are Islamic extremist elements in Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania and Eritrea, all watching what is happening in Somalia and how the United States reacts.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Ahmed said in a radio broadcast Monday in a veiled reference to the United States and its proxies.

McCormack has said the United States will back the U.N.-sponsored Somali government, now residing in Baidoa, 140 miles northwest of Mogadishu.

Whether that government can defeat or co-opt Islamic radicalism in Somalia is the key question.

Protesters Rally To Challenge Islamists In Somalia (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

New York Times, June 7, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, June 6 — Tensions remained high in Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, on Tuesday, as the Islamic militants who seized control of the city the day before vowed to set up a religious state, while thousands of protesters allied with one of the country's largest clans pledged to challenge the effort.

The warlords who have been pushed from their strongholds in Mogadishu said they would fight back against the Islamists, said news agency reports from the capital.

Bashir Rageh, a warlord who lost control of a key airstrip and port in March, and Muse Sudi Yalahow, another important Mogadishu leader who has lost ground to the Islamic militias, joined thousands of their backers from the Abgal clan at a stadium north of the capital to denounce the Islamic courts and militias that have taken the city.

"Our clan has agreed to defend our land, and we will fight the courts hiding under the cloak of Islam and trying to fool our people," said Mr. Rageh, who was protected by heavily armed security men.

As the protesters rallied, the leaders of the alliance of Islamic courts insisted in a letter to American officials and other diplomats that they were not hiding terrorists, as the United States has claimed, and instead were seeking friendly relations with the outside world.

In the letter, Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, the alliance that control the militias, accused Americans of fueling the fierce fighting in Mogadishu by backing the warlords who he said have terrorized the country for the last 15 years.

An array of Africa analysts, academics and Somali politicians said Washington had made financial payments to the warlords in recent months in an effort to root out members of Al Qaeda who American officials contend are being sheltered inside Mogadishu by the Islamists.

"We categorically deny and reject any accusation that we are harboring any terrorists or supporters of terrorism in the areas where the courts operate," the sheik wrote.

He welcomed visitors to Mogadishu, which has long been considered too unsafe for international diplomats, to see whether terrorists are operating there. "We have nothing to hide from the international community," he said.

In Washington, a senior Bush administration official said the administration was willing to take the letter at face value. "If they're going to be a credible, legitimate political actor, and not support Al Qaeda and terrorism, then we'd encourage the transitional government to work with them," said the official, who could not be identified because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the issue.

Some critics argued that American efforts in Somalia did not add up to a coherent policy, and that recent events had caught policy makers off guard. "The problem is that we don't have any strategy at all," said Sen. Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat who is the Senate's leading expert on Somalia. "We weren't even paying attention."

Sheik Sharif Ahmed mentioned nothing in the letter about his plans for turning Somalia into an Islamic state, but he raised the topic at a gathering of hundreds of supporters in Mogadishu on Tuesday. "Until we get the Islamic state, we will continue with the Islamic struggle in Somalia," he said, according to news agency reports.

DOJ_NMG_0032736

Also left unaddressed by the sheik was whether the Islamic court leaders would work with the new transitional government that is operating in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu.

The counter-rally, which was held about a mile from positions held by Islamic militias, underscored the challenges that the new rulers of the capital would face in consolidating power after 15 years of anarchy there. Clan allegiance has long been the most powerful force in Somalia, trumping religion. By rallying the Abgal clan, opponents of the Islamists have sought to redefine the conflict.

Our Failure In Somalia (WP)

By John Prendergast

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

It was before "Black Hawk Down," before Somalia became the only country in the world without a government, that I took my first trip there. It changed my life. This was in the mid-1980s, when the United States was underwriting a warlord dictator in support of our Cold War interests, at the clear expense of basic human rights. As a young, wide-eyed activist-in-training, I couldn't accept the idea that my government would use defenseless Somali civilians as pawns on its strategic chessboard -- in a strategy that ultimately produced only state collapse, civil war and famine.

Twenty years later the enemy has changed, but the plot is hauntingly similar. In recent trips to the capital, Mogadishu, I have seen evidence of U.S. support to warlord militia leaders in the name of counterterrorism operations. Since the beginning of the year, pitched battles between U.S.-backed warlords and Islamist militias in Mogadishu have claimed hundreds of lives and displaced thousands of families.

Now "our" warlords -- and by extension our counterterrorism strategy -- have been dealt a crushing defeat by the Islamists, as the latter have consolidated control of Mogadishu. Our short-term interest in locating al-Qaeda suspects has thus been undermined, and the risk of a new safe haven being created for international terrorists has been greatly increased.

The statelessness in Somalia has already been allowing al-Qaeda and other destructive forces to operate there. The president of a neighboring country told me recently that the "governance vacuum is growing larger, with very negative implications for Somalia. It increases the potential for international terrorists to use the structures that are filling the vacuum for safe haven and logistical purposes."

It was partly from Somali soil that al-Qaeda organized and carried out two serious terrorist attacks, in Kenya and Tanzania, against U.S. embassies and a foreign-owned hotel, and narrowly missed bringing down an Israeli passenger jet with two surface-to-air missiles. A plot to crash an airplane into the U.S. Embassy in Kenya was foiled. "Soft" targets are legion throughout East Africa, and intelligence indicates that new attacks are being planned.

Somalia is an al-Qaeda recruiter's dream -- with rampant unemployment, travel restrictions, and no government or foreign investment -- and young Somalis will turn to terrorism for money and, occasionally, because of shared ideology. Schools run by Islamic charities are graduating large numbers of students, many of whom are being taught in Arabic instead of Somali and who have no prospect of meaningful work. Drug dealers and militias looking to restart conflict over economic interests find easy recruits, further destabilizing the area and sowing the seeds of radicalism.

The U.S. counterterrorism approach in Somalia isn't working: The al-Qaeda leaders sought by the United States there remain at large, and the Islamists who protect them are gaining ground against U.S.-backed militias, as this week's events show. With a growing chorus of voices, rightly or wrongly, blaming the United States and the warlords for the fighting, public opinion in Mogadishu has been swinging in favor of the Islamists.

In April the United States tried a different tack, inviting clan and political leaders to Kenya for talks and to enlist their support in dismantling the al-Qaeda safe haven. But fighting broke out as soon as the leaders returned to Mogadishu, making it seem as though one hand of the U.S. government didn't know what the other was doing.

A successful counterterrorism effort would require the United States to pull the political and military threads together into a coherent strategy of broader engagement. U.S. officials and those from other governments throughout the region uniformly have told me that long-term counterterrorism objectives can be achieved only by American investment in the Somali peace process. Yet the State Department has just one full-time political officer working on Somalia -- from neighboring Kenya, and he was just transferred out of the region for dissenting from the policy on proxy warlords. Somalia's ineffectual transitional government remains confined to the shaky central town of Baidoa, where it is still struggling to overcome internal divisions.

A functioning government that could ensure security would be a win-win scenario for Somalis and the United States, enabling the state apparatus to address the criminality and extremism that undermine progress in the country. This would provide a real partner for the war on terrorism in an area that has a track record for exporting trouble.

The continuation of Washington's current approach in Somalia would ensure that U.S. interests and those of other countries in the region remain dangerously vulnerable to terrorist attacks from this collapsed state. Continued fighting between

DOJ_NMG_0032737

Islamist elements and the U.S.-backed warlord alliance will breed resentment, attract recruits to the extremist cause and provide a training ground for new militants. The United States can no longer afford not to engage more deeply and directly in state reconstruction efforts in Somalia. It is in our national security interest to do so.

The writer is a senior adviser to the International Crisis Group. He worked for the National Security Council during the Clinton administration.

Somalia, Revisited (NYT)

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Terrorist groups linked to Al Qaeda may just have won a new foothold in the strategic Horn of Africa, as radical Islamist militias captured Somalia's capital, Mogadishu.

The immediate concern among many Somalis is a forcible imposition of harsh Islamic law, Taliban style. The larger international concern is that Mogadishu's new rulers may follow the Taliban's example in another way, sheltering international terrorist operations in a region within tempting striking distance of vulnerable countries on the Arabian peninsula and in East Africa.

The Bush administration wasn't exactly caught looking the other way. But with more than 130,000 American troops tied down in Iraq and some 20,000 more in Afghanistan, and with America's reputation in the Islamic world driven to an all-time low, Washington's ability to respond effectively to a very real danger was severely compromised.

For want of better options, the United States had thrown its support to a different set of warlords with few visible merits beyond their willingness to fight their Islamist rivals. But by some accounts, Washington's support for these warlords only discredited them in the eyes of many Somalis.

The parallels to Afghanistan when the Taliban took power in 1996 are uncanny, and frightening. The sequel, however, does not have to turn out quite as horribly. Mogadishu's new masters claim to be interested mainly in establishing peace, stability and Islamic rule at home. They insist that they are willing to talk with anybody, which at least raises a possibility that they could be talked out of sheltering international terrorists.

With good luck, perhaps a new battlefront with international terrorism may yet be avoided. Luck, however, is no substitute for a more supple and effective American strategy against a highly mobile foe like multinational Islamist terrorism. Washington needs to develop more agile responses of its own. It especially has to avoid getting drawn into quagmires that force it to fight on the terrorists' terms and timetable.

Abbas Extends Hamas Deadline On Israel (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, June 6, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas stepped back from a political showdown with his Hamas rivals, giving the Islamic militants several days to recognize Israel or face the voters in a referendum on the idea.

Abbas, a moderate, has been pushing the Hamas-led government to accept a proposal that calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel, implicitly recognizing the Jewish state. Abbas believes the plan will help lift the economic pressure on the Palestinians and allow him to pursue peace talks with Israel.

Hamas, which is sworn to Israel's destruction, has balked at the plan, demanding changes in the language, calling for more time to discuss it and saying it won't give in to deadlines.

"We are giving enough time, about three days, for our brothers in Hamas to reconsider their position," said Yasser Abed Rabbo, a top official of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Abbas also heads.

Hamas officials welcomed Abbas' offer to extend their dialogue but repeated their opposition to deadlines on the referendum.

Abbas initially gave Hamas until Tuesday to accept the plan. Officials said Abbas agreed to the delay at the request of unspecified Arab leaders.

Although a referendum would be nonbinding, a vote could deeply embarrass Hamas, putting public pressure on the group to moderate its violent ideology.

A new survey released Tuesday showed 77 percent of Palestinians would vote in favor of the proposal. The survey of 1,200 Palestinians was conducted by Bir Zeit University in the West Bank and had a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

Abbas' Fatah movement says the president will not accept amendments.

The delay gave Hamas some breathing room as it struggled with a devastating international economic boycott and increasingly bloody tensions with Fatah.

DOJ_NMG_0032738

In the latest violence, a battle erupted early Wednesday between Hamas and Fatah forces in Gaza City. Hospital officials said one person was seriously wounded by gunfire.

On Tuesday, rocket-propelled grenades were fired at the pro-Fatah Preventive Security compound in the Gaza Strip, wounding three maintenance workers, officials said. Fatah officials accused Hamas of being behind the attack. Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas called the incident "regrettable" and urged restraint by all sides.

Meanwhile, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at a street in northern Gaza and at a building in Gaza City early Wednesday, witnesses said. No one was hurt.

Witnesses said the street targeted was a launching area for rockets aimed at Israel. Less than an hour earlier, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at a facility of the militant Popular Resistance Committees in Gaza City. The PRC claimed responsibility for firing nine rockets at an Israeli town on Tuesday.

Later Israeli aircraft fired three more missiles at empty fields, residents said. Israel often targets launching areas in northern Gaza with artillery and air strikes.

Palestinian officials said the referendum would be held about 45 days after an announcement by Abbas.

"We still have a chance to make this dialogue a success," Haniyeh said in Gaza. "Therefore we ask for more meetings and more dialogue and that we don't use the language of days and time as a threat."

The Palestinian plan was formulated by senior Hamas and Fatah prisoners held by Israel. Prisoners hold great weight in Palestinian society.

Israel opposes key elements of the 18-point document, but is staying on the sidelines during the internal Palestinian debate. At the same time, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is making a series of trips abroad to discuss policy.

After visiting the U.S. and Egypt, Olmert is to visit Jordan on Thursday for talks with King Abdullah II, both countries said. A Jordanian official said the king would try to persuade Olmert to drop his plan to set Israel's border unilaterally if talks with the Palestinians fail.

Exiled Hamas leader Mousa Abu-Marzouk told the AP by phone that his group had "accepted" an invitation by President Ali Abdullah Saleh of Yemen to top Hamas and Fatah representatives to continue talks on the prisoners' plan in Yemen.

Abbas politely declined the offer, according officials close to the president.

Abbas has been involved in an increasingly bloody power struggle with Hamas since the Islamists defeated Fatah in legislative elections early this year. Sixteen people have been killed in clashes between the sides in recent weeks. Abbas was elected separately last year.

The financial crisis has left the government unable to pay the salaries of tens of thousands of civil servants. Israeli military officials said Hamas nonetheless has managed to smuggle hundreds of thousands of dollars into the Gaza Strip in recent weeks.

The money has enabled Hamas to sustain key operations, including charitable activities and operations of its new 3,000-member security force, the officials said.

Asked about the smuggling, government spokesman Ghazi Hamad did not deny it.

"We will look for money everywhere and every place. That is our right," he told Israel's Army Radio, in Hebrew.

US Welcomes Abbas Referendum Proposal (AFP-Y2)

AFP, June 6, 2006

The White House welcomed Palestinian Authority president Mahmud Abbas' call for holding a referendum on implicitly recognizing Israel.

"Abbas has demonstrated that he's somebody who wants to work toward a two-state solution" to the Middle East conflict, spokesman Tony Snow told reporters.

"I think it's important for Palestinians to wrestle with the issue of whether they want to have a two state solution," he said, referring to a US-backed effort to build a Palestinian state at peace with Israel.

Abbas was headed for a showdown with the Hamas government after winning the green light Tuesday to hold the referendum despite fierce opposition from the militant group, which argued that more time was needed for talks to resolve deep differences with Abbas's own Fatah faction.

Azzam al-Ahmed, an aide of the Palestinian leader who has played a key role in cross-party crisis talks over the last 10 days, said Abbas would announce the date of the referendum in a decree on Thursday.

Abbas spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina said a date for the referendum would be declared within 48 hours -- still leaving open the possibility of a last-minute compromise. Polling would take place 40 days after the announcement, he added.

However, there was little expectation that Hamas is about to change its tune, although a new poll showed the vast majority of Palestinians both back Abbas's call for a referendum and intend to vote in favour of a document first drawn up by a cross-party group of senior militants held in Israeli prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0032739

"We're just going to have to wait and see what happens, whether he's able to have a referendum and what happens," Snow said as US President George W. Bush traveled here to push his immigration reform plans.

The document at the centre of the referendum calls for a national unity government, an end to attacks in Israel and the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel on land conquered by the Jewish state in 1967.

Such a blueprint would undercut Hamas's long-time platform of refusing to recognise Israel or disavow the use of violence even within the Jewish state's borders.

Abbas Delays Setting Date For Referendum (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 6 - Facing political and practical challenges, Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas gave Hamas more time Tuesday to endorse the creation of a future state on all territory occupied by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war before he sets a date for a referendum on the issue.

Abbas's decision to give Hamas until Friday to accept a two-state solution to the conflict, something the radical Islamic movement has rejected since its creation nearly two decades ago, comes in the midst of rising factional tensions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. A morning mortar attack on the Palestinian preventative security headquarters in Gaza wounded six people, including four officers.

But the delay also reflects the logistical difficulties Abbas would face in staging a referendum that Hamas, now running the Palestinian Authority's day-to-day operations, opposes in principle. Hamas officials have warned that they would not allow the vote to proceed, even though it could give them cover to moderate their hard-line position toward Israel at a time when foreign donors are demanding they do so in return for future aid.

Abbas -- who in addition to being president of the Palestinian Authority is head of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Fatah movement -- met for several hours Tuesday in the West Bank city of Ramallah with the PLO executive committee, which voted to give him the authority to hold the vote.

But he told the committee that he would wait three days before setting a date to allow Hamas more time to endorse what is known as the prisoners' document, an 18-point declaration of principles signed last month by the leaders of Hamas, Fatah and other Palestinian factions being held in Israeli jails.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, a member of the committee, told reporters in Ramallah that "before the end of the week, President Abbas will hold a news conference to announce the holding of the referendum and the beginning of the process for carrying it out." But Abed Rabbo also said negotiations with Hamas would continue even after the date is set, saying the vote could be canceled up until the last moment.

The main element of the prisoners' document calls for the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem. Israel still occupies those areas, although it evacuated troops and settlers from Gaza last year. Hamas calls for a Palestinian state across territory that includes Israel, while Abbas favors its creation alongside the Jewish state.

With opinion polls showing broad support for the proposal, Abbas is hoping that a nonbinding vote on the matter will provide a clear expression of Palestinian desires for a peaceful resolution to the conflict and help revive negotiations with Israel.

A Bir Zeit University poll released Tuesday showed that 77 percent of those questioned would vote in favor of the prisoners' document, which demands internal Palestinian political reforms, the creation of a national unity government, the freeing of Palestinian prisoners and the right of refugees to return to their homes. The document also calls for armed and political opposition to the Israeli occupation to be focused in the territories, rather than inside Israel.

"At the end of the day, we are heading toward a vote," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah legislator and the chief Palestinian negotiator with Israel. Abbas "must go back to the people if he wants to avoid chaos in the streets. I think the only option now, even if the date was not set today, is for the Palestinians to vote."

Foreign donors suspended most aid to the Palestinian Authority following Hamas's victory over Fatah in January elections that brought the Islamic movement into government for the first time.

Israel also froze the monthly transfer of roughly $55 million in tax revenue it collects for the Palestinian government, an amount equal to nearly half its monthly payroll. Most of the authority's more than 150,000 employees have not been paid in three months, and unemployment and poverty rates are climbing in the territories.

But Abbas has declined to exercise his authority to fire Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a Hamas leader, for refusing to endorse a two-state solution, renounce violence and accept previously signed agreements that implicitly recognize the Jewish state's right to exist. Instead he has chosen the referendum to challenge Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement.

DOJ_NMG_0032740

Hamas's imprisoned leaders play an important role in the movement's collective decision-making, along with leaders in exile and those inside the territories. While Hamas's more hard-line exile leadership rejected the document, Haniyeh and others in the government called it a starting point for discussion.

But Hamas prisoners called Tuesday for Abbas to cancel plans for a referendum and allow talks to continue between the two main Palestinian political movements. The six-point statement, posted on the Hamas Web site, states that the vote would be illegal and could cause more bloodshed.

"There's an opportunity for the success of the national dialogue," Haniyeh said after the three-day delay was announced to allow more time for talks. "But we reject the threat of using" deadlines.

Earlier in the day, three 60mm mortar shells were fired at the Palestinian preventative security service headquarters in Gaza. The attack wounded the four Palestinian officers and two maintenance workers.

Also Tuesday morning, Palestinian gunmen fired at least five rockets at the southern Israeli city of Sderot, including one that smashed into a home and another that landed near a school. One Israeli woman was wounded by shrapnel. Sderot's mayor warned the Israeli government that he would evacuate the city if the military did not stop the rocket fire.

Indonesian Scolds U.S. On Terrorism Fight (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

New York Times, June 7, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, June 6 — Indonesia's defense minister warned the Bush administration on Tuesday that its approach to fighting terrorism was perceived as overbearing, and that the United States needed to be sensitive to local concerns.

"It's best that you leave the main responsibility of antiterrorist measures to the local government in question, and not be too overly insistent about immediate results arising from your perception about terrorists," the minister, Juwono Sudarsono, told reporters as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld stood nearby.

"It's important to us because, as the world's largest Muslim country, we are very aware of the perception, or misperception, that the United States is overbearing and overpresent and overwhelming in every sector of life in many nations and cultures," he added.

Mr. Rumsfeld arrived here Tuesday to help build the United States' newly restored ties with the Indonesian military. American military aid was gradually phased out after Indonesian security forces fired on civilians who were protesting Indonesian rule in East Timor in 1991.

In rebuilding ties with the Indonesian military, the Bush administration has said it is not only solidifying relations with an ally in its campaign against terrorist groups, but also reinforcing the importance of respecting human rights.

"The U.S. has established fully normal relations, with military-to-military relations with Indonesia," said Mr. Rumsfeld, who met with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono; Widodo Adi Sutjipto, a senior minister for security issues; and Mr. Sudarsono.

Some American lawmakers complain, however, that Indonesian officials who were linked to the abuses in East Timor have not been held accountable.

On Tuesday, it was the Indonesians who were free with their advice. One important lesson, Mr. Sudarsono said, was that the United States needed to be attuned to local concerns. Then the minister took the unusual step of repeating the counsel he had given Mr. Rumsfeld in a room packed with Indonesian and Western journalists.

"So I was telling the secretary just recently, just two minutes ago, that your powerful economy and your powerful military does lend to misperception and a sense of threat by many groups right across the world, not just in Indonesia," Mr. Sudarsono said.

Mr. Sudarsono's remarks prompted a quick reply by Mr. Rumsfeld, who insisted he had been sensitive to other nations' concerns from the start. "I have never indicated to any country that they should do something that they were uncomfortable doing," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The discussion over political perceptions had affected deliberations over one of the Bush administration's major efforts: the Proliferation Security Initiative, which calls for an international arrangement that would enable the United States and its allies to search cargo ships suspected of transporting biological, chemical and nuclear arms, as well as the missiles to deliver them.

The aim of the initiative, announced in 2003, is to keep unconventional weapons and their components out of the hands of terrorist groups and so-called rogue states. But the Indonesian government has been wary, perhaps because it wants to reinforce its claims over nearby waterways, or because it is concerned about public opinion regarding efforts to collaborate with the Bush administration.

Indonesia's Foreign Ministry bluntly rejected the initiative as a threat to Indonesian sovereignty when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice raised it in a March visit here.

DOJ_NMG_0032741

Mr. Sudarsono was somewhat more supportive. In his closed-door meeting with Mr. Rumsfeld, he indicated that the proposal would be studied, and suggested that Indonesia would be willing to carry out some of the activities that are called for under the plan.

Yet at the news conference, Mr. Sudarsono gave a starker assessment, suggesting that the plan might be carried out only if it was limited in scope. "Perhaps we can agree on a limited framework of cooperation on an ad hoc basis.," he said.

Those comments caught Mr. Rumsfeld's team by surprise. It was not immediately clear whether Mr. Sudarsono was trying to balance domestic political considerations with his efforts to work with the Americans, or if there was a more fundamental difference between the sides.

"Some Indonesian analysts view the United States as focused on the 'search and destroy' aspect of the war against terror, and feel that the United States has not focused sufficient attention to winning the 'hearts and minds' aspect of the struggle," according to a study by the Congressional Research Service.

In resuming American military assistance, the initial emphasis is to improve the Indonesian military's mobility, by providing spare parts for C-130 aircraft and helping to upgrade naval patrol vessels. The Indonesians have also indicated that they are submitting requests for parts for the F-16 warplanes in their arsenal.

A senior American military official said the Pentagon wanted to improve the ability of the Indonesian military to carry out disaster relief operations, to conduct joint operations with the United States, and to secure the Strait of Malacca and other waterways.

War Game Finds Two-week Capability (WT)

By Richard Halloran

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

TAIPEI -- Taiwan could fend off a concerted attack by China for at least two weeks before it would need help from the United States, according to the results of an unprecedented high-level exercise.

For the first time, the Ministry of National Defense ran the weeklong war game for President Chen Shui-bian of the Republic of China and other political leaders in April to test their ability to respond to a military assault from the mainland.

Mr. Chen, Prime Minister Su Tseng-chang, Defense Minister Lee Jye and other Cabinet ministers participated in the exercise, wrestling with a simulated missile attack that severely damaged the island's financial communications.

They sought continuity in government when several leaders were killed or wounded. They mobilized the armed forces to repel an amphibious invasion from the mainland.

"We could defend our country by ourselves for at least two weeks if we were attacked by the [People's Republic of China]," said Abe C. Lin, the ministry's director of strategic planning, referring to the outcome of the exercise and intelligence assessments.

The findings are important to the United States: Under the Taiwan Relations Act, often cited by the Bush administration as the basis for the U.S. posture on Taiwan, the United States would be obliged in most circumstances to come to the island's aid.

Two weeks would give the U.S. ample time to get forces to the Taiwan Strait, especially after plans for a military buildup on Guam have been completed. Three submarines, which would be vital to disrupting an amphibious assault, are there, and more are coming.

U.S. officials have been in what one called "a grumpy mood" toward Taipei over what they have seen as a provocative posture toward China and a failure to complete an $18 billion arms purchase from the United States.

Bush administration officials have suggested that Taiwan is unwilling to defend itself and relies too much on the United States to prevent it from being seized by China, which claims sovereignty over the island.

Civilian officials and military officers in Taiwan argue vigorously that the characterization is unfair. "We have never thought that we would get a free ride from the U.S. We have never planned to rely only on U.S. forces in our defense," Mr. Lin said.

He and several colleagues pointed to the lessons learned from the war game; to Taiwan's first comprehensive national security strategy report, issued in May; to planned increases in defense spending; to forthcoming cuts in military personnel to free funds for investment in weapons; and to a national mobilization law adopted in 2004.

They acknowledged, however, that Taiwan needed to "harden" more of its communications apparatus. The security report called for setting up a hot line between Taipei and Beijing to preclude miscalculation.

Polls suggest that Taiwan's residents are eager, maybe even desperate, to avoid war with China. A survey by the Mainland Affairs Council, which oversees Taiwan's relations with China, found that 88.6 percent of respondents wanted a continuation of the status quo. Only a few chose either independence, which could prompt an attack, or unification with China.

Against this backdrop, the U.S. Pacific Command in Hawaii has been quietly strengthening military ties with Taiwan at the same time it executes the Bush administration's policy of engaging China through exchanges of visits by senior officers.

DOJ_NMG_0032742

Retired Adm. Dennis Blair, a former Pacific commander, has visited Taiwan annually for the past several years to offer advice on a large Taiwanese military exercise. Defense attaches at the American Institute in Taiwan, the de facto U.S. embassy, are serving officers rather than retired officers on contract. Pacific Command officers regularly visit to confer with counterparts.

Even so, Taiwanese military officers and defense officials expressed misgivings about the U.S. engagement with China, saying they fear the United States might succumb to Chinese pressure or cajolery.

"We support [Pacific commander Adm. William Fallon's] policy of engagement," said a Taiwanese admiral, "so long as it is not at our expense."

The chief spokesman for Adm. Fallon, Capt. W. Jeffrey Alderson, said in response to a query: "No one loses here. Our efforts at engagement and transparency are intended to avoid miscalculations and thus maintain peace and stability in the region."

US Values Push Alienates Muslim Women (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Muslim women are potentially important allies in the war on terrorism, but the United States must avoid pushing Western values to win their support, according to data presented yesterday at the Gallup Organization.

The Bush administration has promoted women's rights throughout the Muslim world to gain support in the region, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan. But a worldwide Gallup project found that many Muslim women are not as concerned about changing their status as Westerners might think.

In Lebanon and Turkey, 9 percent to 11 percent of women said sexual inequality was a major problem, but negligible concern about the issue was found elsewhere. Jordanian women did not mention it when asked what aspects of society they disliked, and 2 percent of women cited the issue in Egypt and Morocco.

Far more often, Muslim women were worried about the same things as Muslim men -- lack of unity, extremism and political corruption.

Dalia Mogahed, a Gallup Organization analyst, said a majority of men and women expressed opposition to extremism and terrorism and said they were conscious of the rights that women deserved. The key, she said, is how the United States approaches the issue.

"The imposition of Western values alienates both men and women, because it is strongly associated with colonialism, like the British policies of unveiling in Egypt," Mrs. Mogahed said.

"Westerners need to understand how to reach Muslim women through their own value systems, by using the positive aspects of their own beliefs to encourage increased rights."

Mrs. Mogahed noted that Muslim women admired women's legal rights in Western countries, but thought that Western society degrades women by tolerating pornography and encouraging promiscuity. Muslim women do not want to adopt Western values because they think moral decay is present in these societies, she said.

Andrea Rugh, an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute, said in a telephone interview: "We need to understand that we have very different concepts of rights than Muslims do.

"In the Muslim world, the focus is on the role within the group, not the individual. A Muslim man will receive more of an inheritance than a woman, for example, but the woman has the right to be taken care of by a man."

Another aspect of the Gallup project highlighted this lack of understanding between the two cultures. When interviewers asked Americans what they most admired about Muslim societies, more than 50 percent answered "Nothing" or "I don't know."

Ms. Rugh said too many Americans rely on outdated information about the Muslim world and have difficulty understanding how those societies work.

"When I worked with Afghan women after the fall of the Taliban, they often said that they didn't understand why we wanted them to go out and work," she said.

"Most of them were not educated, so work meant construction work or hard labor. Improvement in the education system for both males and females should be the focus here, not imposition of our model of right."

Peru's New President Looks To Renegotiate Trade Pact With U.S. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

LIMA, Peru -- Peruvian President-elect Alan García said he expects to renegotiate a free-trade agreement with the U.S. that was signed by the outgoing president in April but has yet to be ratified. He said he would revise the agreement line by line.

The agreement "is just a first draft, which can be improved and broadened if this government decides to approve it," Mr. García said. He suggested the pact should include language to discourage the import of subsidized U.S. crops.

DOJ_NMG_0032743

Mr. García, whose 1985-90 presidency ended in economic ruin, won't have a majority in Congress when he takes office on July 28, and will have to work with smaller parties to advance his legislative agenda. Mr. García's Apra party won 36 seats in the 120-seat unicameral legislature that also takes office in July. The alliance of defeated presidential candidate Ollanta Humala gained 45 seats in the April 9 general elections.

In a news conference, Mr. García, 57 years old, suggested he would keep Washington at arm's length. He recalled that he had angered the U.S. and international lenders by unilaterally limiting debt payments during his first term. He had also railed against the U.S. for its 1989 invasion of Panama and its intervention in Nicaragua.

Mr. García said that though he had received congratulatory phone calls from many world leaders, he hadn't heard from President Bush.

US Tries To Keep Seat From Caracas (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

The United States is urging Latin American nations to deny Venezuela a seat on the U.N. Security Council when the region chooses a replacement for the rotating seat held by Argentina, whose term expires at the end of the year.

Reluctant to campaign openly against Venezuela, the Bush administration instead has been boosting the rival candidacy of Guatemala, a U.S. ally.

Even if elected, Venezuela would wield only one vote among 15 on the council and not have veto power. But at some point it would chair the council for a month, setting the agenda and giving President Hugo Chavez an opportunity to use the highest U.N. forum to advance his anti-American agenda. It also could turn close votes against the United States at any time.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick made an impassioned pitch in support of Guatemala's candidacy at a meeting Monday of the Organization of American States (OAS), but failed to convince several of the region's major players.

Mr. Zoellick cited the United Nations' "important history" in helping Guatemala move from civil war to democracy, and the country's participation in U.N. peacekeeping in Africa, where eight of its soldiers have been killed, said a transcript released yesterday by the State Department.

In addition, he noted at the meeting in the Dominican Republic that Guatemala, with a population of less than 13 million, "was one of the founding members of the U.N. but has never served on the U.N. Security Council."

"I know that the European democracies are supportive of Guatemala. Many of the East Asian countries are supportive of Guatemala, so we hope that it'll find broad-based support here [in Latin America]," Mr. Zoellick said.

Both Guatemala and Venezuela were among the first U.N. members when they joined in November 1945.

Venezuela, a country of more than 26 million people, has been on the Security Council four times, once during each of the past four decades. It was last elected to a two-year term in 1992, more than six years before Mr. Chavez took power.

The council is made up of five permanent members with vetoes -- the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China -- and 10 rotating members elected by region for two-year terms. The rotating members have limited power individually, but can tip a vote when the body is split.

In the spring of 2003, the United States and Britain dropped a much-discussed second resolution on Iraq that would have authorized military action because they were not able to secure the nine votes needed.

In the next couple of years, Washington may need all the support it can muster for tough votes on Iran's nuclear program. But U.S. officials think Venezuela is pursuing cooperation with Tehran on military training, uranium and nuclear technology.

"When you face issues like we'll be facing, such as Iran, it's good to have a country that has been at the heart of the U.N. system and who appreciates the role that it can play," Mr. Zoellick said at the OAS meeting.

Several of Latin America's most influential countries, led by Brazil and Argentina, said that they will support Venezuela's candidacy. Uruguay also is seen as backing Caracas, while Chile has not made up its mind.

Peru, Colombia, Nicaragua and perhaps Ecuador are expected to vote for Guatemala.

Critics of Guatemala's candidacy say that it is not fit to be a Security Council member because it has a border dispute with Belize. But Mr. Zoellick countered that Venezuela has a border dispute with Guyana.

If the countries from the region cannot agree on a candidate, both Venezuela's and Guatemala's applications will go to the U.N. General Assembly, where one of them will need a two-thirds majority to be elected.

The term of the second Latin American country on the Security Council, Peru, expires next year, so even if Venezuela loses the battle this time, it is likely to try again, diplomats said.

Retail Politics In Mexican Race, 'Wal-Mart' Voters May Hold The Key (WSJ)

By John Lyons

DOJ_NMG_0032744

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Wal-Mart Stores Inc. figured there were enough new middle-class residents in the urban sprawl outside Mexico City to build four superstores in the area in the past year. Now those same shoppers could prove to be the X-factor in next month's presidential election.

Conservative candidate Felipe Calderón has pulled virtually even with liberal front-runner Andrés Manuel López Obrador by running a sophisticated, high-tech campaign with one primary goal: targeting the burgeoning ranks of the lower-middle class, a long-overlooked group in a nation of extreme wealth and poverty.

Poll takers say the 15% of Mexico's voters who have yet to make up their minds -- some 11 million voters in all -- are massed among the lower-middle-class residents of the urban enclaves ringing Mexico City, Guadalajara, Monterrey and other large cities. These are the small businessmen, salesmen and housewives who have climbed a few rungs out of poverty in recent years -- but fear they will lose it all should Mexico stumble into crisis, as it has so often in the past.

Six years ago, these voters helped defeat the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, which ruled Mexico for 70 years. They were strong backers of President Vicente Fox, who promised that free trade, foreign investment and macroeconomic stability would better their lives. But since then, Mexico's gross domestic product has grown only 1.8% a year and created few new jobs, prompting millions of ambitious Mexicans to leave home in search of opportunity in the U.S.

This time around, lower-middle-class voters are skeptical of both left and right. They share the left's anger that Mexico's economy is stacked in favor of the rich. But a message from the right also resonates strongly: concerns that a return to the free-spending ways of the past could produce inflation and disaster.

The outcome of the vote may determine whether Mexico will continue to tie itself tightly to the U.S. and the global economy or follow some other Latin American nations in making a turn leftward. Mr. Calderón, from Mr. Fox's party, is a business-friendly candidate who says he would boost private initiative. Mr. López Obrador, the former mayor of Mexico City, says Mexico's free-market policies have largely failed to help average Mexicans. He wants to create jobs through government spending -- though he isn't advocating nationalization along the lines of Venezuela's Hugo Chávez or Bolivia's Evo Morales.

Largely Unknown

After a slow start, Mr. Calderón, a largely unknown 43-year-old who climbed through the ranks of the National Action Party, or PAN, made a big push to reach lower-middle-class voters. That helped him make up a nine-point deficit against Mr. López Obrador in February. The pair are now in a statistical tie in the most credible polls. Their only televised debate was last night.

In the debate, Mr. López Obrador said a vote for Mr. Calderón meant "more of the same" -- an inequal country where the rich evade taxes and the middle classes get stuck with the bill; Mr. Calderón countered that Mr. López Obrador's spending proposals would ultimately hurt the country's poor by bringing about devaluation, inflation and economic crisis.

Importing electoral techniques from the U.S., the Calderón camp market-tested different strategies with focus groups of lower-middle-class Mexicans. Strategists discovered that while these voters admired the 52-year-old Mr. López Obrador's passion, he also reminded them of populist leaders whose largess ultimately wrecked Mexico's economy in the 1970s and 1980s. So the campaign ran a series of negative television and radio ads -- the first significant use of such ads in a Mexican presidential race -- portraying him as a threat to Mexico's hard-won gains.

Mr. Calderón's team also mixed in new media, recognizing that the 20% of Mexicans who now have email accounts -- including many younger people from the lower-middle class -- were a key demographic. Emails from the Calderón camp attacked Mr. López Obrador, and his Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD. A Calderón-campaign Web site has brought in more than 130,000 poll-station monitors, outreach workers and other volunteers.

"The middle and lower-middle are our key groups," says Juan Camilo Mouriño, Mr. Calderón's 34-year-old campaign manager. "These are people who have started to acquire a small patrimony, and see a risk of sliding back down." Mr. Mouriño, a veteran of the 2000 Fox campaign and governors races, hones his tactics at U.S. campaign seminars. He got advice from former Clinton campaign guru Dick Morris, though the consultant doesn't have an official role in the campaign. Neither side would discuss the nature of his advice. Mr. Morris wrote a New York Post op-ed piece, decrying Mr. López Obrador as a danger to Mexico, just as the Calderón negative-ad campaign was getting under way in Mexico.

With less than a month to go before the July 2 ballot, Mr. López Obrador's PRD has an edge over Mr. Calderón's party among the poor, which includes the 40% of heads of households earning less than $4,100 a year. But Mr. Calderón partly offsets that advantage by polling higher among the 15% of households in the upper-middle class and wealthy, broadly defined as those who earn more than $11,000 a year.

That leaves as the key battleground households earning between $4,100 and $11,000 per year. Those lower-middle- and middle-class households grew by about 25% during the first four years of the Fox administration, and now account for about 45% of total Mexican households.

A Concrete Sea

DOJ_NMG_0032745

Together, the sprawling cities outside Mexico City, with Aztec names like Tlalnepantla, Ecatepec and Ciudad Nezahualcóyotl look like a concrete sea that overflowed its basin and rushed up the surrounding hills. But there are signs of progress amid the sprawl. In Tecámac, homebuilders have turned cornfields into planned communities of $20,000 townhouses, in a Mexican version of the Levittown of the 1950s. Wal-Mart, which has been in Mexico for about a decade, opened its doors in Ecatepec just last year.

The undecided are people like Vicente Lugo. Six years ago, the 47-year-old aluminum salesman voted for Mr. Fox, hoping the economy would improve. Instead, his sales are down, his salary is stuck and he isn't sure whom he will vote for. Economic stability gives him comfort, but he worries about whether his young children will find jobs when they become adults.

"I thought we'd have better salaries, less crime, less poverty, less migration, less corruption," he says. Mr. Lugo is waiting anxiously to hear if he qualified for a mortgage to buy a town house in Las Americas, a new housing subdivision going up in Ecatepec. "In the end, Fox really didn't do all that well," he says.

Mr. Calderón's latest foray into the lower-middle-class precincts came in late May, when he assembled thousands of flag-waving supporters along the main highway that connects the outlying municipalities like Tlalnepantla to the capital. The campaign supplied a caravan of souped-up Volkswagen Beetles -- the signature vehicle of urban workers -- and a truckload of midriff-baring dancers to keep the crowd entertained until Mr. Calderón wheeled by, waving from a confetti-strewn pickup. He didn't bother to speak that day, letting his cheering followers convey the message to passing motorists.

The Man From Tabasco

His opponent, Mr. López Obrador, 52, a charismatic politician from the southern oil state of Tabasco who has developed an intensely loyal following among the poor, has a deep reservoir of support in the areas Mr. Calderón is targeting. During his term as mayor of Mexico City, he granted cash subsidies to the elderly and single mothers, and built elevated highways and improved the bus system. In March, he stopped by a local park in Ecatepec, to back the PRD's mayoral candidate, José Luis Gutiérrez, who cruised to victory by linking himself to Mr. López Obrador's record in Mexico City.

But the candidate hasn't been back to the lower-middle-class outskirts of Mexico City since. Instead, he tours rural Mexican villages as many as five days a week, figuring that Mexicans have become so jaded by corruption and mediocre economic growth that they will trust only a politician who personally greets them.

As the election draws closer, Mr. López Obrador, who acts as his own campaign manager, calculates that he has already clinched the lower-middle class outside Mexico City, and his time is better spent in areas where he is weaker, like the North, and in poaching PRI voters in rural areas and labor unions. His campaign is being heavily outspent on national media advertising by Mr. Calderón and has largely eschewed made-in-the-U.S. campaign tactics.

It is a high-stakes bet. Mr. López Obrador "thinks we've already won this area, but votes aren't a sure thing," says Mr. Gutiérrez, the Ecatepec mayor who campaigns for Mr. López Obrador in parts of the city that are so poor that braying donkeys interrupt his speeches. "He can't spend all his time in the villages and skip over the most populous areas."

Diverse Bunch

In Mexico, the lower-middle class is a diverse bunch, ranging from those who can barely afford a television and refrigerator to families that can qualify for a mortgage and own a car. The group was battered by a currency and banking crisis in 1994 and has only recovered its previous economic standing under Mr. Fox, a decade later. Many are frustrated by the mediocre economic performance of the Fox administration and energized by Mr. López Obrador's attacks on the rich, as well as his promises to create jobs by building roads, refineries and high-speed trains.

Mr. Calderón's campaign strategists decided to focus on the party's chief economic achievement: stability. The six years of the Fox administration will mark Mexico's longest stretch without an economic crisis since the 1960s. With inflation tamed, banks began offering 20-year fixed rate mortgages -- unthinkable before Mr. Fox took office -- creating a housing boom.

After a flurry of negative ads trying to link Mr. López Obrador to the bad old days of free-spending Mexican leaders, Mr. Calderón sought to cast himself as a reliable alternative. A diminutive, bespectacled man with a master's degree from Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government, Mr. Calderón was largely unknown to the public until he won an upset victory in the PAN primary late last year. Mr. Calderón's image makers advised him to start displaying his open palms in TV ads and during speeches, to suggest that he'd be entering office with "clean hands."

Mr. Calderón's team cast him as the "Jobs President," the candidate who was most likely to create jobs by making Mexico attractive to private investors. That strategy has worked: In an April poll by Mexico City-based Consulta Mitofsky, 42% of voters associated Mr. Calderón with the word "jobs," compared with 21% for Mr. López Obrador.

Mr. Calderón's campaign is working among voters like Roberto Saldaña, a 26-year-old technician, who lives in one of Ecatepec's rougher sections with his mother and two siblings. He counted himself as a López Obrador supporter after the politician stopped at his free technical college late last year. The politician vowed to force Mexican monopolies to hire based on merit rather than connections, which Mr. Saldaña lacked.

DOJ_NMG_0032746

But Mr. Saldaña says he started rethinking his vote after he saw one ad that replayed a speech of Mr. López Obrador condoning a mob-justice lynching of two cops. Mr. Saldaña's father was killed five years ago during a robbery while walking to work, and the young technician began to worry that Mr. López Obrador was soft on crime. Since then, the Calderón campaign has been regularly sending him emails attacking Mr. López Obrador, and he has also received a phone call from Mr. Calderón's telemarketing firm.

Final Switch

He switched his allegiance for good in late March, after landing an $8,000-a-year job at a local unit of Chinese telecommunications-equipment maker Huawei Technologies Co. He is now convinced Mexico's future depends on foreign investment and job creation. "At first I was going to vote for AMLO, because he wants to help people," says Mr. Saldaña, using one of Mr. López Obrador's nicknames. "But now I think it would be a step backwards."

Watching his lead evaporate, Mr. López Obrador is making heavier use of television to reach middle-class voters. Recently, he purchased slots during prime time on several national channels to outline his economic ideas and is doing more TV interviews. He vowed to use subsidies and wage increases to boost the spending power of people making less than $9,500 a year by 20%, a move that targets the lower-middle-class voter. He is also going on the offensive against Mr. Calderón in a series of TV ads that try to link him to Mexico's mid-1990s bank bailout, which many Mexicans believe aided wealthy bank owners and pushed borrowers into bankruptcy.

That argument resonates with voters like Jessica Almaraz, a 22-year-old college student who works as a hostess at the Chili's restaurant in the new Plaza de las Americas shopping mall outside Mexico City. She says the harsh attacks on Mr. López Obrador have only strengthened her belief that he is a crusading outsider. "You have no idea how corrupt things are, or how much money gets stolen in Mexico every single day," she says. "We need someone who can make a change."

Oil May Grease Attitudes Toward Cuba Trade Policy (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, June 7, 2006

The imminent release of a new Bush administration status report on U.S.-Cuban relations is re-energizing the anti-embargo lobby, which believes the skyrocketing price of oil could provide a winning angle in its fight to relax trade sanctions on the communist island nation.

When the Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba issued its first policy recommendations at the president's behest two years ago, it resulted in stricter curbs on educational travel and Cuban-Americans' ability to send money home. But the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), its affiliated business coalition USA Engage and the newly independent Freedom to Travel Campaign are stumping for a milder report this time around.

The groups have found a new weapon for their campaign to loosen the trade embargo that has stood against Havana since the Kennedy administration. Oil companies from Norway, India, Spain and China (whose government-controlled petroleum group set off protectionist alarms last year with its bid to purchase Unocal) recently have signed drilling deals to explore Cuba's offshore waters.

"The embargo has the effect of turning our entire back yard over to other countries — China, India," USA Engage director Jake Colvin said. "Cupec [Cuba's state-owned oil company] is certainly looking for partners, and it's better that we are there than that we are not."

With the appropriations cycle heating up in the House this month, the annual ritual of amendments offered to ease sanctions on Cuba is sure to spark a fierce debate. Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a longtime opponent of the embargo, has raised the stakes with a bill that would allow U.S. oil and gas giants to profit from Cuban reserves and with a release from the House Cuba Working Group, which he co-chairs.

Flake and many on K Street are counting on the fearsome specter of China's quest for oil to raise support for the Cuba drilling bill. Among those backing the Senate version, sponsored by Rep. Larry Craig (R-Idaho), is Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), whom NFTC President Bill Reinsch touted as a powerful ally.

Cuban waters contain somewhere between 4.6 billion and 9.3 billion barrels of oil, according to estimates by the U.S. Geological Survey, a figure comparable to the low end of available resources in the GOP-coveted Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), in Alaska.

"It defies common sense not to explore our options over in Cuban waters," Flake spokesman Matthew Specht said. "When we get serious about ANWR, why can't we get serious about this?"

Lawmakers working to preserve tight restrictions on Cuban trade and travel remain influential in both chambers, however, particularly in the Florida delegation, and Cuban-Americans committed to isolating Cuban dictator Fidel Castro have revitalized their political activity through the U.S.-Cuba Democracy PAC. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, a Cuban émigré who leads the White House's commission along with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has given to the PAC in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0032747

Mauricio Claver-Carone, one of the PAC's 25 directors and a pro-embargo lobbyist for the Cuba Democracy Public Advocacy Corp., dismissed the political value of Cuba's oil wealth as a red herring.

"Energy exploration is a big smokescreen issue," Claver-Carone said. "It has sucked the whole Cuba policy community in, and I think it's something the Jeff Flakes of the world wanted to do on purpose."

Yet Claver-Carone acknowledged the allure of alleviating sky-high gas prices to Republicans. He said anti-Castro activists are not expecting oil exploration to pop up in the administration's new report, which officials had expected to release last week.

"I think it will backfire because the oil industry is pretty radioactive in Congress right now, at least from a lobbying perspective," Claver-Carone said. Instead, he is bracing for the report to address limits on religious travel to Cuba, now regulated more lightly than trips home to visit family members.

The U.S.-Cuba PAC has already given $347,000 this cycle, including contributions to four senior House Republicans on the appropriations panel with jurisdiction over the Treasury Department, a key enforcer of the embargo. That puts the PAC on pace to more than double its giving for the 2004 elections.

Anti-sanctions lobbyists claim widespread support for the Cuba drilling bill among oil and gas companies, but industry sources were hesitant to confirm this.

"In general, we think it's good when anyone tries to expand energy production," said Bill Bush, a spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute (API), the oil industry's trade association. The API has left the question of a public stance on Cuba drilling to its individual members, several of whom attended a controversial February meeting with Cuban officials in Mexico City that was briefly broken up at the Bush administration's request.

One of those Mexico attendees, ExxonMobil, is "obviously interested in exploring for oil anywhere that U.S. law allows us to," said company spokesman Russ Roberts. "Right now Cuba is a country the U.S. is not doing business in. … I'm not sure we would want to go as far as making a comment on whether we would want the law to change."

Valero, a Texas oil refiner also reportedly present in Mexico, has no position on the Cuba drilling legislation, according to a corporate spokeswoman.

The Freedom to Travel Campaign last month formally split from its parent think tank, the Center for International Policy, and will continue organizing congressional trips to Cuba even as the uncertainty of lobbying-reform negotiations clouds privately sponsored travel. Campaign Director Sarah Stephens said members not usually considered foes of the embargo, "people who never vote with us," are expressing interest in next month's Havana trip.

But Cuban-American members have their own current-events hook to play up in Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's coming visit with Castro, whom Ahmadinejad considers a crucial international partner.

"All the problems we're having with Iran right now, and we're going to help one of its proudest allies just 90 miles from our shore?" said Thomas Bean, communications director for Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.), one of the Capitol's most vocal proponents of strengthening the embargo.

Other pro-sanctions voices include Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.), Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), considered the front-runner to chair the House International Relations Committee next year, and Florida Sens. Mel Martinez (R.) and Bill Nelson (D). Nelson and Martinez both have countered the Senate's Cuban drilling bill with measures preventing foreigners involved in Cuban exploration from entering the country.

Plan Targets African Migration (WT)

By From Combined Dispatches

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal -- Authorities in Europe and Africa yesterday drew up a joint plan to fight illegal migration that will combine tougher prevention measures with more aid to persuade young Africans to stay in their homelands.

Harrowing images of parched, exhausted young Africans washing ashore in boats on Spain's Canary Islands by the thousands this year have given added urgency to moves to improve international cooperation to combat clandestine emigration.

Hundreds are thought to die in the perilous sea voyages of more than 600 miles organized from Mauritania and Senegal by traffickers who run a lucrative business carrying would-be migrants seeking a better life in Europe.

Starting a two-day meeting in the Senegalese capital, senior officials from more than 50 countries of Europe and Africa worked yesterday on a joint action plan that foresees an integrated multinational strategy on migration.

The plan -- originally drafted by Morocco, Spain and France, three countries in the front line of the immigration problem -- is expected to be adopted by European and African ministers at a summit on migration July 10 and 11 in the Moroccan capital, Rabat.

DOJ_NMG_0032748

"This is a political initiative of the highest importance that aims to combine both managing migrant flows and managing development," said Alvaro Iranzo, a senior Spanish Foreign Ministry official.

On Europe's southern flank facing Africa, Spain is the first target of thousands of penniless sub-Saharan Africans seeking entry to Europe, and Madrid has begun a diplomatic offensive in West Africa to try to stanch the flow.

But while coastal patrols and surveillance can cut illegal departures, European and African experts agree that such short-term measures will be useless unless the unemployment, poverty and conflict that prompt migration from Africa are tackled.

"If we don't go to the root causes, there's not going to be a solution," Moroccan delegation chief Youssef Amrani said.

Delegates said the novelty of the joint European-African migration initiative was that destination, origin and transit countries were coming together to seek solutions.

"This affects us all. We need a global response," Mr. Amrani said.

Although a consensus exists for joint action, delegates said they expected discussions on how to find a balance between improved controls to halt illegal migration and long-term measures to help poor countries whose young people were leaving.

The draft plan calls for aid and trade with Africa to attack the root causes of migration and help keep young Africans in their own countries.

But it also proposes stronger police and security cooperation on land, sea and air to crack down on migrant-smuggling networks, which Senegal Interior Minister Ousmane Ngom condemned as "modern-day slavers."

The draft document also refers to the need for "readmission agreements," which will allow receiving countries to send back illegal or undesirable migrants to their nations of origin.

Senegal last week suspended repatriation flights from the Canaries, saying its migrants had been mistreated by Spanish authorities. Madrid denied this.

In a related development, an Associated Press-Ipsos poll released yesterday showed that despite the fierce political debate in the United States on immigration, American attitudes toward immigrants are considerably more positive than in several European countries.

People in Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Spain are much more inclined than those in the United States to think immigrants are likely to get involved in criminal activity.

"Often the immigrants come here and can't find work; they are forced to become criminals," said Leonardo Delogu, a doctor from Sardinia who was visiting Rome.

More than a third of Germans, Italians and Spaniards think immigrants are more likely to be involved in criminal activity than people born in their countries. A fourth in France and Britain feel that way.

Those European countries are about evenly divided on whether immigrants are a good influence. In general, people who have higher incomes and are more educated are more likely to say immigrants are a good influence.

In the United States, 52 percent think immigrants are a good influence on the country. Only about one in 10 Americans thinks immigrants are more likely to be involved in crime, according to the poll.

DOJ_NMG_0032749

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, June 07, 2006 12:09 PM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/7/06 Civil Division News

Gabelli reaches tentative deal on cellphone licenses

Gabelli Settles Federal Suit" Accusing Him of Deceit on Wireless Licenses

Coast Guard denies fault in deadly boat accident

UTC agrees on hefty settlement

FBI handler treated `me like an equal,' Flemmi testifies; Tells of bribes, series of killings

Michigan ACLU lawsuit will challenge wiretaps

USA Today

6/6/2006 10:32 PM ET

Gabelli reaches tentative deal on cellphone licenses

By Paul Davidson, USA TODAY

Mutual fund mogul Mario Gabelli has reached a tentative settlement in a civil lawsuit charging him with defrauding the federal government of hundreds of millions of dollars in auctions of cellphone licenses, according to the Justice Department.

Critics of the Federal Communications Commission's auction system seized on the case as proof that deep-pocketed bidders set up sham companies to win discounts reserved for small businesses.

A settlement in principle in the Gabelli case was announced Tuesday by Assistant U.S. Attorney David

Kennedy at a hearing in New York, said Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller.

Terms of the agreement were not disclosed. Details are expected to be revealed at a June 29 court hearing.

Neither Gabelli nor representatives of his telecom company, Lynch Interactive, could be reached for comment Tuesday.

The deal comes three months after the Justice Department intervened in a civil fraud lawsuit, filed five years ago by a citizen under a law that lets an individual sue on the government's behalf.

The lawsuit alleges Gabelli set up about a dozen sham companies in auctions from 1995 to 2000 to snare airwave licenses. The entities were formed a few days before each auction, often were dissolved shortly afterward and never used the licenses, many of which were later sold for huge profits, the lawsuit claims. The lawsuit seeks up to $370 million in damages.

In previous statements, Lynch has called the lawsuit "frivolous" and said it "adhered to both the letter and spirit" of FCC rules. In a March interview with USA TODAY, Gabelli welcomed the government's participation in the lawsuit, saying he was "delighted to deal with an entity that knows the facts."

Gabelli is a Wall Street luminary whose money management firm, Gamco Investors, advises private accounts and the Gabelli family of mutual funds. Gamco manages about $28 billion in assets.

The legal battle was largely borne of controversial FCC rules aimed at encouraging small businesses to participate in multibillion-dollar airwave auctions. Because the licenses are so expensive, larger companies might financially back the small players, but they can't control company operations.

The FCC has found it challenging to determine if bigger companies exert control. The lawsuit alleges that fraud in the Gabelli case was blatant, adding that " 'bidders' existed on paper only."

In April, the FCC modified its auction rules in response to critics such as the Minority Media and Telecommunications Council. Small businesses are now barred from leasing or selling their spectrum for 10 years, up from the current five-year holding period.

The council says the new rules go too far and will discourage lenders and investors from backing small businesses.

END

New York Times (NY)

June 7, 2006

Gabelli Settles Federal Suit" Accusing Him of Deceit on Wireless Licenses

JULIE CRESWELL

The Justice Department said yesterday that it had reached a settlement in a civil-fraud-claims lawsuit with Mario J. Gabelli, the money manager, over accusations that he orchestrated a scheme to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in its auction of wireless spectrum licenses several years ago.

The settlement was disclosed in Federal District Court in Manhattan yesterday. The terms of the deal were not announced, but several reports yesterday said that Mr. Gabelli was expected to pay the government more than $100 million.

Details of the settlement are expected to be disclosed during a court hearing on June 29, according to a spokeswoman in the office of the United States attorney in Manhattan.

A call to one of Mr. Gabelli's lawyers, Lanny A. Breuer, was not returned. A spokesman for Mr. Gabelli confirmed a settlement had been reached, but he could not comment on the terms.

A settlement could signal that the feisty Mr. Gabelli is trying to wipe his legal slate clean.

Last month, Mr. Gabelli reached a deal to end a long-running and contentious legal fight with his first investor, agreeing to pay him and another investor more than $100 million. The agreement followed years of battles and debate about the value of the investment in Mr. Gabelli's mutual fund empire.

The lawsuit was brought by Frederick J. Mancheski, 79, who was Mr. Gabelli's first investor in 1976, and David M. Perlmutter, a former lawyer for Mr. Gabelli.

Both men argued that Mr. Gabelli prevented them from selling, at fair market value, their stake in his private company, Gabelli Group Capital Partners. That company is the controlling shareholder of Gamco Investors, which is Mr. Gabelli's publicly traded mutual fund company.

In late March, the judge in the case issued a partial summary judgment in favor of the two investors. Since then, Mr. Gabelli has agreed to give the two men cash along with 2.1 million shares in Gamco worth about $80 million, which would correspond with their stake in Gabelli Group Capital Partners.

Mr. Gabelli has been fighting the lawsuit involving the wireless spectrum licenses for several years as well.

In 2001, Russell Taylor III, a lawyer involved in the wireless-spectrum auction, filed a lawsuit accusing Mr. Gabelli and other Gabelli affiliates of creating a series of sham companies that bid for F.C.C. licenses at a discount under a program that favored minorities and small businesses.

The lawsuit was filed under the False Claims Act, a Civil War-era law that is intended to uncover fraud against the government and allows for the imposition of awards three times actual damages. If the case is successful, Mr. Taylor could receive 15 to 25 percent of the amount recovered. He is studying for a doctorate at Oxford University, his lawyers have said in the past. They would not comment on the case yesterday.

The lawsuit contended that most of the Gabelli-backed companies that bid for licenses were actually fronted by friends and associates of Mr. Gabelli who had little to no experience in the telecommunications industry. Most never began companies to sell cellphone or other communications-related services to customers, according to the lawsuit, which was filed in 2001.

Instead, the companies resold the licenses at a substantial profit, with Mr. Gabelli pocketing much of the gains, according to the lawsuit.

The Justice Department initially opted not to join the lawsuit, a point that Mr. Gabelli used to suggest that the lawsuit lacked merit. In March, however, the federal government moved to take over the case.

Bidding for wireless frequencies through these companies, Mr. Gabelli and his partners qualified for $160 million in federal discounts and financing on loans.

"The damages they faced could have been trebled, or about $480 million, so it's likely they've settled for a number that's considerably lower than that," said James Moorman, president of Taxpayers Against Fraud, an organization that promotes use of the False Claims Act.

END

AP

June 6, 2006

Coast Guard denies fault in deadly boat accident

ALBANY, N.Y._The U-S- Coast Guard says in court papers it bears no responsibility for the capsizing of a tour boat that killed 20 elderly tourists -- including 19 from Michigan.

It's denying that it inspected, certified or regulated the Ethan Allen, which sank in October in Lake George in New York.

The Coast Guard's attorneys made the arguments in a brief filed yesterday in U-S- District Court in Albany.

Other defendants in the civil suit cited in the Coast Guard brief are boat owner and operator Shoreline Cruises, boat captain Richard Paris, Canadian tour operator Shoreline Tours and the Lake George Steamboat.

END

Manchester, CT, Journal Inquirer

6/6/06

UTC agrees on hefty settlement

By: Howard French, Journal Inquirer

Hartford-based United Technologies Corp. has entered into an agreement with the U.S. Defense Department to pay $283 million to settle a government contract accounting lawsuit, UTC officials said today, ending a dispute stretching back more than 20 years.

"The agreement ends the previously reported litigation over Pratt & Whitney's cost accounting for engine parts on commercial engine collaboration programs from 1984 through 2004," UTC spokesman Paul Jackson said in a company statement.

The longstanding accounting disagreement had centered on the allocation of overhead costs between commercial and government programs.
"Since Jan. 1, 2005, Pratt & Whitney has used an alternative method for allocating overhead costs, which is based on the value added by Pratt & Whitney in the manufacturing process," Jackson said, adding that the new method "has been approved by the government."

In 2001, the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals ruled in UTC's favor, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit reversed the decision in 2003 and remanded the case to the ASBCA to determine the appropriate accounting, according to details included in a February filing by UTC with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The U.S. Supreme Court declined to review the decision, and in November 2003, the Defense Department supplemented its claim to add damages and interest for the period after 1996, the filing discloses, bringing total claims to about $367 million in damages through 2002, with an additional $388 million in interest through 2001.

UTC has set aside reserves relating to the lawsuit that exceed the amount of the settlement, he said. And UTC reaffirms its expectations that net earnings per share for the full year will be in the range of $3.50 to $3.60 and cash flow from operations after capital expenditures will be equal to net income.

END

Boston Globe

June 7, 2006

FBI handler treated `me like an equal,' Flemmi testifies; Tells of bribes, series of killings

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

Notorious gangster Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi offered a stark portrait yesterday of the days when he and James ``Whitey" Bulger ruled Boston's underworld, getting away with murder after murder while working as FBI informants.

All the while, one corrupt former FBI supervisor, John Morris, ``treated us like we were FBI agents," Flemmi testified.

His longtime FBI handler, John J. Connolly Jr., ``didn't treat me like I was a criminal, that's for sure. He didn't look down on me because I was an informant. He treated me like an equal, in my eyes."

Flemmi, who turns 72 on Friday and is serving a life sentence for killing 10 people, spent his second day on the stand yesterday in US District Court in Boston, testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit filed against the government by the family of John McIntyre of Quincy.

The trial marks the first time Flemmi has testified publicly since he began cooperating with federal authorities three years ago, after striking a deal that spared him the death penalty.

Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, because Connolly warned them that McIntyre had implicated them in an unsuccessful effort to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army. He and Bulger also blamed McIntyre for leaks that led to the seizure of the Ramsland, a vessel caught smuggling marijuana into Boston Harbor, he said. He and Bulger would have raked in about $1 million in drug profits, if the Ramsland hadn't been intercepted, he said.

Flemmi testified only briefly about McIntyre, then went through a litany of other murders and bribes given to FBI agents.

He said he and Bulger paid about $250,000 between 1975 and 1990 to Connolly.

New Hampshire lawyer William Christie, who represents McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, tried to establish a pattern of FBI negligence by questioning Flemmi about his informant relationship that stretched from 1964 to 1990.

Elaborating on claims he made in a deposition last year, Flemmi said that during the 1980s, he and Bulger gave cash payoffs to the following agents, who are now retired: $5,000 to Morris, $5,000 to John Newton, $2,500 to John Cloherty, $2,500 to Nicholas Gianturco, and $2,500 to Michael Buckley.

Morris, who was later granted immunity, admitted to taking bribes from the gangsters. The other agents, who have never been charged, have vehemently denied taking any cash from Bulger and Flemmi.

When the allegations surfaced last year, Gianturco said, ``Years later, it's very easy for these guys to sit in a cell with nothing to lose and make allegations to even the score."

Flemmi testified for the first time yesterday that he and Bulger gave retired FBI agent Dennis Condon a gold ring with his initials on it.

But Boston lawyer Michael Meyer, who represents Condon, flatly denied that allegation. ``It did not happen," he said. He noted that Condon has been dismissed from an unrelated lawsuit filed against the government.

Flemmi also reiterated his contention yesterday that he and Bulger gave an expensive pipe to James Ring, a retired FBI supervisor.

Boston lawyer Alan Rose, who represents Ring and was in the courtroom, also denied that. ``Jim Ring never received a pipe or anything else" from Bulger or Flemmi, he said.

Rose noted that US District Judge Mark Wolf rejected Flemmi's allegations against Ring as untrue during court hearings in 1998.

The McIntyres' suit is the first of 17 civil suits filed against the government by victims of Flemmi and Bulger to make it trial. Ten have been dismissed. Lawyers representing some of the other victims' families took notes yesterday as Flemmi testified about other slayings.

Describing how he watched Bulger strangle 26-year-old Deborah Hussey with a rope in early 1985, after luring her to a home in South Boston, Flemmi said, ``Bulger is a pretty powerful person. . . . I don't know how long she lasted.

Hussey was the daughter of Marion Hussey, Flemmi's longtime girlfriend who had three children with him.

Flemmi testified that Hussey accused him, in front of her mother, of having a sexual relationship with him when she was a teenager, which he admitted was true.

But Hussey was killed, Flemmi said, because she was involved in drugs and was dropping his name and Bulger's name around town.

``Bulger was the driving force in that because she was using his name, as well as mine, but I'm not diminishing my role in it either," Flemmi said.

He wasn't asked, and didn't volunteer, many details about how he and Bulger killed Flemmi's former girlfriend, Debra Davis, 26, in September 1981. Flemmi agreed under questioning that they strangled her at his mother's South Boston home because she knew too much about their activities.

Flemmi acknowledged that he extracted the teeth from some of his victims after they were dead, to make it difficult to identify them.

He also offered details of other murders, and said Connolly had provoked the 1974 slaying of Richard Castucci and the 1982 murders of Edward ``Brian" Halloran and John Callahan by warning Bulger that they were informants or potential witnesses against Bulger or other members of the Winter Hill Gang.

Roger Wheeler, World Jai Alai president, was gunned down in Tulsa, Okla., in May 1981 because he refused to sell his company to Callahan, a Boston accountant who had promised Bulger's gang they could skim $10,000 a week from one of the company's parking concessions once he acquired the business, according to Flemmi. He said he and Bulger helped arrange the murder.

Connolly, who was convicted in 2002 of racketeering, is serving 10 years in prison in Florida.

Bulger, who fled to evade a 1995 racketeering indictment after being warned in advance by Connolly, remains a fugitive.

END

Central Michigan Life

6/7/06

Michigan ACLU lawsuit will challenge wiretaps

By Mike Ellis
Staff Reporter

Students concerned about ongoing allegations of government wiretapping may get some answers when an American Civil Liberties Union lawsuit commences Monday in Detroit.

ACLU officials filed the suit against the National Security Administration in January after the New York Times published a Dec. 16 article revealing an intelligence gathering program – Terrorist Surveillance Program – that monitors telephone data.

The ACLU lawsuit holds the New York Times knew about the program for more than a year before releasing the story.

Theodore Bolema, business and law professor at CMU and former U.S. Justice Department lawyer, said it's difficult to balance security concerns against individual privacy rights.

"Personally I'm uncomfortable with some of this," he said, referring to the government possibly being able to eavesdrop on citizens' phone calls.

The Terrorist Surveillance Program allows the NSA to collect phone data – including length of call, time of call, medium of call and location of call – but not the actual words or sounds made during the call.

President George W. Bush spoke to the nation the day after the article was published and assured that "one end of the communication must be outside the United States" when dealing with the TSP.

"So far, the law as it currently exists appears to be on the side of the NSA, and the only recourse by opponents of what the NSA has been doing is probably to change the current laws," Bolema said.

The ACLU is arguing the NSA is tapping calls not just of potential terrorists, but of regular citizens and residents as well.

"People are scared, upset and losing trust in their government," said Rana Elmir, communications director for the ACLU. "We are asking concerned citizens to contact their legislators."

With wiretaps, Elmir said, the government is throwing the people's trust out the window.

Bolema said the 1978 FISA law and the 2001 Congressional authorization for war provide plenty of legal ground for the TSP.

FISA, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, requires the government to get permission from a special FISA court or a warrant before listening to domestic conversations.

“There are a lot of people who say (wiretapping) is OK because of security reasons,” Elmir said.

One of those people is U.S. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, R-Michigan, chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. Hoekstra has served on the committee since 2001 and was informed of the existence of the program after becoming chairman in 2004.

“I have been briefed on this program and its usage several times since (becoming chairman) and have no doubt it only targets those with links to al-Qaeda terrorists. The program is a legal, effective, necessary and critical tool in protecting the security of the United States and its people,” Hoekstra said in a statement Monday.

He said “unless you’re holding conversations with al-Qaeda, you have nothing to worry about with the Terrorist Surveillance Program.”

Intercepted communications include telephone and Internet information, according to the ACLU lawsuit.

Elmir said the violations happened “through the NSA program, which wiretaps U.S. citizens and residents as well as non-citizens and non-residents without a proper search warrant, which is needed.”

Congress passed the act in response to a Supreme Court case brought by an east Michigan district court. FISA established a process that agencies such as the FBI and NSA must go through in order to gather intelligence on American soil.

Aside from FISA, Elmir said, the Fourth Amendment gives citizens protection from unreasonable search and seizure.

The Congressional vote authorizing presidential powers in the war on terrorism has been cited frequently by the White House as giving the president authority to extend his power to authorize such programs outside the authority of FISA.

The NSA is the world’s largest spy agency, one of 16 American agencies overseen by Director of Intelligence John Negroponte, according to the Washington Post.

Plaintiffs with the ACLU in the lawsuit against the NSA/Central Security Service include the Council on American-Islamic Relations, Greenpeace Inc. and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

John Dean, former legal counsel to former President Richard Nixon and Ann Beeson, ACLU associate legal director and lead counsel for the ACLU v. NSA suit, will host town hall meetings Saturday and Sunday in Grand Rapids and Ann Arbor in preparation of Monday’s hearing.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, June 9, 2006 8:03 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, June 09, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060609.pdf; agnb060609.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 9, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Cheney Willing To Work With Specter On NSA Surveillance....4
Judge Admits Chicago Terror Suspect's Statements.....4
Cole Deploys To Persian Gulf.....5

Homeland Response:

Critics Continue To Attack DHS Distribution Of Anti-Terror Grants.....5
Task Force Studies Canadian Border Security.....5
California Intelligence Official Blames Demotion On Clash With DHS, FBI.....5
Judge Rules Against WTC Leaseholder's Bid For Defense Costs.....6
GAO Says FEMA, Red Cross Yet To Resolve Differences.....6

War News:

US Officials Warn Zarqawi's Death Won't End Violence In Iraq.....7
Long-Term Effects Of Zarqawi's Demise Downplayed.....11
Identification Of Zarqawi Spiritual Adviser Was Key Point In Operation.....13
Iraqi Parliament Approves Three Top Security Officials.....15
Maliki Outlines Plan For Democratic Iraq.....15
Little Chance Seen That US Will Reduce Troops Levels To 100,000.....15
NATO Reaffirms Expansion Of Role In Southern Afghanistan 15
US Releases 33 Afghan Detainees From Bagram Air Base...16
School Performance Of Military Children Falls.....16

DOJ:

SG Clement Lauded By Peers, Scalia.....16

Corporate Scandals:

5th Circuit Frees Two Convicted Merrill Bankers Pending Enron Appeal.....16
Milberg Weiss' Expert Witness Feeling Pressure From Federal Prosecutors.....17
Michaels Stores To Miss SEC Deadline Due To Stock Options Review.....17

Criminal Law:

Dixon Convicted Of Bribery, But Still Alleges Entrapment, Racism By FBI.....18
Former New Jersey Municipal Official Convicted Of Taking Bribes.....19
Suburban-Chicago Mayor Arrested On Bribery Charges.....19
Sorich Lawyer Criticizes Circumstances Of FBI Interview With Daley.....20
Defense Lawyer Claims Prosecutors Trying To Isolate, Intimidate Fumo Aide.....20
Florida Prisons Suspend Contract Of Vendor Raided By FBI.20
Alleged Cuban Agent Bases Dismissal Motion On FBI Interrogation Transcripts.....21
Pennsylvania Attorney Indicted On Embezzlement Charges ..21
Bulger Associate Testifies FBI Handler Never Asked About Murders.....21
Virginia Governor's Decision To Delay Execution Sparks Criticism.....22
Gillespie Testimony Sought In Phone-Jamming Suit.....22
North Dakota College Student Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges.....22
Matalin To Host Fundraiser For Libby Defense Fund.....23
Second Dancer's Statement Disputes Duke Rape Allegations.....23
Judge Denies Vatican's Motion To Dismiss In Sex Abuse Case.....23
LATimes Says Online Gambling Should Be Legal.....23

Civil Rights:

FBI Probing Louisiana Inmates' Abuse Allegations.....23

Senate Blocks Bill Giving Hawaiians Native American Status 24
Krauthammer Says Gay Marriage Amendment Not Needed . 24

Antitrust:

House Passes Telecom Bill 24
FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Lucent-Alcatel Merger 25
General Dynamics Receives FTC Approve For Anteon Buy.. 25
Microsoft Says It Offered Concessions In Adobe Dispute 25
Canadian Antitrust Regulators Clear Mittal Steel's Bid For Arcelor 25
Falconbridge, Inco Agree To Sell Norwegian Nickel Refinery 26
Cathay Pacific To Gain Control Of Dragonair 26

Environment:

Judge Fines Detroit Metro Airport Authority For River Pollution 26
BP Receives Subpoena In Alaska Oil Spill Probe 26
Florida To Remove Manatee From Endangered Species List 27
Appeals Court Ruling Allows Oregon Logging-Rights Auction 27
CDC Says States Should Aim To Contain Bird Flu 27
Senate Seen As Unlikely To Debate New Energy Legislation Soon 28
Vermont Yankee License Review May Be Widened After 9th Circuit Decision 28
Radioactive Water Spilled At Arkansas Nuclear One 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maryland Man Charged In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic 28
Congress Suggests MLB Tests Players For Use Of Growth Hormone 29
More Heroin Overdoses Reported In Pennsylvania, 4 Arrested In Raid 30
Proposed End Of Army Support In U.S.-Bahamas Anti-Drug Effort Questioned 31
Officials Say Escaped DC Inmates Had Accomplice 31
Connecticut Drug Operation Nets 43 Arrests 31
US Charges Two Illinois Men With Avoiding Tobacco Tax ... 31

Immigration:

FBI Arrests Border Patrol Agent On Smuggling Bribery Charges 32
GOP May Split Immigration Reform Into Two Phases 32

Tax:

Senate GOP Falls Short In Effort Hold Up-Or-Down Vote On Estate Tax Repeal 33

Congress-Administration:

House, Senate Reach Agreement On Spending Bill For War, Katrina Recovery 34
Senate Approves Cox, Luddington Judicial Nominations 34
Schwab Confirmed As US Trade Representative 34
CBC Opposes Effort To Strip Jefferson Of Committee Post ... 35
Average Age Of Congress Rising 35
Congress Said To Have Cleared Way For Foreign Control Of Domestic Airlines 35
38.7 Million Have Signed Up For Medicare Drug Benefit 35
Bush Approval Rating Rebounds to 33% In Harris Interactive Poll 35
Nicholson Says Stolen VA Data May Have Been Erased 35
Measure Would Help Insurers Get Share Of Personal Injury Suits 36
Panel Says Communication Policies Jeopardize Scientific Findings 36
WPost Says Congress Should Regulate 527s 36

Other News:

White House Forecasts 3.6% GDP Growth In 2006 36
DC Sues InPhonic Over Restrictive Rebate Procedures 37
Frustrated Judge Orders Lawyers To End Squabble With Child's Game 37
Federal Judge Benefits From Connections To Old Friend 37
Panel Calls For Guaranteed Health Care By 2012 38
DeLay Touts Principled Partisanship 38
Rumsfeld Praises Summers' Support For ROTC 39
Dionne Calls Election Results "Sobering" For California Liberals 39
NYTimes Praises Universities' Efforts On Stem Cell Research 39
IAEA Says Iran Resumed Uranium Processing After West Offered Deal 40
House Rejects Move To Cut Aid To Egypt 40
Israeli Airstrike Kills Commander In Hamas Government 40
House Panel Will Decide On India Nuclear Deal This Month 41
Administration Urged To Pursue Trade Sanctions Against China 41
Bush Meets With Chilean President 41
Bush To Visit Budapest 41
Putin's United Russia Party Consolidating Power 41
Some Nations Slow In Providing Pledges Of Anti-Poverty Aid 42
Official Says UN Must Stay Engaged In East Timor 42
WSJournal Criticizes UN Official's Speech 42

DOJ_NMG_0032760

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 42

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 43

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Willing To Work With Specter On NSA Surveillance. Fox News' Special Report (6/8, Hume) reported, "The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee seems to have the idea that it is improper for the elected President of the Senate to speak to members of his committee without his permission. That was the gist of a letter Sen. Arlen Specter sent to Vice President Cheney this week. Mr. Cheney has tried to smooth the Senator's ruffled feathers." Fox (Angle) added, "Today the Vice President responded to Specter with his own 2 ½ page letter in which he explained that he only called other members after White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten had talked with Specter about the same issues. Noting he is also a President of the Senate, Cheney wrote that 'I have frequent contact with Senators both at their initiative and mine. The respectful and candid exchange of views is something to be encouraged rather than avoided. These communications are not unusual. They are the government at work.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Koppel) reported that Chairman Specter "said that he had read and received the Vice President's letter and suggested a willingness to let things play out for a little while they try to work out some sort of legislative compromise over this NSA warrantless wiretapping program."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Todd) reported, "Cheney and other White House officials are concerned that if telecom executives testify, it might compromise sensitive information. To Specter's complaint that he was not told Cheney had gone through other Republican senators to block the telecom officials' testimony, Cheney wrote, 'These communications are not unusual. They are the government at work.'"

The AP (6/9) reports Cheney told Specter "he is willing to work with Congress on new rules governing the White House's eavesdropping program. But Cheney stopped short of promising any action as he responded to a terse letter from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the day before."

The New York Times (6/9, Stolberg) reports Specter "was not mollified. 'He does not face head on; he does not deal with his not having taken it up with the chairman,' the senator said in an interview. 'This isn't me personally; this is institutional. This is not the way government works, to deal with a committee without going through the chairman.'"

The Washington Post (6/9, A4, Fletcher) reports Cheney "defended his actions in a letter to Specter yesterday, saying his intention was to avert testimony that may involve 'extremely sensitive classified information.' While Cheney lobbied other members of the committee, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten reached out to Specter himself to discuss the matter, the letter said."

Specter Agrees To Provision Expanding Bush Power Over NSA Surveillance. CQ (6/8, Perine) reports Chairman Specter "made a tactical retreat Thursday on an intelligence bill, agreeing — for now — to a change that would bolster President Bush's claim of broad executive authority over a secret warrantless surveillance program." Specter said Thursday "that he was conceding to other committee Republicans, particularly Jon Kyl of Arizona, only temporarily, to win enough votes from them to move his bill (S 2453) out of the 18-member Judiciary Committee. But he said he would seek to amend the measure on the Senate floor."

Judge Admits Chicago Terror Suspect's Statements. The AP (6/9, Robinson) reports, "A federal judge ruled Thursday that prosecutors may use statements made to Israeli authorities a dozen years ago by a Chicago man when he comes to trial on charges of laundering hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Palestinian militant group Hamas." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve said in her 138-page opinion that federal prosecutors had proven in 13 days of hearings that began in March that Muhammad Salah had made most of the statements voluntarily and not after being tortured as he claimed. … St. Eve, a former federal prosecutor, said that 'the law enforcement conduct on the record before the court does not shock the conscience.'" The AP adds, "Salah, 53, is one of three men charged in the indictment with taking part in a racketeering conspiracy that included funneling cash to Hamas to commit murders, bombings and other violence. … The indictment was announced in August 2004 by then Attorney General John Ashcroft who said at a news conference that the three operated 'a U.S.-based terrorist recruiting and financing cell.' … The evidence prosecutors plan to use at the trial, which is scheduled for October, includes statements Salah made after his January 1993 arrest in Israel on terrorism financing charges. He served five years in Israeli prisons before returning to Chicago."

DOJ_NMG_0032762

The Chicago Tribune (6/9, Coen) reports, "Lawyers for Muhammad Salah had argued the incriminating statements, which are central to the government's case, were coerced through physical and psychological abuse over weeks. … Israeli agents tortured Salah after he was arrested at a checkpoint between the Gaza Strip and Israel, they argued, forcing him to sit hooded in a tiny chair for hours, threatening his family and having other detainees beat him." The Tribune adds, "In their attempt to keep the material from being suppressed, prosecutors in March presented the testimony of two Israeli officers who questioned Salah about his links to the militant Islamic group Hamas. Testifying under code names, Maj. 'Haim' and Capt. 'Nadav' of the Israeli Security Agency, the two denied Salah had been tortured. … U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve said in her ruling that she found the officers to be extremely credible, and that Salah's statements were given voluntarily."

Cole Deploys To Persian Gulf. ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 9, 1:05, Gibson) reported, "Finally tonight, a little bit of irony on this day that Abu Musab al Zarqawi is killed. A guided missile destroyer set sail from Norfolk, headed for the Persian Gulf today. Nothing remarkable in that. But this is the USS Cole, headed for the Gulf for the first time since al Qaeda blew a hold in the side of the ship and killed 17 sailors 6 years ago. And another coincidence of timing." Commander Bradley Roberson, USS Cole commanding officer: "I think it's appropriate that a ship like Cole goes out today. Today happens to be the tenth birthday of the ship, too. Talk about more irony." Gibson: "There are 17 stars on the floor of the ship's dining hall. The 17 that were killed were in that area of the ship."

The Washington Times/AP (6/9, Barisic) reports sailors "in the current crew of 320, including many who asked to be assigned to the Cole, say they are unafraid to deploy to that region." The Cole "is one of six ships and a submarine with 6,000 sailors and Marines leaving the East Coast this week to conduct security operations in support of the war on terrorism."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Critics Continue To Attack DHS Distribution Of Anti-Terror Grants. Under the headline "Uproar Unmuffled Over Anti-terror Money," USA Today (6/9, Hall) reports a week after announcing this year's distribution of urban areas initiative grants, Secretary Chertoff "and his department are struggling to defend funding cuts for New York City and Washington and increases for smaller cities such as Omaha and Charlotte." Chertoff said in January that "he didn't care" about the "heat" he'd likely get over DHS' attempts to "eliminate wasteful spending" in its grants, but the changes "yielded an uproar — especially in New York, where funds were cut 40% — that caught the department off guard." Meanwhile, Chertoff's defense of this year's distribution of funds, which includes the fact that "New York still gets more money than any other city," has "done little to calm critics."

Task Force Studies Canadian Border Security. The Washington Times (6/9, Seper) reports a "task force of former U.S. Border Patrol agents, ex-military personnel, academics and congressional staffers, who last year called for 36,000 National Guard troops to be deployed on the Mexican border, has begun a tour of the Canadian border to study 'options' to better secure the nation's northern frontier." Conclusions from "the three-week mission will be submitted to the House Homeland Security and Armed Services committees and to the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus on July 4 for consideration for legislation."

California Intelligence Official Blames Demotion On Clash With DHS, FBI. The AP (6/9, Marquez) reports former California Department of Justice criminal intelligence chief Edward Manavian "said in a personnel complaint that he was demoted after questioning the legality of federal and state intelligence-gathering methods, but authorities dispute the claims. … The board pulled out of talks to share intelligence with the federal Department of Homeland Security last year because of Manavian's concerns that sharing criminal information in the department's system would violate privacy laws, according to his complaint." He also alleges that "his decision to pull out of an FBI operation to infiltrate the Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front…by planting a state DOJ agent in their meetings on a university campus" was a factor in his ouster. "An FBI spokeswoman said the bureau 'strongly questions' Manavian's allegations, but declined to comment further. The FBI has successfully infiltrated the ELF in the past."

DOJ_NMG_0032763

Judge Rules Against WTC Leaseholder's Bid For Defense Costs. The New York Law Journal (6/9, Hamblett) reports, "World Trade Center leaseholder Larry Silverstein has lost his second attempt to have insurance companies cover the costs of defending him in suits over the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein ruled Thursday that the terms of insurance binders that governed coverage for the Trade Center before the attacks, as well as other evidence produced in discovery, show clearly the parties did not intend Silverstein be compensated for defense costs." The Journal adds, "The judge said the evidence was 'overwhelming' that lead insurer, Zurich American Insurance Co., had 'refused, in the absence of adequate loss history data, to issue a policy that included defense cost coverage.' … 'To now impose a defense obligation would give a windfall to Silverstein and subject Zurich to a liability that it was unable to calculate or prepare for by an appropriate premium, and thus would work a manifest injustice,' the judge said in In Re September 11th Liability Insurance Coverage Cases, 03 Civ. 00332. … The judge's decision applied in equal measure to both the primary policy and the umbrella policy issued by Zurich. Both policies were finalized in the months following the attacks, but the binder controlled as to the intent of the parties prior to them."

GAO Says FEMA, Red Cross Yet To Resolve Differences. A number of articles this morning are reporting on the results of a GAO investigation released Thursday that found FEMA and the Red Cross had difficulty working together during last year's hurricanes. The AP (6/9, Jordan) reports the two "squabbled over chain of command issues…hampering relief efforts," according to the GAO. "As of two weeks ago, there still was confusion about how the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Red Cross would work together in the hurricane season that began June 1, according to the report."

The Washington Post (6/9, A5, Salmon) reports, "FEMA officials complained that Red Cross staffers assigned to coordinate the charity's relief effort with FEMA rotated too quickly -- every two to three weeks, according to the report. Red Cross officials, on the other hand, were frustrated by FEMA's propensity to lose their requests for food, cots and other supplies."

The New York Times (6/9, Strom) reports, "Critics said the two agencies should have put aside their differences by now. 'The report leaves the impression that when the next hurricane hits, leaving people hungry and homeless, FEMA and the Red Cross will be haggling over who's supposed to provide food and shelter,' Senator Charles E. Grassley…said in a statement about the report." Armond T. Mascelli, vice president for response operations at the Red Cross, said "efforts to define roles had begun and cited a meeting yesterday between logisticians from both groups to determine what supplies were needed and when and where they were needed."

Paulison Sworn In As FEMA Director. The AP (6/9) reports that a his swearing-in as FEMA director Thursday, R. David Paulison "promised 'to make America proud'" and "sought to rally agency workers as they prepare for this year's hurricane season that began June 1. 'These are tough times for you, I know,' Paulison told them. 'You hold your head high.'"

Study Finds Race Affects View Of Government Assistance For Katrina Victims. The Washington Post (6/9, A2, Morin) reports an "online study by The Washington Post, washingtonpost.com and Shanto Iyengar, director of the Political Communication Lab at Stanford University," has found "Americans are more willing to provide extended government assistance to white victims of Hurricane Katrina than to African Americans and other minorities -- particularly blacks with darker skin. … More than 2,300 individuals participated in the latest experiment, which tested how much subconscious racial bias shapes attitudes toward disaster relief." For African Americans, the average duration of assistance was a month shorter than for whites, "while the amount of aid was nearly the same, meaning that blacks would collect about $1,000 less than white victims."

Oil Companies Take New Precautions In Gulf Of Mexico. The Washington Post (6/9, D1, Mufson) reports oil companies are "taking new precautions" with platforms in the Gulf of Mexico in an effort "aimed at heading off a repeat of last year's disaster, when platforms were wrecked, oil and gas supplies disrupted and prices sent soaring." Meanwhile, "drilling rig owners, at the urging of the Coast Guard and the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, are also taking precautions by increasing the number of mooring lines."

DOJ_NMG_0032764

WAR NEWS:

US Officials Warn Zarqawi's Death Won't End Violence In Iraq. Al Qaeda terrorist Abu Musab al Zarqawi was killed in a US air strike on a safe house near Baquba. The story dominated the evening network news last night, accounting for a total of just over 45 minutes of broadcast time. Zarqawi's death also dominated cable news channels throughout the day Thursday, with little else penetrating the coverage. On CNN alone, Anderson Cooper 360 (6/8, 10:00 p.m.) aired a special edition entitled "Taking Out a Terrorist," Larry King Live (6/8) spent the full hour on the killing of "the most wanted terrorist in Iraq," and daytime shows stayed with the story throughout their broadcasts.

Knight Ridder (6/9, Hutcheson) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Bush first learned of the airstrike that killed Zarqawi at about 4:35 p.m. Wednesday, minutes after his hour-long meeting with members of Congress. National security adviser Stephen Hadley, who left the session with the lawmakers to respond to urgent messages on his BlackBerry, delivered the news to the president in the Oval Office. 'That would be a good thing,' Bush replied, according to Snow."

Media coverage of Zarqawi's killing describes it as a victory for President Bush and the US-led war on terror -- the Wall Street Journal (6/9, Fassihi, Solomon, Shishkin), for example, speaks of "psychological boost after months of seemingly endless bad news – but most reports also emphasize that Bush and other top US officials took a markedly cautious tone yesterday, warning the master terrorist's demise will not immediately end violence in Iraq. A number of stories contrast Bush's tone yesterday with his "Mission Accomplished" televised speech in 2003. For example, the AP (6/9, Hunt) reports there were "no 'Mission Accomplished' banners or joyous celebrations at the White House," and the New York Times (6/9, Rutenberg) headlines its story "Bush Responds To The Killing Of A Terrorist With Caution," and says the President "struck a particularly solemn note, even as he called the killing a blow to Al Qaeda that would build 'renewed confidence' in the war effort." The tone "was starkly different from Mr. Bush's exuberant speech beneath a 'Mission Accomplished' banner on an aircraft carrier in the spring of 2003." But "the handling of Mr. Zarqawi's death was in keeping with a new White House approach: admit mistakes, manage expectations and exude a sense of reality, with optimism."

On NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 6, 1:20, Williams), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert said, "The White House realizes that there may be a point or two up in the public opinion polls, but they fully expect more violence to continue and this monster named al Qaeda to find a new head. Secondly…we did not hear the President talk about mission accomplished or bring it on. He realizes this is going to be a long and difficult process. The best the President can do is buy some patience, buy some time from the American people, so that in a month or two months or three months, sometime before the midterm elections, the Iraqis have trained enough troops to secure the country and bring some American troops home. They realize that that and only that will have a real political effect here in the United States."

ABC World News Tonight (6/8, lead story, 4:35, Gibson) reported Zarqawi's death is "a tremendous boost in morale for those who tracked him, for troops in Iraq, and, perhaps, for the US as a whole." However, added ABC (Raddatz), when the President addressed the issue in remarks at the White House, his remarks "were very measured. What he does not want to do is raise people's expectations that the violence in Iraq will soon disappear." The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 3, 2:05, Schieffer) said "a White House that has been too often burned by overly optimistic battlefield assessments hung out no mission accomplished signs today. Even so, this was the kind of news the Administration has been looking for, and the President was anxious to talk about it." CBS (Axelrod) added that "as one senior Administration official told me 'We're not delusional. Real challenges lie ahead.' Which explains the sober, measured tone of President Bush this morning." Bush was shown saying, "Zarqawi is dead, but the difficult and necessary mission in Iraq continues."

NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 5, 1:45, Williams) reported, "The reaction from the President on down seemed today designed not to raise public expectations about the future of this war in Iraq." NBC (Gregory) added, "In the Rose Garden, the President appeared subdued, even as he described the killing of Zarqawi as a major blow against terrorists in Iraq." President Bush: "Now Zarqawi has met his end. And this violent man will never murder again." Gregory: "First reports of Zarqawi's death reached the White House yesterday afternoon about 3:45 when the President was meeting with members of Congress just back from Iraq. Press Secretary Tony Snow recalled the suggestion from one." Tony Snow:

DOJ_NMG_0032765

"That things would be better if somebody would get Zarqawi -- there was a little snickering in the room at the time -- little did we know." Gregory: "An hour later, the news reached the President. Not since the capture of Saddam Hussein in December of 2003 has the White House achieved such a victory in Iraq," but "the President was careful not to overreact."

On ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 4, 3:50, Gibson), chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said, "Everyone was being cautious. At the White House, there is hope what they call a circuit breaker that will open people's minds up to the idea of progress in Iraq. But they know events have to follow on the ground." Newsweek International editor Fareed Zakaria added, "When the President did speak, he said this is a victory for the global war on terror. He did not say this is a victory in establishing stability or peace in Iraq, or allowing our troops to leave."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Henry) said Bush was "very careful as he stepped up to the podium in the Rose Garden to not be celebrating and doing any victory dancing. He walked a very fine line." CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (6/8, 10:08 p.m.) noted Bush "had a warning -- we can expect the terrorists and insurgents to carry on without him."

On its website, Time (6/9, Allen) runs a piece titled "For a Beleaguered President, a Victory," in which it says Bush "was one of the few Administration officials who wasn't smiling. Having learned the hazards of gloating, he maintained a deliberately somber mien." Time adds, "At least for a day, competence problems had been banished. The break came when the President needed it most -- as the daily parade of horribles from Iraq was eroding confidence in his handling of the war, even among conservatives."

USA Today (6/9, Jackson, Benedetto) notes Bush's "subdued approach to Zarqawi's death," and that of "members of his staff," while the Washington Times (6/9, Dinan, Curl) says "the White House took pains to try to temper the news with a sobering look at the challenges that remain." Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (6/9, A1, McManus, Gerstenzang) reports, "It was -- or should have been -- a moment of triumph," but Bush's tone "was noticeably reserved."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Cummings, Dreazen) reports that "as White House officials prepared for yesterday's announcement of the Zarqawi news, they were mindful that car bombs and kidnappings likely will continue, another senior aide said, and concluded 'there was no reason to overstate today's event when it largely speaks for itself -- a ruthless murderer met justice.' Events proved their caution well-founded, as dozens were reported killed across Iraq by a series of bombings."

Bush To Assess Situation In Iraq With Key Advisors, Military Leaders. The Chicago Tribune (6/9, Silva) reports the President "will attempt to capitalize on the moment, summoning his national security advisers and key Cabinet members to meetings Monday and Tuesday at Camp David, Md., on 'the way forward' in Iraq. US military leaders in Iraq will join via teleconference Monday, and Iraqi leaders will join the next day. … Assessing the course ahead, Bush will be joined at Camp David by Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, CIA Director Michael Hayden and other advisers. Iraq's prime minister and newly seated Cabinet members will call in Tuesday."

The Washington Post (6/9, A18, Abramowitz, Kessler) reports, "Administration officials said a range of issues will be on the table, including developing a new security plan for violence-ridden Baghdad, spurring reconciliation between warring Sunni and Shiite populations -- perhaps with some kind of amnesty plan for insurgents -- and the possibility of new international economic assistance for Iraq." The Post adds, "Past opportunities to change the story in Iraq, such as the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003, have proved fleeting. Support for Bush on Iraq bumped up after that news, but it quickly receded."

Bush No Longer Keeps Check List Of Terrorists. The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 3, 2:05, Axelrod) reported, "Mr. Bush once told CBS News that he kept little pictures of major terrorists in his desk and put a little check next to each one as they were put on the of business. I asked today if Zarqawi's picture now had a little check and was told the President no longer has those pictures. Well, pictures or not, there's a big name still to be checked off, the biggest, in fact -- Osama bin Laden."

Chertoff Says There Are No Plans No Raise Terror Alert In US. The AP (6/9, Gearan) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday night that there were no plans to raise the nation's terror alert because al-Zarqawi's death 'does not, in itself, directly increase the threat to the homeland.'"

Rumsfeld Appears At Odds With Khalizad On Whether Killing Will Trigger Upsurge In Violence. In

DOJ_NMG_0032766

Brussels, Secretary Rumsfeld "said Zarqawi's death should slow down the insurgency," CNN (6/8, 10:08 p.m.) added. CNN (6/8, 12:06 p.m.) reported earlier that Rumsfeld said Zarqawi "personified evil and his death marks a victory in the world's fight against terrorism," but as MSNBC (6/8, 12:38 p.m.) reported, Rumsfeld was "a little out of position" by being at the NATO meeting, and offered a "somewhat muted" and "matter-of-fact" first reaction.

His later comments on his flight back from Belgium were shown during a report aired during Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (6/8, 8:34 p.m., Centanni), with Fox News then saying Rumsfeld said "it could take al Qaeda in Iraq some time to recover from the loss of its leader. … Rumsfeld also said he expects no upsurge in violence. He says if there is an upsurge it could be the results of attacks that were already in the planning pipeline and not a violent backlash to the death of Zarqawi." The Baltimore Sun (6/9, Richissin) notes Rumnsfeld also said of Zarqawi, "Over the past several years, no single person on this planet has had the blood of more innocent men, women and children on his hands."

The AP (6/9, Baldor) reports Rumsfeld told reporters, "Given the nature of the terrorist networks, really a network of networks, the death of Zarqawi, while enormously important, will not mean the end of all violence in that country." At the same time, he "discounted as 'utter nonsense' suggestions that Zarqawi's death will trigger a spike in violence. 'You can have an upswing in violence that has nothing to do with his death,' said Rumsfeld."

But on CNN's The Situation Room (6/8), US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said the "killing of Zarqawi was a very important step," but added, "I believe that in the coming few days there is a danger of escalation by the terrorists to demonstrate that they're still relevant and that they might take revenge." On the CBS Evening News (6/8, story 4, 1:00, Schieffer), Khalilzad said, "I think it has done significant damage to al Qaeda, in Iraq in particular because this man was the architect, the mastermind of this movement here, but there is still the organization is able to do harm. And I anticipate they will try to demonstrate that they are still able to do damage, and I expect them to express them to express themselves in the coming hours and days."

The Chicago Tribune (6/9, Sly) notes "Bush, US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top US commander in Iraq, echoed the expectation that further violence could be expected, in stark contrast with the euphoria that greeted the capture of Hussein."

Also, USA Today (6/9, Diamond, Soriano) quotes Maj. Tom Hobbs, "executive officer for 3rd Battalion, 8th Marine Regiment in Ramadi," a city in western Iraq, saying, "Revenge for the martyred Zarqawi may also lead to increased attacks."

Meanwhile, USA Today (6/9, Jackson, Benedetto) quotes Tony Snow saying, "Does this mean that happy days are here again? Of course not." Snow "said that while there could be 'very positive ramifications,' there may also be an upsurge in violence by terrorists who want to prove they haven't been intimidated by Zarqawi's death."

Newsweek's Wolffe Says Death Could "Remove" Rumsfeld's Job Security. On MSNBC's Countdown (6/8, 8:21 p.m., Olbermann), Newsweek's Richard Wolffe said Zarqawi's death could "actually remove job security" from Rumsfeld. Wolffe said Bush "was looking closely at getting rid of Donald Rumsfeld up to the point where everybody was leaning on him to get rid of Donald Rumsfeld. Now that Rumsfeld got this success under his belt, the pressure will decline in terms of saying, 'I think there may be a second look taken here at his position. People have been saying for a long time the President and many people in the White House are not happy with his performance."

ABC Scooped Competition With Early Report On Zarqawi Death. The New York Times/AP (6/9) reports, "Thanks to a reporter jolted out of a vacation — if not sleep — ABC News scored a beat on its competitors yesterday when it was the first to broadcast news of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death." ABC "broke into regular programming at 2:38 a.m. to say it had confirmed Mr. Zarqawi's death in an American bombing. NBC News issued its report at 3:16, and CBS News at 3:40. The ABC News report was based on a tip phoned from a source to Martha Raddatz."

Picture Of Dead Zarqawi Said To Have Potential To Backfire. The Washington Post (6/9, C1, Kennicott) reports when the picture used to document Zarqawi's death "was displayed at a U.S. military news briefing, Zarqawi's face was seen inside what appeared to be a professional photographic mat job, with a large frame, as if it were something one might preserve and hang on the wall next to other family portraits." So "will this image, given a strange dignity by its prominent frame, be a defining image of the war? Not likely. Its primary function is forensic. It proves, in an age of skepticism (heightened by a three-year history of official claims about the war turning out to be false), that Zarqawi is indeed dead. But beyond that, the image has little power. Indeed, as with so many images in this war, it is loaded with the potential to backfire." The "framed image of a head also has a disturbing sense of the trophy to it -- proof of another small victory brought home from battle -- which connects it to what might be called the ultimate self-destructing image of victory: the 'Mission Accomplished' photo-op staged on an aircraft carrier on May 1, 2003."

DOJ_NMG_0032767

USA Today (6/9, Stone) reports Zarqawi's "death at 39 ends a nearly three-year reign of terror that played on ethnic and religious divisions and helped push Iraq to the edge of civil war. But with militant websites declaring him a martyr, the myth of Zarqawi seems destined to grow." Ironically, "the myth was created by the United States, says Vali Nasr, a Middle East expert at the Council on Foreign Relations." Nasr said, "We made him bigger than he was. We overemphasized him, and it fed into this mystique. We helped make him."

More Commentary. USA Today (6/9) editorializes, "Bush struck the right tone Thursday. Zarqawi's death offers a chance to 'turn the tide' but won't end the violence, Bush said. The realism is a welcome change from the premature triumphalism of the past."

The Washington Post (6/9, A22), in an editorial titled "A Good Day In Iraq," says that "it was a little unnerving, in the middle of yesterday's celebrations, to hear President Bush speak of plans to hold high-profile consultations early next week on 'how to best deploy America's resources in Iraq.'" Officials from both countries "were unanimous in predicting yesterday that the challenge from the insurgency will continue to be severe. Perhaps U.S. troops can be drawn down without worsening that threat; but it would be tragic if, after so much suffering, Iraq's first democratic government were denied the means to succeed."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9) editorializes, "Zarqawi's death Wednesday in a U.S. airstrike near Baqubah is about as big a victory as you get. Only 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheihk Mohamed rivals Zarqawi in importance among the al Qaeda leaders who've been captured or killed. No single terrorist has more innocent blood on his hands." Yet "as important as his death is, no one should be overconfident that this is the turning point for Iraq."

The New York Times (6/9) editorializes, "It is good news for Washington, and even better news for Iraq." But "as Americans discovered earlier…it will take far more than the elimination of a handful of iconic leaders to stem the tide of the Iraqi insurgency and reverse the country's alarming slide into civil war." Moreover, "Zarqawi's relationships with home-grown leaders of that insurgency and with top Al Qaeda leaders around Osama bin Laden were, in fact, often troubled. The circumstances of his death, however, could well erase all recollection of those differences in order to enshrine him as a useful martyr. In that new role, his memory could continue to haunt Iraq for some time to come."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9) says in an editorial that Zarqawi's death "may not have been the most important news from Iraq on Thursday. That designation may fall to the appointment of three new security ministers, giving Iraq a complete government for the first time since elections last December. Without Zarqawi, as even President Bush noted in the Rose Garden, the insurgency and attacks in Iraq will continue. Without a competent government, however, there is no hope for an end to the violence."

In an editorial, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/9) writes that Zarqawi's death "should provide a much-needed boost of morale in Iraq as well, among our own troops and among the Iraqi people." However, "as Rumsfeld, President Bush and others noted in celebrating al-Zarqawi's demise, this success may not have immense impact on the long-term direction of affairs in Iraq."

In his Dallas Morning News (6/9) column, Carl P. Leubsdorf writes that Zarqawi's death "gives President Bush a much-needed psychological boost at a time he is struggling to convince Americans it's worth staying the course in Iraq." Leubsdorf writes, "In a sense, the impact of the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi will be more symbolic than substantive."

In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (6/9), Eliot Cohen, Robert E. Osgood Professor of Strategic Studies at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, says, "Counterinsurgency is not chiefly about killing -- but killing is essential to it, and by terminating the career of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, American forces have not only delivered justice, but made real, if limited, progress."

In his Wall Street Journal column (6/9), Daniel Henninger says, "Zarqawi understood that promising to make constant murder a phenomenon of the world's life, and proving he could deliver on that promise, would corrode the possibility of normal human relationships everywhere -- among Iraqis, between Iraqis and coalition forces, and in the U.S. between supporters of the Iraq war and those opponents of the war who abhor terrorism but have simply gone numb before Zarqawi's limitless capacity to kill. Western Europe has been made supine. Now he has been killed, and this should rightly be called a moral victory."

DOJ_NMG_0032768

In his New York Times column (6/9), Thomas Friedman says, "Zarqawi was finally tracked down because someone in his organization or in the Sunni community in Iraq turned against him. We need more of that, because Iraq will only work if more Sunnis turn against the terrorists and join the government. Second, Al Qaeda can talk all it wants about replacing Zarqawi, but he is not so easily replaced, because he was a world-class, first-team all-star terrorist. For three years he terrorized Iraq, while eluding the U.S. Army, Marine Corps, Navy, Air Force and C.I.A. Bad guys like him don't grow on trees. But his death will be a turning point only if it leads more Iraqis to come together into a coherent government and army. Ultimately, that is all that matters."

In a New York Times op-ed (6/9), Daniel Benjamin and Steven Simon say that by killing Zarqawi, "the United States has struck its most important blow in the war on terrorism since driving Al Qaeda out of Afghanistan. Easily the deadliest terrorist at work over the last three years, Mr. Zarqawi was probably responsible for more deaths than Osama bin Laden and leaves behind a jihadist movement that has been drastically changed in no small part by his actions."

In his Washington Post column (6/9, A23), David Ignatius says the "opening provided by Zarqawi's death" is that it "raised the lid of fear a few inches so that Iraq could take a breath. It destroyed the worst of the worst, making life a little safer for everyone else. It offered a too-rare example in modern Iraq that the killers don't always succeed and that the culture of death isn't the only one left for the country. Most of all, his death allows the new Iraqi government to reach a truce with the insurgents who have been cowed or awed into backing Zarqawi."

Long-Term Effects Of Zarqawi's Demise Downplayed. Most media analyses last night and this morning downplayed the long-term effects of al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi's death on the Iraq conflict and the broader war on terror. For example, ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 2, 2:50, Ross) reported, "Even the Ambassador" Zalmay Khalilzad "concedes Zarqawi's death will not dramatically change the nature of the insurgency. Despite his international influence, Zarqawi controlled only 1 of 14 major insurgent groups." NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 2, 1:50, Maceda) reported that "while US officials and Iraqi analysts tell NBC News that Zarqawi's death is a blow to al Qaeda in Iraq, the organization with hundreds of loyal fighters is capable of coming back."

Typical of the coverage is a San Francisco Chronicle (6/9, Sandalow) analysis, which begins, "The United States did not go to war in Iraq to kill Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. … Many cautioned that, by itself, the episode does not bring the United States closer to victory, justify the 2,486 American deaths or seem likely to turn around public opinion."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Roug) headlines its analysis "Few Expect Violence to End With Zarqawi's Death." In a second story titled "He Was More Symbol Than Sweeping Leader," the Los Angeles Times (6/9, Stack) says Zarqawi was "mostly a looming image, a man whose contribution to the war derived largely from his symbolic value. As a military commander, he held sway over just a fraction of a fraction of the fighters who daily sow bloodshed in Iraq."

Knight Ridder (6/9, Lasseter) says Iraq "remains a nation beset by deeply rooted problems that threaten to push it deeper into chaos. There are few expectations that Zarqawi's death will change that." Another Knight Ridder piece (6/9, Strobel, Landay, Walcott) says Zarqawi's death is "unlikely to have a significant impact on the struggle against al-Qaida." Likewise, the Financial Times (6/9, Biedermann, Alden) titles its report "Zarqawi's Death 'Will Not End Insurgency,'"

The New York Times (6/9, Filkins) reports, "While his death could erode the ability of his group, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, to carry out suicide and car bomb attacks — and possibly set off a violent struggle to succeed him -- the insurgency and the sectarian war he helped ignite will go on without him." The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Knickmeyer) also reports, "Analysts and military spokesmen said Thursday that the death of…al-Zarqawi…will not extinguish the sectarian conflict that he helped foment."

The Washington Times (6/9, Behn) takes says Zarqawi's killing, "combined with the selection of a defense minister who has credibility with the Sunnis, has provided the best chance in months for progress against the insurgency, Iraqi officials said yesterday." But "the sectarian killings in Baghdad and southern Iraq are unlikely to end anytime soon, they added."

Similar stories appear in the New York Times (6/9, Burns), which notes "American officials themselves offered an immediate warning against overstating the impact that the death of Mr. Zarqawi," USA Today (6/9, Diamond, Soriano), which quotes Maj. Tom Hobbs, executive officer for 3rd Battalion, 8th Marine Regiment in Ramadi, a city in western Iraq, saying, "Things will remain the same, or get worse as insurgent leaders conduct attacks to make a name for themselves and become the next top dog."

DOJ_NMG_0032769

An exception to the general tenor of the coverage was New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman, who appeared on the CBS Evening News (6/8, story 6, 2:20, Schieffer). He said, "This is the all-star of all-stars of terrorism. And the al Qaeda people can say, 'Oh, we'll replace him with somebody else.' This is a guy who eluded, the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, CIA, NSA; British Intelligence for three years. A guy like that they don't replace really quickly. We have not won by this one-day event, not at all. But it's a good step. It's one day of good news after so many unremitting days of bad." Former CIA intelligence official Michael Scheuer said, "Zarqawi was really off the reservation for al Qaeda in terms of his willingness or eagerness to fight Shias, and with him out of the way, I suspect the next al Qaeda leader in Iraq will focus more on American forces and the Iraqi government than actually just fighting against the Shi'a." Likewise, the Washington Times (6/9, Gertz) calls Zarqawi "a key strategic planner of deadly suicide bombings and gruesome execution-style slayings, and his death is a major setback for Islamist extremists in Iraq and elsewhere," according to "US counterterrorism officials said." One "official" told the Times, "He was leading the charge and was the jihadists' driving force in both planning and operations, and in raising money."

McCain Says Zarqawi's Death Is Not "Defining Event." On CNN's The Situation Room (6/8), Sen. John McCain said Zarqawi's death "was an important event but not a defining event. … This is a significant day but it really doesn't change the long-term challenges we face, as the President I think very well stated this morning."

Murtha Says Impact Of Zarqawi's Death Should Not Be Overestimated. Rep. John Murtha said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/8) that "the encouraging thing about what happened today is, you had information from the Iraqis go to the Iraqis, then go to the Americans. Now, this is a significant event, there's no question about it, to have gotten the top leader of al Qaeda. You have got to remember, though, al Qaeda is a very small part of what is going on in Iraq. And you have got to be careful not to overestimate the impact this is going to have."

Some Democrats Say Zarqawi's Killing Not Significant. The Washington Times (6/9, Fagan) reports, "Some Democrats, breaking ranks with their leadership yesterday, said the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi in Iraq wasn't significant and is being used to divert attention from an unpopular, unsuccessful war that should be ended. 'This is just to cover Bush's [rear] so he doesn't have to answer' for Iraqi civilians being killed by the US military, and his own sagging poll numbers, said Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat. … 'This insurgency is such a confused mess that one person, dead or alive at this point, is hardly significant,' said Rep. Jim McDermott, Washington Democrat. 'Our troops are no safer today than they were yesterday. And no American is safer today.'" Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich "said Zarqawi was a small part of 'a growing anti-American insurgency' and that it's time to get out of Iraq. 'We're there for all the wrong reasons,' he said."

Oil Prices Fall On Word Of Zarqawi Death. The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 7, 1:45, Schieffer) reported, "The price of oil fell today after word of Zarqawi's death. How much of a ripple did this news have on the markets?" CBS (Mason) added, "The oil markets celebrated al-Zarqawi's death." Ray Carbone, trader: "Psychologically, it is good news for oil." Mason: "On the New York Mercantile Exchange, crude dropped below $70 a barrel for the first time in two weeks. It recovered some, but still closed down nearly half a dollar on the day as traders like Ray Carbone saw a blow to the insurgency that's disrupted critical oil supplies." Carbone: "And perhaps leading to some resurgence of the Iraqi exports coming out of Basra and the north of Iraq." Mason: "Iran, OPEC's second largest oil producer also had goes good news for markets. Iran's president said he's willing to discuss Iran's nuclear program with the west to 'resolve misunderstandings.' By some estimates, the troubles in Iraq and Iran have added a $5 to $10 terror premium to the price of every barrel of crude."

Iraqis Skeptical About Positive Effect Of Zarqawi's Death. ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 3, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "Iraqi reaction to Zarqawi's death ranged from jubilation to skepticism." ABC (Marquez) added, "Iraq's government TV declared Zarqawi's death would bring peace and unity." Ishael Zayer, Al Sabah newspaper: "This might be the beginning of the end of the terrorism in Iraq." Marquez: "Zarqawi's death was the lead story on the major Arab television networks. But they questioned whether his end would be the end of attacks on civilians and sectarian violence here."

DOJ_NMG_0032770

NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 3, 1:10, Boettcher) reported, "On the streets, it was pretty muted. People did not believe that the death of one man would make a difference, although there were celebrations by police, most of them Shiite, but they want to see the proof that something is going to happen here to secure the situation. Things have been bad. They've gotten worse over the past few months and they don't believe that the death of one man, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, is going to change that."

The New York Times (6/9, Tavernise) reports, "As news of Mr. Zarqawi's death settled into homes across the country, Iraqis at lunch tables and in living rooms found themselves wondering what, if anything, would be different. … The skepticism springs from how Iraqis see the violence. Mr. Zarqawi is part of a larger galaxy of gangs and criminal groups that kill and kidnap with virtual impunity as the state watches helplessly."

USA Today (6/9, Sabah, Soriano) also reports "most" Iraqis said Zarqawi's death "would do little to slow the pace of insurgent violence and sectarian killings."

The Washington Post (6/9, A18, Hernandez, Nouri), meanwhile, runs a story titled "Joy In The Streets: 'A Day Of Festivity,'" saying "many Iraqis greeted the news with cheers, applause, ululation, celebratory gunfire and feasting." But "Zarqawi's death came as ominous news to other Iraqis who saw him as a fearless defender of the country's Sunni minority against foreign occupiers, Shiite death squads and Iranian agents."

Reaction To Zarqawi's Death Across Middle East Said To Be Mixed. The Washington Post (6/9, A19, Shadid) reports that in the Middle East, "a region roiling with resentment over U.S. policy and fear of its repercussions, Zarqawi's death was greeted much as his life was: with confusion and suspicion. Some in Tripoli and elsewhere in the Arab world hailed him as a hero, as they might anyone fighting the United States. Others expressed relief and joy at the death of a man blamed for killing hundreds of innocent Iraqis. But often heard Thursday was a sense of wariness -- no one was quite sure who Zarqawi was, or what his death meant."

Identification Of Zarqawi Spiritual Adviser Was Key Point In Operation. The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Finer) reports a "crucial breakthrough in the hunt" for Zarqawi "came last month when Jordanian intelligence officers captured one of Zarqawi's mid-level operatives near the Iraqi border, according to the official. Employed by the Iraqi government as a customs clearance officer in Rutbah, along the main road from Amman to Baghdad, the operative identified himself as Ziad Khalaf al-Kerbouly. Kerbouly said in a statement broadcast by Jordanian television on May 23 that he used his position to help Zarqawi smuggle cash and materiel for the insurgency." Kerbouly also "told Jordanian interrogators something that they did not broadcast: The identity and contacts for Zarqawi's new 'spiritual adviser,' Sheik Abdel Rahman."

ABC World News Tonight (6/8, lead story, 4:35, Raddatz) reported, "A special operations team, Task Force 145, had been zeroing in on Zarqawi for months. Tracking his lieutenants and bombmakers. Getting ever-closer to Zarqawi himself." Gen. George Casey: "Tips and intelligence from Iraqi senior leaders from his network, led our forces to Zarqawi and some of his associates, who were conducting a meeting, approximately eight kilometers north of Baquba, when the operation was launched." Raddatz: "Officials tell ABC News the operation began three days ago when Task Force 145 learned that Zarqawi's so-called spiritual adviser, Sheik Rahman, would attending a meeting with Zarqawi."

USA Today (6/9, Nichols, Kelley) reports US military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell "didn't specify how U.S. officials knew for sure that al-Iraqi would meet with Zarqawi, but he indicated that al-Iraqi had been watched for weeks and was considered key to Zarqawi's whereabouts." Caldwell said, "Somebody inside the al-Zarqawi network [had identified al-Iraqi]. It truly was a very long, painstaking, deliberate exploitation of intelligence, information gathering, human sources, electronics, signal intelligence that was done over a period of time — many, many weeks."

The New York Times (6/9, Filkins, Mazzetti, Oppel) reports, "What the Americans had always lacked was someone from inside Mr. Zarqawi's network, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, who would betray him — someone close enough and trusted enough to show the Americans where he was. According to a Pentagon official, the Americans finally got one." The official "said that an Iraqi informant inside Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia provided the critical piece of intelligence about Mr. Rahman's meeting with Mr. Zarqawi. The source's identity was not clear — nor was it clear how that source was able to pinpoint Mr. Zarqawi's location without getting killed himself." A Jordanian official "close to the investigation said the mission that killed Mr. Zarqawi was a joint operation conducted by the Americans and Jordanian intelligence. The source inside Mr. Zarqawi's group, the Jordanian official said, had been cultivated at least in part by Jordanian intelligence agents."

DOJ_NMG_0032771

The Washington Times (6/9, Scarborough) reports that after identifying Zarqawi's location, "An attack was planned, but with a twist. Commanders did not use ground troops because Zarqawi had eluded coalition forces before, having been tipped off that armored vehicles were headed his way. Commanders instead decided on a quick air strike, giving Zarqawi's lookouts no time to tip off the man responsible for thousands of deaths in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (6/8, lead story, 2:55, Martin) reported, "The final moments of Zarqawi's violent life were played out in a remote farmhouse amid a grove of palm trees. Isolation, he felt, protected him from prying eyes, but in fact made him a sitting duck." Iraqi police "pulled his body from the rubble and cleaned him up for his final mug shot. Fingerprints proved who it was. There were six bodies in all, including a woman and child, possibly Zarqawi's wife and baby, and this man, Sheik Abn al-Rahman." While American "and Iraqi troops picked through the rubble, other soldiers were going after the rest of Zarqawi's network, raiding 17 of his safe houses in and around Baghdad. They'd been holding off on hitting these safe houses, because they didn't want to spook Zarqawi just as they were closing in on him. The US military says these raids have already yielded a treasure trove of intelligence."

NBC Nightly News (6/8, lead story, 4:05, Williams) reported, "Today, the US allowed the Iraqi prime minister to break this news to the world. A giant framed picture of the dead terrorist was shown and tonight a huge question remains." NBC (Engel) added, "Two US F-16 jets on patrol over Iraq like these were scrambled last evening as part of an intense six-week manhunt for Iraq's most wanted terrorist." When US Special Forces "confirmed Zarqawi was inside, they fired two 500-pound bombs. US military officials who swept the area after the attack say Zarqawi, Rahman, and four others were killed instantly."

US Military Says Al-Masri Likely Successor To Zarqawi. USA Today/AFP (6/9) reports US military officials said Zarqawi "would be succeeded by an Egyptian-born lieutenant known as Abu al-Masri." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said, "It would probably be Abu al-Masri if you had to pick someone who would be the person that would try to occupy the position that Zarqawi had."

Zarqawi Called "Godfather" Of Terrorism In Iraq. The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Finer) reports in a front page story that US commanders and officials "have consistently called Zarqawi's al-Qaeda in Iraq organization the top threat to the country's security and made eliminating Zarqawi a priority. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad called him 'the godfather of sectarian killing and terrorism in Iraq.' Some outside analysts, however, have said U.S. officials have long overemphasized his role, which by their account further waned in recent months during a growing rift between Iraqi and foreign-born insurgents."

ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 2, 2:50, Ross) reported, "Zarqawi was one of many insurgent leaders in Iraq. But at the age of 39, he became public enemy number one for the US in Iraq. And today, he was remembered as the godfather of terror. Zarqawi was a teenage street thug in Jordan. Sent to prison for petty crimes, before joining al Qaeda in Afghanistan in 1989. He achieved his prominence running al Qaeda in Iraq because what he did was so ruthless and provided dramatic pictures."

The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 5, 2:00, Dozier) reported, "Zarqawi claimed responsibility for some of the worst violence this country has seen, including the massive attack on the United Nations compound in 2003, hauntingly caught on film by a CBS cameraman at a press conference. Zarqawi also attacked Shiite targets, his stated goal to turn Sunni Muslims against Shiites and turn Iraq into a militant fundamentalist state. Zarqawi started the trend of grisly kidnappings and beheading, with American Nicholas Berg his first victim."

The New York Times (6/9, Gettleman) reports Zarqawi "was always something of a phantom, to the American military, to the Iraqi people he was supposedly fighting for and even to the men and women who grew up with him in his native Jordan." As the Iraqi "insurgency increased, American military officials increasingly blamed Mr. Zarqawi for the bloodshed. Military officials portrayed him as a global threat on the scale of Osama bin Laden and shared letters they say he wrote urging sectarian war in Iraq. However, several people who knew Mr. Zarqawi well, including former cellmates, voiced doubts about his ability to be an insurgent leader, or the leader of anything."

Zarqawi Said To Be First To Fully Exploit Internet For Terrorist Organizing. The New York Times (6/9, Shane) reports, "Over the last two years, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi established the Web as a powerful tool of the global jihad, mobilizing computer-savvy allies who inspired extremists in Iraq and beyond with lurid video clips of the bombings and beheadings his group carried out." Yesterday, the "electronic network that he helped to build was abuzz with commentary about his death, with supporters posting eulogies, praising what they called his martyrdom and vowing to continue his fight." The "flood of Web tributes, their tone more defiant than sorrowful, reached an audience that Mr. Zarqawi had greatly expanded. While other militants, from the Chechen separatists to Hamas Palestinians, had built Web sites to spread their message, Mr. Zarqawi and his aides were the first to take full advantage of the technology." Zarqawi's "Web propaganda generated and probably embellished his reputation in the Iraqi insurgency. But it also helped secure the Internet as a center of terrorist recruitment and instruction, partly supplanting the role of old Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan, according to counterterrorism officials and analysts."

DOJ_NMG_0032772

Iraqi Parliament Approves Three Top Security Officials. USA Today/AP (6/9) reports Iraq's parliament "approved three key security officials Thursday. Their approval ended an impasse that had threatened Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's plan for Iraqi forces to gradually take over security from U.S. and other foreign troops." The three were "sworn in just minutes after al-Maliki in a separate event announced that U.S. forces had killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." Efforts to "install defense, interior and national security ministers had been held up by squabbling among the Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish parties in the unity government that took office May 20." Iraq's new defense minister "is Gen. Abdul-Qader Mohammed Jassim al-Mifarji, a Sunni Arab," and the "other two ministers are from the Shiite majority: Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani and Sherwan al-Waili, minister of state for national security."

Maliki Outlines Plan For Democratic Iraq. In a Washington Post (6/9) op-ed, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki writes, "The completion of the national unity government Thursday in Iraq marks the starting point for repaying Iraqis' commitment to and thirst for democracy. He writes that Iraq's national unity government will pursue "an uncompromising agenda to deliver security and services to the Iraqi people and to combat rampant corruption." Maliki writes, "Iraqis have elected a national unity government that will always put national interests ahead of sectarian or ethnic agendas. This government will support the judiciary in relentlessly pursuing the murderers and kidnappers who have blighted Iraqi society. With the help of the international community and regional partners, we will be able to defeat the terrorist groups in Iraq." Maliki promises that his government will "persevere to make Iraq a prosperous democracy."

Little Chance Seen That US Will Reduce Troops Levels To 100,000. The New York Times (6/9, Shanker, Sanger) reports senior Administration "and military officials now acknowledge that there is little chance the United States can reach the milestone of reducing American troop levels in Iraq to 100,000 by December, a goal that earlier in the year had seemed within reach." The subject "of future troop levels is certain to be an important part of President Bush's two-day war cabinet meeting, which will start Monday at Camp David." In preparation, military planners "in Iraq and at the Pentagon have been refining troop-rotation proposals that, in the best case, would reduce levels to 110,000 to 120,000 troops by the end of December, from current levels of about 130,000, administration and military officials said." Any decision "to delay the informal timetable of reducing American troops to 100,000 would signal that the field commanders responsible for securing and stabilizing specific regions across Iraq had prevailed in the military's intense internal discussions of the road ahead."

NATO Reaffirms Expansion Of Role In Southern Afghanistan. The New York Times (6/9, Gordon) reports NATO defense ministers meeting in Brussels "on Thursday reaffirmed their plans to expand the alliance's control of southern Afghanistan in the face of increased resistance by Taliban fighters and drug traffickers." NATO has been "progressively increasing the number of its troops and its reach in Afghanistan. That operation has emerged as a major test of the alliance's ability to respond to new security challenges far from Europe." The plans "for Afghanistan were a main subject at the meeting, which also dealt with plans to establish a NATO Response Force to deal with new crises, among other initiatives that are to be formally ratified when allied leaders hold a summit meeting in November in Riga, Latvia."

DOJ_NMG_0032773

US Releases 33 Afghan Detainees From Bagram Air Base. The New York Times (6/9, Gall, Khapalwak) reports the United States military "on Thursday released 33 Afghans from detention at Bagram Air Base and handed them over to the Afghan authorities." The detainees "were given some clothing and money by the Afghan authorities and freed as part of the country's reconciliation program." Several detainees "interviewed after their release complained of harsh treatment in a newly built wing of the detention center. They said there were frequent protests by detainees, which were sometimes put down with tear gas. They also said conditions in the old wing of the detention center were more bearable."

School Performance Of Military Children Falls. NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 12, 2:10, Williams) reported, "In many ways Killeen, Texas, is the ultimate company town. The company happens it's to be the US Army. Fort Hood, Texas, home of 3 Corps, the 4th Infantry, and the 1st Cav. The military is part of the fabric of so many lives there. It's very visible at the local high school where the students study away for finals while so many parents are away in the fight." NBC (Teague) added, "Take two steps through the front entrance of Shoemaker High School in Killeen, Texas, and the price of war becomes impossible to ignore. Seven gold stars hang above the doors, honoring seven parents killed in Iraq." For "most teenagers, simply going to high school is stressful enough, but imagine going to a school where almost 90% of the students have parents in the military and many of those parents are fighting overseas. Teachers say the stress leads to falling grades and disciplinary problems."

DOJ:

SG Clement Lauded By Peers, Scalia. The Legal Times (6/9, Mauro) reports, "Paul Clement has been solicitor general of the United States for less than a year, so he was suspicious when he heard that Georgetown University Law Center's Supreme Court Institute wanted to honor him at its annual reception recently. It sounded valedictory, Clement said. … But judging by the accolades, Clement has substantial job security. Predecessor Theodore Olson said that Clement has already met a '24 karat gold' standard for advocacy. In the way of Washington, Clement was even praised by someone who was his adversary less than a month earlier: Georgetown professor Neal Katyal, who argued against Clement in the Guantánamo Bay detainee case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. … But the warmest words came from Justice Antonin Scalia, for whom Clement clerked in 1993 and 1994. Scalia said that Clement, who had shown his talents as deputy solicitor general before being promoted, was 'the sentimental favorite' among justices for the post. 'I am so glad he is solicitor general, because he makes my job easier.'" The Legal Times continues, "But Scalia mystified the audience somewhat by revealing one complaint he had about Clement: the black vest he wears to the Court with the customary swallow-tail morning coat as solicitor general. … Scalia insisted the vest should be a pearl gray, and he thought Clement had broken with tradition. … But the justice said he had the Court curator look up the history of the outfit, and, sure enough, Clement was right; black is the proper and traditional color for the SG's vest."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

5th Circuit Frees Two Convicted Merrill Bankers Pending Enron Appeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Koppel) reports, "The Enron Task Force was dealt a blow as the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals released from prison two former bankers at Merrill Lynch & Co. who were convicted of fraud in 2004 for helping Enron Corp. artificially inflate its profit." The Journal continues, "The circuit ruled that Daniel Bayly, Merrill's onetime investment-banking chief, and Robert Furst, the Enron relationship manager for Merrill, could be released on bail while they appeal their fraud convictions in connection with a barge transaction." The Journal adds, "In 1999, Merrill invested in Enron electricity-generating power barges, allowing Enron to book $12 million in earnings. The government argued that because Enron guaranteed Merrill's profit in the deal, Enron had improperly booked the earnings and overstated its profit. Mr. Bayly was sentenced to 30 months in prison, while Mr. Furst received a 37-month sentence. … The court didn't reverse the convictions, but its ruling was a good sign for the defendants, lawyers said. 'It is hard to imagine why they would order defendants released from prison, unless the court was going to reverse their convictions,' said David Spears, who represents another former Merrill executive, William Fuhs, who also was convicted in the Enron barge matter and later released on bail by the Fifth Circuit."

DOJ_NMG_0032774

Ruling Gives Lay, Skilling Hope. USA Today (6/9, Farrell) reports, "There may be hope for Ken Lay yet. … A federal appeals court Thursday ordered two former Merrill Lynch bankers released from prison while they appeal their convictions in an Enron-related fraud case. They could be freed as soon as today." USA continues, "The 5th Circuit Court of Appeals' decision to grant bail to Daniel Bayly and Robert Furst indicates their 2004 convictions are likely to be overturned, say lawyers who have followed the case. … The decision has sparked hope among lawyers for former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, convicted two weeks ago of conspiring to hide the company's financial condition from investors. Their sentencing is set for Sept. 11, and each faces more than two decades in prison." USA adds, "Mike Ramsey, Lay's lead attorney, said his client was 'elated by the news.' During the trial, Ramsey accused prosecutors of overreaching. … 'It means the 5th Circuit is taking the task force seriously, grading their papers seriously,' Ramsey said. 'They're looking seriously at their conduct, the way they investigated this case and their theories of prosecution.'" USA notes, "It wouldn't be the first reversal for the Enron Task Force. Last year, the Supreme Court overturned the obstruction of justice conviction of Arthur Andersen, Enron's former auditor."

Milberg Weiss' Expert Witness Feeling Pressure From Federal Prosecutors. The California Recorder (6/9, Scheck) reports, "As the star expert for the plaintiff firm Milberg Weiss, John Torkelsen became a legend for his ability to cap an all-night binge with a crack performance in a deposition the next morning. … But his latest hangover won't be so easy to shake. As Torkelsen gets ready to start a five-year federal prison sentence -- he pleaded guilty last year in a scheme to defraud the government of investment cash -- he's feeling the squeeze of L.A. federal prosecutors." The Recorder continues, "They indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman and two of its name partners last month on charges of paying illegal kickbacks to clients, and sources close to the case say they're looking deeper into Torkelsen, hoping to generate new charges against the firm -- and to continue their pursuit of William Lerach, Milberg Weiss' former star partner, who now heads his own firm in San Diego." The Recorder adds, "While Torkelsen has long been of interest to the Milberg prosecutors, his presence could underscore plaintiffs lawyers' criticism that the prosecution is politically convenient for the Bush administration. Milberg Weiss is a huge Democratic booster and scourge of Republican supporters, and prosecutors' probe of whether Torkelsen used money from Milberg to make donations could add fuel to that argument. … Of course, like much else in the six-year Milberg probe, the prosecutors' focus is far from new: Torkelsen has long been accused by securities defense lawyers -- and the business press -- of essentially being paid on contingency. That's a particularly stinging charge, given his job was to establish the value of shareholder losses in suits, and since he and the lawyers who employed him told courts that he was paid an hourly rate. That criticism gained steam after a 1998 deposition by L.A. defense lawyer Marshall Grossman, in which Torkelsen admitted he received more than his hourly rate in some cases, and no payment in ones where Milberg didn't get fees."

Michaels Stores To Miss SEC Deadline Due To Stock Options Review. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Maremont) reports, "Crafts retailer Michaels Stores Inc. became the latest company to report trouble with its past stock-options grants, saying it will be unable to file its latest quarterly report on time because the audit committee of its board of directors had initiated a review of its historical stock-options practices." The Journal continues, "The Irving, Texas, company, which operates more than 1,000 stores, said its board had started the review on a 'proactive basis,' due to media reports about problems with options-granting practices at other companies. … In a filing late yesterday, Michaels said the review was primarily focused on the period from 1990 to 2001. In a tacit admission that it might have serious issues, the company said during that period it had 'principally' granted options with exercise prices 'that generally preceded the date' on which the company's board had approved the grants by executing 'unanimous consent resolutions.'"

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (6/9, Fuquay) reports, "Such options backdating, which frequently involves picking a day when the company's stock was at or near a low for the period, has become an issue for the SEC, Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service. The practice has the effect of maximizing the value of the options, which allow executives to buy shares of company stock at a set price. … More than two dozen public companies reportedly are being investigated. They include Affiliated Computer Services of Dallas, which on March 6 said the SEC was examining its options awards, and Caremark Rx, which has a Fort Worth pharmacy operation."

DOJ_NMG_0032775

Cyberonics Latest Company Accused Of Stock Option Violations. The New York Times (6/9, Feder) reports, "New accusations of corporate stock option abuse were leveled yesterday, this time against Cyberonics, a medical device maker that is no stranger to controversy." The Times continues, "The company's board approved stock option grants for top executives one evening in June 2004, a few hours after receiving positive news about the regulatory prospects for a promising product. When trading began the next morning, Cyberonics shares soared, and along with them, the value of the options." The Times adds, "Yesterday, Cyberonics shares plunged nearly 16 percent when trading began, after Amit Hazan, a device industry analyst for SunTrust Robinson Humphrey, published an investor advisory about his concerns over the timing of those stock options, which were granted to Robert P. Cummins, Cyberonics' chairman and chief executive, and two of his lieutenants. … The analyst's report criticized the option grant, saying it gave Mr. Cummins an instant paper profit of $2.3 million, and profit of $150,000 each for the other two executives, but did nothing for other shareholders. … Mr. Cummins and the company countered that because the option grant had been immediately reported to the public and that he and the other men had not yet exercised any of the options, there was no cause for controversy. By the end of regular trading yesterday, the stock had regained most of its losses, closing down 20 cents at $23.59."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Dixon Convicted Of Bribery, But Still Alleges Entrapment, Racism By FBI. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/9, Baird) reports former Tennessee State Sen. Roscoe Dixon "was convicted Thursday of extortion for taking payoffs from a fake company set up by the FBI to catch corrupt lawmakers. … After the verdict, Dixon told reporters he had been tricked by the federal government and the men who gave him money. Dixon, who is black, also said the charges were an attempt to weaken black political power in Memphis. He said he had not decided whether to appeal and refused to comment on whether he might cooperate with prosecutors to get a lighter sentence." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/9, Conley) adds that Dixon, "who contended he was set up by the FBI and former associates, said he was disappointed, but that he accepts the jury's verdict. He said he is prepared to 'take my medicine,' but vowed to 'resurrect myself from the ashes.' … He said the indictments have 'decimated the African-American power base in this community,' but that the setback would be only temporary." But US Attorney David Kustoff "said the evidence in the case was strong. 'The audio and video evidence, the testimony of the government's witnesses and Mr. Dixon's own statements proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant broke the law and violated the trust that the public had entrusted him as an elected official of the State of Tennessee,' Kustoff said."

WPTY-TV Memphis (6/8) reports, "Even in defeat Dixon insists his conviction along with the indictments of other past and present lawmakers was entrapment on the part of the FBI. The now convicted Dixon believes it's an effort to break up the African-American Powerbase in Shelby County. … Federal prosecutors see it as laughable saying Dixon in his own words admitted to taking the money and pointed to the video evidence as proof. 'That is very compelling evidence,' said Tim DiScenza lead prosecutor for the US Attorney, 'I would think for a jury and it's compelling for us as we put the case together.' The question now, what message does this send others indicted. Leslie Ballen, whose client the Barry Myers the accused bagman, says this verdict should make others accused think twice about trial." WMC-TV Memphis (6/8) notes that the guilty verdict "is probably weighing heavily on the minds of four defendants still awaiting trial on Tennessee Waltz corruption charges. Political analyst Susan Adler Thorpe says, 'As long as it took the jury to come to that verdict it was a day and a half of deliberations tells an observer that the jury took its time and took each count very seriously.'"

The Chattanoogan (6/9) reports on the conviction and notes, "Republican gubernatorial candidate Sen. Jim Bryson said, 'When elected officials destroy the public trust they will be severely punished. That is why I led the effort to not allow indicted Sens. Bowers…and Crutchfield…to participate in the ethics special session. Gov. Bredesen was silent on that issue and he defended Sen. Ophelia Ford…when she was removed from the Senate due to a stolen election. Tennessee deserves a government worthy of the people of this state and that requires a governor willing to demand honest, ethical behavior from members of his own party.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032776

Former New Jersey Municipal Official Convicted Of Taking Bribes. The AP (6/9) reports, "A federal jury took about three hours to convict a former municipal official on corruption charges after hearing him brag to undercover FBI agents that he 'could smell a cop a mile away.' Raymond J. O'Grady, once an elected member of the Middletown Township Committee, was convicted of all five corruption charges he faced for taking of more than $10,000 in cash bribes." US District Judge William J. Martini "ordered O'Grady, who had been free on bail, be placed under house arrest until" his sentencing on Sept. 12. The AP notes, "O'Grady was among 11 current and former elected officials in Monmouth County who were arrested in February 2005 following a corruption sting operation." The New York Times (6/9, 1.19M) adds that O'Grady "was found guilty of accepting payments from undercover F.B.I. agents posing as vendors trying to obtain municipal contracts," and he "faces up to 71 months in federal prison."

The Newark Star-Ledger (6/9, Martin, 420K) notes that during the trial, "jurors watched and listened to FBI recordings in which O'Grady took $6,000 from undercover agents posing as contractors and another $2,000 that he believed was from a trucking company doing business with the county. … He was among nearly 20 public officials and contractors charged last year in FBI probes of corruption in Monmouth County. Several suspects have since pleaded guilty to charges, but O'Grady was the first to make the government prove its case before a jury." Assistant US Attorney James Nobile "said he hoped the verdict would send a message to not only the other defendants but 'anyone thinking of doing the kind of things that Mr. O'Grady did.'" The Asbury Park Press (6/9, Alexander) notes Judge Martini said that "the evidence in the case was overwhelming, and that O'Grady was a person 'who has no regard for the integrity of the system.' The judge said he did not believe O'Grady 'had any sense what he did was wrong.'"

New Jersey Agency Documents Subpoenaed In Ongoing UMDNJ Probe. The Newark Star-Ledger (6/9, Margolin, Sherman, 420K) reports, "Federal investigators have subpoenaed records from a powerful bistate agency as part of a widening criminal probe into a former administrator at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey and a prominent state senator, according to two people who have been briefed on the case. The subpoena, served on the Delaware River & Bay Authority last month, seeks records relating to community contributions made by the DRBA, along with expense reports for agency Chairman Warren Wallace and documents related to legal work done by the firm of Sen. Wayne Bryant." DRBA Commissioner Gary Simmerman said yesterday, "I think they're just checking things to make sure they are legitimate. As far as I'm concerned, in this case, they are." The AP (6/9) notes, "Federal prosecutors in New Jersey and Delaware and an FBI spokesman would not comment on the ongoing investigation."

Suburban-Chicago Mayor Arrested On Bribery Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/9, Robinson) reports, "Nicholas Blase, mayor of Niles for 45 years, was arrested as he left his house on his 78th birthday" yesterday, charged with "steering business to a friend's insurance agency in return for bribes over almost two decades. According to court documents, Blase threatened to withhold liquor licenses and business licenses from restaurant owners unless they bought insurance from the agency once owned by his late friend Ralph Weiner and now run by Weiner's sons." The Chicago Tribune (6/9, O'Connor, Keilman, 643K) notes, "Two insiders in the Weiner agency as well as an employee in Blase's law firm have provided crucial help to the FBI, the complaint states. Two of them secretly recorded conversations with the mayor. The Weiner agency secretly kicked back 20 percent of its commissions from Niles businesses to a shell company effectively controlled by the mayor, the charge alleges." The Tribune adds, "Len Reinebach, who tried without success to unseat Blase in the 2001 election, said he had heard rumors about business owners being pressured to buy insurance from a friend of the mayor's. He said he relayed the stories to the FBI that year, but never heard back from the agency. 'This was pre-[U.S. Atty.] Patrick Fitzgerald,' Reinebach said. 'They said, "You got proof? You got the goods?" I said, "No, I don't own a business. I know this from asking around."'"

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/9, Korecki, Main, Herman) reports, "On his way out of court, Blase vowed to fight the charges and denied wrongdoing. When asked if he would step down as mayor he blurted out 'No' and later said: 'I'm going to stay in office. I haven't been convicted of anything.' Blase said he was truthful during an FBI interview earlier this week. 'Oh yes, as a lawyer you know that you have to tell the truth,' said Blase, whose law license will be at risk if convicted." The Skokie Review (6/9, Johnson, Schneider) notes, "The charges were filed after a 4 1/2 year FBI investigation," which "began based on complaints from Niles businesses, Shapiro said. 'We received information from people who believed they were being pushed to buy insurance they didn't need or want,' he said." The Des Plaines Journal (6/9), WBBM-TV Chicago (6/8, Hartman), WLS-TV Chicago (6/8, Meincke) and WMAQ-TV Chicago (6/8, Martinez) also report on Blase's arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0032777

Sorich Lawyer Criticizes Circumstances Of FBI Interview With Daley. The Chicago Tribune (6/8, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports , "The FBI has conducted more than 1,000 interviews during its investigation of Mayor Richard Daley's administration, but Daley alone had a court reporter present to transcribe his statement to investigators, an FBI agent testified Thursday. … The content of that interview has not been made public, but Daley's arrangement with prosecutors became an issue Thursday in the trial of Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three other former city officials." FBI Special Agent John Hauser testified former Streets and Sanitation Department Managing Deputy Commissioner John Sullivan "told federal investigators that he did not know about preferential treatment in hiring for members of HDO and the other pro-Daley group, led by Streets and Sanitation official Daniel Katalinic. On cross-examination, Sullivan's attorney, Cynthia Giacchetti, said her client, unlike Daley, did not have the benefit of a verbatim transcript of his three question-and-answer sessions with the FBI. 'He never asked for it ahead of time, and that's what makes it different from Mayor Daley's interview,' Hauser said."

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/9, Warmbir, Korecki) reports on Giancchetti's criticism and notes, "While the defense suggested that prosecutors gave Daley a concession, that would seem to run contrary to an earlier defense suggestion that prosecutors want to unseat Daley. Daley did get benefits by testifying in a deposition-style setting rather than the grand jury. … But the investigators who interviewed Daley -- assistant U.S. attorneys Patrick Collins and Barry Miller and FBI agent John Hauser -- also would appear to get advantages as well. The investigators got a sworn statement from Daley," and "such a document is much more difficult to attack by a defense attorney if the matter ever came to court."

Defense Lawyer Claims Prosecutors Trying To Isolate, Intimidate Fumo Aide. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/9, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "A lawyer for a former aide to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo complained yesterday that prosecutors have sought to intimidate and isolate his client, cutting him off from a network of friends and colleagues as a condition of bail." Leonard Luchko "is prohibited from speaking to four dozen people who are witnesses or suspects in the FBI's wide-ranging investigation of the Philadelphia Democrat and a South Philadelphia charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods." Defense Lawyer James C. Schwartzman said yesterday, "It's just not done this way. What the government is hoping to gain, I don't know." Expressing outrage about Luchko's arrest, Schwartzman added, "I made it clear to the government for 18 months, that with a phone call, I would bring him in. Instead, they made a show for the public and perhaps for the fear factor."

State Senate Paying Legal Fees Of Subpoenaed, But Not Indicted, Employees. The Philadelphia Daily News (6/9, Hinkelman) reports, "State taxpayers may have been picking up the legal tab for the state Senate employees who have been subpoenaed in the federal grand-jury probe of Sen. Vincent Fumo. Senate Chief Clerk W. Russell Faber said yesterday 'legal representation [paid by the Senate] is available' for employees who testify before the grand jury." However, "Faber said the state Senate doesn't pay legal bills for employees who are charged with a crime or are targets of the probe."

Florida Prisons Suspend Contract Of Vendor Raided By FBI. The AP (6/9) reports, "The Florida Department of Corrections suspended the contract Thursday of a company which sells snacks and drinks to people who visit Florida prisons on weekends after state and federal agents raided its offices. Agents seized business records of American Institutional Services and were at the company all day Wednesday, FBI spokesman Jeff Westcott said Thursday. There were no arrests and the search warrant remains sealed, he said." The AP notes, "The FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are continuing a two-year investigation into the Corrections Department. The investigation led to the ouster of Secretary James Crosby in February and several other key administrators have lost their jobs after James McDonough took over as interim secretary." The Miami Herald (6/9, 323K) also reports on the contract suspension in "Florida Briefs."

Gubernatorial Candidates Returning AIS-Connected Political Contributions. The Miami Herald

DOJ_NMG_0032778

(6/9, Reinhard, 323K) reports, "Two candidates for governor are returning donations from a prison contractor whose Gainesville offices were raided by the FBI. Democratic state Sen. Rod Smith said Thursday that he will send $2,500 back to American Institutional Services. Republican state Attorney General Charlie Crist said he will return $500. His GOP rival, state Chief Financial Officer Tom Gallagher, is considering what to do with a $500 donation from AIS President Edward Dugger." The St. Petersburg Times (6/9, Liberto) notes that the FBI raid "cast a shadow on the gubernatorial aspirations" of Smith. "Although Smith returned some campaign money associated with Dugger, his gubernatorial bid still stands to benefit from the longtime friendship between the two. Dugger's AIS is the top contributor, at $30,000, to a political committee supporting Smith's campaign."

Alleged Cuban Agent Bases Dismissal Motion On FBI Interrogation Transcripts. Under the headline "How The FBI Coaxed Cuba 'Confession'," the Miami Herald (6/9, Corral, 323K) reports lawyers for alleged Cuban agent Carlos Alvarez "are arguing that the indictment against Alvarez should be dismissed because 'he was promised that he would not be prosecuted so long as he provided government investigators with truthful information in response to their questions.' They want his confession thrown out." According to "declassified transcripts of the FBI's meetings" with Alvarez filed with the defense motion to dismiss, "the FBI peppered its interrogation with veiled threats and warnings. Alvarez wept as the FBI pressed him for more. 'Here, here, here,' an agent consoled Alvarez, 'everything is going to turn out fine. . . . There are no problems here. . . . Nobody will know that you spoke with us.'" The Herald adds, "FBI spokesman Michael Leverock said Thursday he could not comment on an ongoing case. … After reviewing the transcripts, some legal observers believe the FBI was employing techniques to try to flip Alvarez to cooperate and turn in his alleged Cuban intelligence handlers."

Pennsylvania Attorney Indicted On Embezzlement Charges. The Legal Intelligencer (6/9, Duffy) reports, "An Allentown, Pa., lawyer was indicted Thursday on charges of embezzling more than $1.5 million from the heirs of estates he was handling and real estate clients by transferring their funds to his own personal bank account -- sometimes forging his clients' signatures on checks." The LI continues, "Prosecutors claimed attorney Michael D. Kasprenski, 43, used some of the stolen money to buy a vacation home in Nova Scotia and to pay boarding costs for his horse. … The indictment charges Kasprenski with 11 counts of wire fraud, nine counts of mail fraud, one count of bank fraud and three counts of filing false federal income tax returns." The LI adds, "In addition to his law practice, Kasprenski was president of Turtle Abstract Co. and a sales agent for Lawyers Title Insurance Corp. The 20 instances of alleged embezzlement charged in the indictment range from $8,000 to nearly $500,000. … Kasprenski was arrested in February and was ordered to undergo a psychiatric evaluation by U.S. Magistrate Judge Arnold C. Rapoport. According to Kasprenski's lawyer, John J. Waldron of Huber & Waldron in Allentown, Kasprenski was found incompetent to stand trial. … Since then, Assistant U.S. Attorney Seth Weber and Waldron have filed several joint motions asking for extensions of the ordinary 30-day time limit in which to file an indictment. … In an interview Thursday, Waldron said Kasprenski is currently free on bail and living at home but is undergoing 'competency restoration' treatment with a psychiatrist and a psychologist. Waldron said he couldn't comment on the charges or any possible defenses because he has been unable to work with Kasprenski due to his psychiatric problems."

Bulger Associate Testifies FBI Handler Never Asked About Murders. The Boston Globe (6/9, Murphy, 484K) reports that at the "$50 million wrongful death suit filed against the federal government by the family of John McIntyre" yesterday, "convicted killer Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi testified…his FBI handler," John J. Connelly "never asked him or fellow informant James 'Whitey' Bulger if they killed anyone. And they didn't tell." The Globe adds, "Another former Bulger associate-turned-government witness, Kevin J. Weeks, took the stand yesterday and corroborated Flemmi's testimony. Weeks, now free after serving five years in prison for his role in five murders, including McIntyre's, said Connolly warned Bulger that 'one of the two people that were stopped coming off the Valhalla was cooperating.'" Meanwhile, the Boston Herald (6/9, Sweet, 220K) reports that Weeks "said he turned on his crew because his bosses bedded down with the FBI," and the Herald notes, "The gruesome memories of the former legbreaker and corpse-remover are being used against the FBI in a wrongful-death trial intended to make the feds pay for the very first time for letting Bulger and Flemmi get away with murder."

DOJ_NMG_0032779

Virginia Governor's Decision To Delay Execution Sparks Criticism. The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Rondeaux, Shear) reports that Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) "delayed the execution of triple-killer Percy Levar Walton yesterday, a move that political adversaries said renews questions about the governor's commitment to enforce the death penalty. In a statement issued a little more than an hour before Walton's scheduled execution, Kaine said he would conduct an independent inquiry to determine whether Walton is too mentally ill to be put to death. 'Due to the history of judicial concern about his mental status, the claims in Walton's clemency petition are entitled to serious consideration,'" Kaine "wrote, ordering a new execution date in six months. 'It would be imprudent to either proceed with the execution or grant clemency without further review.'" Kaine's "critics said the governor's decision to delay the execution is a slap at the judicial system that convicted Walton, sentenced him to die and later allowed that punishment to stand through years of appeals. 'During the campaign in 2005, a lot of people questioned the governor's commitment to enforcing the death penalty,' said Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling (R). '[Kaine's decision] is going to renew the debate about this governor's willingness to enforce the death penalty when it's clearly in order.'"

Virginia High Court Overturns Death Sentence. The Washington Post (6/9, A8, George) reports, "The Virginia Supreme Court yesterday threw out the death sentence of a man whose case had led to a federal ban on executions of the mentally retarded, in a decision that was widely seen as creating new areas of death-penalty law." The Post continues, "In its 24-page opinion, the court ruled that a jury should not have been told that Daryl Atkins had been handed a death sentence by an earlier panel of jurors. The disclosure, the court wrote, "prejudiced his right to a fair trial on the issue of his mental retardation." … The court ordered a new trial on the single question of whether Atkins, 28, is mentally retarded. His IQ has been measured at various times as 59, 67, 74 and 76. Atkins was convicted eight years ago in the carjacking and murder of Eric Nesbitt, 21, an Air Force mechanic."

The New York Times (6/9, Liptak) reports, "In 1996, Mr. Atkins, then 18, and another man abducted Eric Nesbitt, 21, an airman from Langley Air Force Base, forced him to withdraw money from an A.T.M. and then shot him eight times, killing him. Prosecutors have contended that the crime itself is evidence that Mr. Atkins is not retarded. … In yesterday's decision, the Virginia Supreme Court said the trial judge, N. Prentis Smiley Jr., of the York County-Poquoson Circuit Court in Yorktown, had made two mistakes in the trial, which was held last year and was limited to the question of whether Mr. Atkins is retarded. … Judge Smiley should not have told the jury that Mr. Atkins had been sentenced to death by another jury, the State Supreme Court ruled. 'In other words,' Justice Cynthia D. Kinser wrote for the unanimous court, 'the jury knew that, if it found Atkins mentally retarded, it would in effect be nullifying another jury's verdict.' … Judge Smiley's second error, Justice Kinser wrote, was to allow testimony from an expert witness who was unqualified."

Gillespie Testimony Sought In Phone-Jamming Suit. New Hampshire Democrats are asking a judge to force former RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie and other RNC operatives to answer questions under oath about a plot that jammed get-out-the-vote telephone lines on Election Day 2002. The AP (6/9) reports, "State Democratic Party officials say they are making deposition requests based on evidence from the criminal trial of former Bush campaign official James Tobin, of Bangor, Maine, who was sentenced last month to 10 months in prison on charges he helped plan the phone jamming. … Democrats are suing New Hampshire Republicans to find out how far up the chain of command the phone jamming plot reached, which tied up Democratic and a nonpartisan get-out-the-vote and ride-to-the-polls phone lines for more than an hour on Nov. 5, 2002, before Republicans called it off. The motion includes a request for White House phone and cell phone records."

North Dakota College Student Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The AP (6/9) reports, "A University of North Dakota student has pleaded guilty to distributing and possessing child pornography, the U.S. attorney says. James Russell Jackson of Grand Forks pleaded guilty on Thursday to one count of distribution of material involving the sexual exploitation of minors, and one count of possession of materials involving the sexual exploitation of minors, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said. … Authorities said Jackson distributed child pornography over the Internet to an FBI undercover special agent," and "the FBI said it executed a search warrant for Jackson's dormitory room at the school and found hundreds of still images and videos of young children involved in sexually explicit conduct, many of which depicted 'sadistic and masochistic conduct.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032780

Matalin To Host Fundraiser For Libby Defense Fund. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Ex-Cheney aide Mary Matalin hosts $500-a-head June 20 reception for Libby's defense fund. A flier for the event says $5,000 co-hosts include former Commerce Secretary Don Evans, former Energy Secretary Spence Abraham, and Bush political ad-man Mark McKinnon."

Second Dancer's Statement Disputes Duke Rape Allegations. The New York Times (6/9, Wilson) reports, "A stripper at a Duke University lacrosse team party has contradicted statements by another dancer who says she was raped at the party, and by the detective who described the matter to a judge, defense lawyers said in a court filing Thursday." The Times continues, "The lawyers also said medical evidence did not support the charge of rape by the woman, a 27-year-old student and mother of two who worked for an escort service." The Times adds, "Three Duke students have been charged with rape, kidnapping and assault in the case. They have pleaded innocent. A preliminary court hearing is set for June 22. Benjamin W. Himan, the lead detective on the case for the Durham police, filed a sworn statement on March 23 with Ronald L. Stephens, a Durham County judge, saying the woman had been raped and assaulted for about 30 minutes. The affidavit led the judge to order 46 lacrosse team members to submit to photographs and DNA testing. … But documents in the court filing show that the second dancer, Kim M. Pittman, 32, of Durham, told the police on March 20 and March 22 that she had been with the woman who has said she was raped for all but five minutes of the night of the party, March 13, and that any accusation of sexual assault was 'a crock.' … Ms. Pittman has more recently said in news media interviews that she is not sure what happened." USA Today/AP (6/9) also reports this story.

Judge Denies Vatican's Motion To Dismiss In Sex Abuse Case. The AP (6/9, McCall) reports, "A federal judge has ruled that a sex abuse lawsuit against the Vatican can move forward with the claim that the Holy See bears responsibility for a priest who was transferred from city to city even though he was known to be a molester." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Michael Mosman said in his decision Wednesday that there are exceptions to the Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act, under which the Vatican is typically immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts. … Rejecting the Vatican's bid to dismiss the case, Mosman ruled that there was enough of a connection between the Vatican and the priest, who died in 1970, for him to be considered a Vatican employee under Oregon law." The AP adds, "No one has ever successfully sued the Vatican over molestation by Roman Catholic priests and some legal experts have dismissed such lawsuits as publicity stunts. … The lawsuit filed in 2002 by a Seattle-area man claims the Vatican, the Archdiocese of Portland and the archbishop of Chicago conspired to protect the Rev. Andrew Ronan by moving him from Ireland to Chicago to Portland despite a history of abuse. … In the ruling, Mosman noted that Ronan admitted to sexual abuse at the Archdiocese of Armagh in Ireland before he was moved to St. Philip's High School in Chicago, where he admitted to abusing three boys. Ronan was then placed at St. Albert's Church in Portland, where the plaintiff claims Ronan repeatedly abused him in the late 1960s."

LATimes Says Online Gambling Should Be Legal. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/9) urges Congress to reject efforts to ban online gambling. The Times notes, "Doesn't the federal government have better things to do than try to block people from going online to make a wager on the Super Bowl or the Final Four?" The Times adds, "Legalizing online gambling and regulating the industry -- as Britain has done -- is the best way to toughen protections against gambling by minors, identify problem gamblers and ensure that online sites are more scrupulous than the back-alley bookie. … Moralistic members of Congress should not be allowed to thwart online freedoms. It's unlikely they will succeed anyway. The issue is whether Washington is to have any leverage over the burgeoning online gambling world, or whether that world will remain beyond the reach of U.S. law."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Probing Louisiana Inmates' Abuse Allegations. The Shreveport Times (6/9, Welborn) reports, "The FBI is investigating some Bayou Dorcheat Correctional Center inmates' claims that they have been mistreated at at the hands of the Webster Parish prison's warden, Sheriff Gary Sexton and the FBI confirmed today." The Times continues, "FBI investigators questioned inmates, prison staff members and Warden Steve Risner on Monday. Their report, when completed, will be submitted to the U.S. Justice Department for review, said Sexton, who was briefed by investigators Monday. … Meanwhile, the sheriff said he is standing firmly behind Risner. 'I'm running a prison, not a day-care center. I stand behind (Risner) 365 days, and we'll go to court 365 days if we have to.'" The Times adds, "FBI Senior Agent Mike Kinder is uncertain how long the investigation initiated this week will take. 'We're looking into it to see if allegations are credible or not.' Allegations came from 'several inmates,' he added. … The inquiry stems from inmates who allege their civil rights were violated when they were sprayed with chemical mace and another inmate claiming he was shot with the Taser, Sexton said."

DOJ_NMG_0032781

Senate Blocks Bill Giving Hawaiians Native American Status. The AP (6/9, Abrams) reports, "The Senate on Thursday dashed efforts to give native Hawaiians some of the same powers of self-governance granted to American Indians. Critics argued that the measure could lead to race-based privileges in a state known for its diversity." A procedural vote "fell four short of the 60 votes needed to keep the bill on the Senate floor. With that, the legislation, promoted by Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, over the past seven years, was effectively dead for this session of Congress." The vote was "56-41 in favor of proceeding with the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act. All 41 no votes were cast by Republicans. Thirteen Republicans and one independent joined 42 Democrats in supporting further action on the bill."

The New York Times (6/9, Files) notes the Justice Department "sent a letter this week to the majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, saying that it opposed the bill because it went against the nation's tradition of assimilation and would divide people by race." The United States Commission on Civil Rights "voted last year to recommend that Congress not pass the bill, contending that it would 'discriminate on the basis of race or national origin and further subdivide the American people into discrete subgroups accorded varying degrees of privilege.'"

The Washington Times (6/9, Debose) reports "thirteen Republicans -- including, Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona, one of the bill's chief opponents -- voted for a floor debate. Mr. Kyl would not elaborate on why he voted for cloture except to say, 'I made a commitment, and I honor my commitments.' Two Democrats, Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, did not vote." USA Today (6/9) also reports the story.

Krauthammer Says Gay Marriage Amendment Not Needed. Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (6/9, A23) that the Senate debate on gay marriage "revolved around the two possible grounds for the so-called Marriage Protection Amendment: federalism and popular sovereignty. Federalism. … Congress's Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) explicitly prevents the state-to-state export of gay marriage. … The Marriage Protection Amendment is therefore superfluous. … Popular Sovereignty. Gay marriage is a legitimate social issue to be decided democratically. The problem is that imperial judges are legislating their personal preferences, striking down popular will and calling it constitutional law." Krauthammer adds that "there is no need (yet) to disfigure the U.S. Constitution with a policy amendment."

ANTITRUST:

House Passes Telecom Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Schatz) reports, "House lawmakers took a step toward the first major rewrite of the nation's telecommunications laws in a decade, approving a bill that makes it easier for phone companies to get into the cable-television business." The measure, which passed on a 321-101 vote, "establishes a national video franchise that would allow phone companies including AT&T Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. to bypass local governments when seeking to offer pay TV service. It extends similar rights to cable companies." It also "authorizes the Federal Communications Commission to enforce "net neutrality" principles, which require Internet providers to allow consumers to use the Internet as they choose." The Washington Post (6/9, D2, Mohammed) calls the vote "a defeat for the cable industry." House passage "shifts attention to the Senate, where telecom analysts believe it will be harder to pass similar legislation this year."

CNET News (6/9, McCullagh) reports, "The U.S. House of Representatives definitively rejected the concept of Net neutrality on Thursday, dealing a bitter blow to Internet companies like Amazon.com, eBay and Google that had engaged in a last-minute lobbying campaign to support it."

DOJ_NMG_0032782

CNET continues, "By a 269-152 vote that fell largely along party lines, the House Republican leadership mustered enough votes to reject a Democrat-backed amendment that would have enshrined stiff Net neutrality regulations into federal law and prevented broadband providers from treating some Internet sites differently from others." CNET adds, "Of the 421 House members who participated in the vote that took place around 6:30 p.m. PT, the vast majority of Net neutrality supporters were Democrats. Republicans represented most of the opposition. … The vote on the amendment came after nearly a full day of debate on the topic, which prominent Democrats predicted would come to represent a turning point in the history of the Internet. … At issue is a lengthy measure called the Communications Opportunity, Promotion, and Enhancement (COPE) Act, which a House committee approved in April. Its Republican backers, along with broadband providers such as Verizon and AT&T, say it has sufficient Net neutrality protections for consumers, and more extensive rules would discourage investment in wiring American homes with higher-speed connections."

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Lucent-Alcatel Merger. The AP (6/9) reports, "Telecommunications equipment maker Lucent Technologies Inc. said in a regulatory filing Thursday that its $13.4-billion merger with France's Alcatel SA received antitrust clearance." The AP continues, "The Federal Trade Commission on Wednesday granted the companies early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. … The transaction remains subject to additional customary regulatory and governmental reviews in the U.S., Europe and elsewhere, as well as the approval by shareholders of both Lucent and Alcatel and other conditions, Lucent said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission." The AP adds, "Under the deal announced in March, shareholders of New Jersey-based Lucent will get 0.1952 Alcatel American depositary shares for each Lucent share held."

General Dynamics Receives FTC Approve For Anteon Buy. Dow Jones (6/9) reports, "General Dynamics Corp. received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission for its $2.2 billion acquisition of Anteon International Corp." Dow Jones continues, "The agency said Thursday that it granted early termination Wednesday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … As reported, Anteon will be combined with the General Dynamics Network Systems business unit to form a new organization known as General Dynamics Information Technology, which will be based in Fairfax, Va."

Microsoft Says It Offered Concessions In Adobe Dispute. InformationWeek (6/8, Ricadela) reports, "Microsoft said Wednesday it had offered multiple concessions to Adobe Systems, including shipping Adobe's Flash and Shockwave software with Windows Vista, to try to resolve their dispute over document formats." IW continues, "Adobe confronted Microsoft earlier this year over the planned ability for Microsoft's upcoming Office 2007 software to create files in the Portable Document Format, a technology Adobe developed. Adobe also complained about Microsoft's development of technology called the XML Paper Specification, a potential alternative to PDF, and its integration with the upcoming Windows Vista operating system." IW adds, "Microsoft agreed to remove functions for saving documents in PDF and XPS formats from Office 2007, due early next year, and to offer the features as separate downloads. The dispute became public last week when Microsoft's lead attorney said in a report in the Wall Street Journal that Adobe was preparing to file an antitrust lawsuit in Europe over the matter. … Microsoft has said publicly that in addition to agreeing to separate the PDF- and XPS-creation features from Office, it offered to give PC makers the choice not to include XPS viewing and printing technology with installations of Vista on their machines. The Vista operating system is due early next year. A Microsoft spokeswoman said Wednesday the company had also offered to ship Flash and Shockwave, which let PC users view multimedia files, with Vista."

Canadian Antitrust Regulators Clear Mittal Steel's Bid For Arcelor. AFP (6/9) reports, "Mittal Steel, the world's largest steel producer, said that Canadian antitrust regulators have given a green light to its bid to acquire European rival Arcelor. … 'Mittal Steel today announces that the Canadian Competition Bureau (CCB) has confirmed that it will not challenge the bid by Mittal Steel to acquire Arcelor,' Mittal said in a statement received here. 'This clearance is a further positive and important step towards the successful completion of Mittal's bid,' it said. Mittal added that the CCB clearance was 'unconditional'."

DOJ_NMG_0032783

AFP adds, "The company's 25.8-billion-euro (32.94-billion-dollar) bid for Arcelor has already been approved by European and US regulators. After the start of Mittal's offer to shareholders in Europe, Arcelor announced plans to acquire Russian steel producer Severstal in a bid to scupper Mittal's ambitions. … Executives from Arcelor and Mittal Steel are to meet for the first time between now and the weekend to discuss the unsolicited takeover bid, Arcelor had said Wednesday. But Arcelor has stressed that the meeting was to discuss a business plan submitted by Mittal detailing its future projects and insisted that the talks did not constitute friendly takeover negotiations."

Falconbridge, Inco Agree To Sell Norwegian Nickel Refinery. Bloomberg (6/9, Donville) reports, "Inco Ltd. and Falconbridge Ltd., seeking regulatory approval for the biggest mining merger ever, agreed to sell a Norwegian nickel refinery to LionOre Mining International Ltd. for $650 million in cash and stock." Bloomberg continues, "LionOre will pay $400 million in cash and $250 million in shares for the Falconbridge-owned Nikkelverk plant, Inco and Falconbridge, both based in Toronto, said today in a statement. The transaction is intended to address antitrust concerns of U.S. and European regulators, the companies said." Bloomberg adds, "Colin Steyn, LionOre's chief executive officer, said in an interview the purchase of the Norwegian refinery would raise his company's 2006 per-share earnings by as much as 45 cents. LionOre last year had earnings from continuing operations of 29 cents a share, according to Bloomberg data. … Inco has offered C$19.1 billion ($17.1 billion) in cash and stock for Falconbridge to create the world's largest nickel producer and one of the biggest in copper. Inco rejected an unsolicited takeover offer by Teck Cominco Ltd., and Falconbridge has turned down a hostile bid by Xstrata Plc. Both rival bids are still pending."

Cathay Pacific To Gain Control Of Dragonair. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Stanley, Santini, Ng) reports, "Cathay Pacific Airways said it has reached an 8.22 billion Hong Kong dollar (US$1.06 billion) deal to buy out Hong Kong Dragon Airlines, in a deal that will give it control of a smaller Hong Kong counterpart and an unmatched presence in mainland China's booming aviation market." The Journal continues, "Cathay will buy the 82.2% of Dragonair that it and Cathay parent Swire Pacific Ltd. don't already own by taking over shares held by two mainland companies and a small minority shareholder stake. Cathay said it would pay Dragonair holders HK$820 million in cash, with the rest funded by new Cathay shares.Chinese flag carrier Air China will take a 17.5% stake in Cathay, while Cathay will double its 10% stake in Air China to 20%." The Journal adds, "The deal, completed after 18 months of negotiations, combines Cathay's strengths in premium long-haul service with Air China's dense domestic network. … Cathay and Air China will operate 'essentially as a joint venture' in China, according to one person knowledgeable about it. Air China and Cathay will share revenue and costs on all the routes where they and Dragonair overlap inside China. Air China will be responsible for sales and marketing in the mainland for all three carriers; Cathay will do the same in Hong Kong, Macau and Taiwan. Dragonair will remain an independent brand for six years. … Cathay and Dragonair also plan to establish a joint-venture cargo airline based in Shanghai. Air China will own 51%, and Cathay the rest."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Fines Detroit Metro Airport Authority For River Pollution. The Detroit Free Press (6/9, Ashenfelter) reports, "A federal judge on Thursday fined the authority that runs Detroit Metropolitan Airport $75,000 and sentenced the body to four years of probation for failing to report the dumping of 25 million gallons of polluted water in May 2001 into a drain that empties into the Detroit River." The Free Press continues, "U.S. District Judge George Steeh also ordered the Wayne County Airport Authority to build an $8.5-million sanitary sewer hookup so polluted water from one pond in particular that collects runoff from airplane deicing fluid in the winter can be sent to the Detroit Water and Sewerage Department for treatment. The project is well under way." The Free Press adds, "Steeh sentenced the authority under the terms of a plea agreement worked out by Justice Department lawyers Kris Dighe and James Morgulec and James Robinson, the authority's Washington D.C.-based lawyer. … The agreement also requires the authority to contribute $25,000 to the Friends of the Detroit River, a non-profit environmental group."

BP Receives Subpoena In Alaska Oil Spill Probe. The AP (6/9) reports, "British oil company BP PLC confirmed Thursday it had received a subpoena from a U.S. grand jury investigating a massive oil leak in Alaska." The AP continues, "BP blamed the incident at Prudhoe Bay field in March, the largest ever spill on Alaska's North Slope region, on a small hole caused by corrosion in a pipeline. … 'We are fully cooperating with the investigation and we are carrying out our own investigation into what caused the corrosion,' BP spokesman David Nicholas said. 'We believe that our actions were at all times proper.'" The AP adds, "Up to 267,000 gallons were believed to have spilled onto the frozen ground from a 34-inch diameter pipeline in the tundra about 250 miles above the Arctic Circle. … BP discovered and plugged the leak on March 2. … A report prepared by a team of BP and state investigators found that a pipeline leak-detection system sounded warnings on four straight days in the week leading up to the spill, but field workers interpreted the signals as false alarms."

DOJ_NMG_0032784

Florida To Remove Manatee From Endangered Species List. The New York Times (6/9, Aguayo) reports, "The Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission voted unanimously on Wednesday to remove the Florida manatee from the state's endangered species list. The move is already creating controversy among environmental groups that say manatees will not get the protection they need. … 'The commissioners are very much being pressured by development interests and to some extent boating interests that depend on consuming Florida wildlife and habitat,' said Patrick Rose, a biologist with the Save the Manatee Club." The Times continues, "The commission voted 7 to 0 to reclassify the manatee as a threatened species. The reclassification means that while the species is still at a high risk of extinction, the commission no longer considers it to be in imminent danger." The Times adds, "On the federal level, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service is re-evaluating the manatee's designation in the Endangered Species Act. … The process to reclassify the manatee in Florida began in 2001, when boating and development groups began a campaign against restrictions intended to protect the mammals. Since then, scientists working for the commission and others conducted studies and reviewed literature before advising commissioners that manatees no longer meet the criteria for listing as an endangered species. … The decision was based on several factors, including an increase in the manatee population to more than 3,000 this year from about 1,000 in the late 1970's."

Appeals Court Ruling Allows Oregon Logging-Rights Auction. The New York Times (6/9, Barringer) reports, "A legal struggle over logging in two roadless tracts of a national forest in Oregon ravaged by fire four years ago is coming to a conclusion as logging rights on more than 400 acres will be auctioned off by the Forest Service on Friday." The Times continues, "A federal appeals court ruled Wednesday that the sale could proceed. The timber sales, on two small tracts inside 500,000 fire-blighted acres, would not usually attract much attention — and indeed, it is unclear how much demand there will be for the timber, most of which has been dead and prey to insects and rot for four years. … But Oregon has long been the central battleground for environmental groups opposed to any logging anywhere on the 500,000 acres." The Times adds, "The objection is that logging could set back the regeneration of the forest by damaging fragile new growth, and that it would set a precedent for logging in an area that, under the currently approved plan for the Rogue River-Siskiyou National Forest, was supposed to remain roadless. .. Opening a roadless area at a time when governors are still drawing up proposals to indicate their preferences for where roads should and should not be built in the federal forests, drew the governors of Oregon, Washington, California and New Mexico to oppose these two sales."

CDC Says States Should Aim To Contain Bird Flu. The AP (6/9, Donald) reports, "States preparing for a possible bird flu outbreak should focus on how to contain the virus because a vaccine will be unavailable for several months," the head of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said Wednesday. "Out of the starting gate there won't be any vaccine, it'll take some time," Dr. Julie Gerberding told the AP. "So we've got to look at old-fashioned ways of slowing the virus down," she added.

CDC Urged To Broaden Scope Of Seasonal Flu Vaccines To Combat Bird Flu. CQ Homeland Security (6/9, Berger) reports scientists and medical experts are calling on the CDC to "expand recommendations for who should be vaccinated against the seasonal flu this fall because of potential benefits against an outbreak of an avian flu pandemic." Robert Webster, an influenza specialist at St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, told congressional aides Wednesday that the "current vaccine that is available will give you some basic immunity from the (avian flu) virus." Curtis Allen, a CDC spokesman, said the advisory committee "will discuss later this month whether to expand the recommendations further."

DOJ_NMG_0032785

Senate Seen As Unlikely To Debate New Energy Legislation Soon. CQ (6/9, Tollefson) reports, "There was a time when Republicans in both chambers were eyeing June as a showcase month for energy legislation, but those hopes are fading rapidly in the Senate." Although Republican leaders are "leaving the door open," CQ says, "don't look for them to bring a comprehensive energy bill to the floor anytime soon." Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M., is "expected to hold hearings on some kind of bipartisan energy legislation this month, but even targeted measures are unlikely to move before the July Fourth recess."

Campaign Seeks To Increase US Energy Independence. The Christian Science Monitor (6/9, Knickerbocker) reports, "In Washington this week, a bipartisan group of lawmakers, industry leaders (including the three Detroit automakers), farm groups, governors, county officials, and environmentalists launched an effort to have the nation get 25 percent of its total energy from renewable sources by 2025." The proposal, which as been dubbed "25x'25," goes "well beyond what Congress and the White House have enacted so far, and it's likely to encounter environmental and economic speed bumps along the way," the Monitor says. Boosters believe "a critical mass of public support has developed that puts a strong political wind at their backs." Meanwhile, a recent poll by Public Opinion Strategies of Alexandria, Va., "shows that 98 percent see shifting to domestically-produced renewable energy sources as important for the country" with 74 percent agreeing that it is "very important."

Vermont Yankee License Review May Be Widened After 9th Circuit Decision. The Vermont Guardian (6/9, Avard, Casa) reports, "In earlier meetings with local groups, NRC officials said nuclear waste storage; emergency planning and existing problems at Vermont Yankee would be excluded from the review." However, a recent 9th Circuit appeals court decision "ordered the NRC to assess potential effects of a terrorist strike at the Diablo Canyon reactor near San Luis Obispo in the scope of an environmental review of dry cask storage at that plant." NRC environmental project manager for the VY application, Rick Emch, "said he didn't want to speculate as to how the 9th Circuit decision might affect the VY process," but "NRC environmental branch division chief Rani Franovich said the decision could have 'broad-reaching implications' for all licenses currently under review."

Ruling May Affect Skull Valley Storage Site Appeal. The Salt Lake Tribune (6/9, Fahys) reports that in the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision, the judges "Several times…mentioned the commission's arguments against undertaking a similar study for the proposed" Skull Valley Nuclear Waste Storage site in Utah – that a terrorist strike was too unlikely to be considered. The NRC "rebuffed Utah's requests to examine terrorist risks" three times. Now, "Assistant Utah Attorney General Denise Chancellor said Wednesday the commission's reasoning in both cases was identical, and she hinted that the Washington, D.C., appeals court judges now considering the state's appeal of the Skull Valley license might have a similar outcome."

Radioactive Water Spilled At Arkansas Nuclear One. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (6/9, Elliott) reports, "Between 500 and 1000 gallons of slightly radioactive water spilled from a pool inside Arkansas Nuclear One on May 30" after "a miscalculation…meant too much water was poured into a 'tilt pit.'" The overflow "was contained in the Russellville power plant and never endangered plant employees or the public." Still, Nuclear Regulatory Commission spokesman Victor Dricks said resident inspectors "will conduct a follow-up review in the next few weeks to look at what steps Entergy has taken to identify the cause of the spill."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maryland Man Charged In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic. The Baltimore Sun (6/9, Fuller) reports, "A Prince George's County man who authorities say was planning to attack an abortion clinic was arrested on charges of manufacturing an explosive device, a pipe bomb that detonated in a friend's house as authorities tried to disable it." The Sun continues, "Robert F. Weiler Jr., 25, who had a loaded gun at the time of his arrest, surrendered to police early Thursday at a Garrett County highway rest stop, authorities said. … Weiler was charged with possessing an illegal explosive device, making an illegal explosive device, illegally possessing a firearm with a previous felony conviction and possessing a stolen firearm." The Sun adds, "Police said that the target was a College Park abortion clinic and doctors who performed the procedures. … The bomb -- made with black powder, galvanized pipe, nails, seven feet of fuse and one-inch-diameter end caps -- was discovered in the closet of a friend's home in Riverdale and detonated about 3:30 a.m., after Prince George's police bomb technicians were unable to disable it, said Mike Campbell, a spokesman for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

DOJ_NMG_0032786

The Washington Post (6/9, B1, Klein, Rich) reports that Weiler "admitted planning the attack and also told investigators that he intended to 'shoot doctors who perform abortions,' according to a law enforcement affidavit." The Post continues, "Weiler, a convicted felon, was arrested at a rest stop in Western Maryland early yesterday and charged with unlawful possession of the pipe bomb and other offenses. He was expected to appear today in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. … According to the affidavit, which was signed by two agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, authorities learned Wednesday that Weiler had told associates he planned to bomb an abortion clinic. As investigators pursued leads that evening, Weiler contacted them by phone, saying he was at the rest stop in Garrett County and wanted to surrender, the agents wrote. … Weiler also said he had concealed the pipe bomb at a house in the 5700 block of 67th Avenue in the Riverdale Heights area, agents Christopher Hermann and Matthew M. Baccio wrote."

The AP (6/9) reports, "Weiler was charged in U.S. District Court on four counts that included making a destructive device and possessing an illegal handgun. He was being held Thursday afternoon at the Garrett County Detention Center. … Weiler had earlier stolen money from his parents and told friends that he had a gun and bomb for his attack, according to the affidavit. On Wednesday night, some of those friends revealed his plans to the ATF and Prince George's County police. … After Weiler called the ATF later that night, Maryland state troopers arrested him without incident. In his car was the handgun and a magazine with ammunition."

Congress Suggests MLB Tests Players For Use Of Growth Hormone. The Washington Post (6/9, Bryant) reports, "Fifteen months after a seminal confrontation with Major League Baseball over its drug-testing policy, members of Congress expressed disappointment yesterday over the inability of the sport to deter the use of performance-enhancing drugs and suggested that baseball consider instituting regular blood testing of its players for human growth hormone. The reaction came two days after more than a dozen federal agents raided the home of released Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley, who federal investigators say admitted to using growth hormone, anabolic steroids and amphetamines and also implicated other major league players."

In the Wall Street Journal (6/8), Carl Bialik and Jason Fry write, "There was good news of a sort for baseball…Mr. Grimsley said he stopped using steroids after baseball put a new testing regimen in place, and his detailing of the amphetamine culture was past-tense. But that just puts HGH even more squarely in the spotlight: At this point urine tests won't detect HGH -- only blood testing has a chance to do that, and baseball's current testing plan doesn't include blood tests."

In the Arizona Republic (6/9), Joseph A. Reaves notes, "A now-famous affidavit by a federal agent that The Arizona Republic obtained this week has a troubling paragraph that begins: 'Grimsley stated that ...' The word after that is redacted, one of 29 black marks between pages 12 and 15 of the affidavit that have created a world of suspicion and angst."

Mike Lopresti writes in USA Today's sports section (6/9), "Baseball might be weary of its closets being explored for drugs, but clearly, the feds are not weary of looking."

USA Today (6/8, Nightengale) also reports MLB vice president Rob Manfred said, "Human growth hormone, however, is a problem for all sports because there is no universally accepted and validated test — either blood or urine. No governing body in any sport has ever been able to discipline an athlete for the use of HGH. Major League Baseball understands that its policy must continue to evolve to keep pace with scientific development."

For the AP (6/9), sports columnist Jim Litke writes, "Less important than who used performance-enhancers is how many, because it's the only way to begin gauging how much of the offensive barrage we just witnessed was simply better hitting through chemistry."

Former Companion Of Bonds Advised Not To Cooperate With Mitchell Investigation. The New York Times (6/9, Curry, Chass) today reports, "The lawyer for Kimberly Bell, Barry Bonds's former companion, told George Mitchell yesterday that she has been advised by federal authorities not to cooperate with Mitchell's investigation into steroid use in baseball because of 'the pending criminal proceeding.' While the lawyer, Martin Garbus, did not specify a proceeding, in all likelihood he was referring to the investigation of Bonds and the question of whether he committed perjury while testifying in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid distribution case. … Because federal investigators asked Bell to avoid Mitchell, it is a strong indication that they are actively pursuing perjury charges and possibly additional charges of financial malfeasance against Bonds."

DOJ_NMG_0032787

More Heroin Overdoses Reported In Pennsylvania, 4 Arrested In Raid. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/9, Greenwood) reports two more people "died Thursday after overdosing on heroin, bringing the death toll in Allegheny County to at least eight since a potent strain of the drug hit the streets last week. Pittsburgh police raided two Hazelwood homes hours after the deaths, arresting four people and seizing 40 stamp bags of heroin and an alligator."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/9, Silver) reports, "Police would not identify those arrested or indicate the charges pending against them, citing the integrity of their investigation into the source of the heroin that might have caused 48 overdoses, eight of them fatal, since Saturday. Narcotics Cmdr. Maurita Bryant said during a news conference that the stamp bags seized yesterday were marked differently from a batch called 'Get High or Die Trying' that has tested positive for the powerful painkiller fentanyl."

KDKA-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8) reports on its Web site, "The latest deaths make eight fatalities, among dozens of non-fatal overdoses in Pittsburgh and Allegheny County."

Local TV Coverage. WNPA-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Today is day six of the overdose outbreak in southwestern Pennsylvania, and that batch of lethal heroin continues to cause both concern and heartache in our area. This three foot alligator was one of the items seized when Pittsburgh narcotics detectives showed up at two homes on Flowers Avenue and Hazelwood, a neighborhood where police have been especially active because of two fatal and several nonfatal heroin overdoses in recent days. Four men were taken into custody."

WPXI-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "More people dying to get high. Two more deaths, bringing the total to 10 on the deadly heroin. … Police arrested four possible heroin suspects in Hazelwood today. Seven have been arrested since last Friday."

WTAE-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "New developments in the deadly heroin that's killing people. Today we learned of two more fatal overdoses. … Pittsburgh police led an army of law enforcement personnel to break up the distribution of heroin called Get High or Die Trying. … It is striking that two more heroin deaths were recorded today. Right now investigators with Pittsburgh police say the two deaths are not connected or at least the heroin found on the two people are not connected to that fatal batch of Get High or Die Trying."

Health Alert Issued About Heroin Mixture. USA Today (6/9, Leinwand, Keen) reports, "Nearly two months after unusually potent heroin began killing scores of people in Chicago and several eastern cities, the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration on Thursday issued an alert to rehab centers and addiction specialists. … Heroin sold illegally in the USA typically is diluted with common household substances such as sugar, flour, quinine or starch. The mixing of heroin with a powerful drug such as fentanyl is highly unusual, according to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. The DEA is investigating whether a fentanyl lab in Guadalajara that was shut down last month by Mexican officials is linked to the deaths."

Overdose Suspected In Death Of Illinois Deputy Police Chief's Son. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/8) reports, "The son of a suburban deputy police chief was found dead in Chicago this week from an apparent drug overdose, and authorities are checking to see if his death is linked to fentanyl. … Six tin foil packets containing a white substance were found near his body, and the suspected drugs have been sent for testing, sources said."

WMAQ-TV, Chicago (6/8) also reported on the death of the deputy police chief's son.

DEA Lab Analyzing Heroin. On its Web site, WLS-TV, Chicago (6/8) reports, "Undercover agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration are now buying heroin off the streets of Chicago and other cities and bringing it back to this downtown lab for analysis. 'The heroin that's used on the street comes in very, very small amounts,' said Jim DeFranchesco, a DEA forensic chemist. Through his work and that of others, the feds have been able to trace some of Fentanyl back to a clandestine lab in Mexico. They also think it's possible that dealers are stealing legitimate supplies of the painkiller then using it to 'hype' their heroin."

DOJ_NMG_0032788

WLS-TV (6/8) also has posted overdose statistics on its Web site.

The McKeesport (IL) Daily News (6/8) reports U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said, "I'm astounded that there are people in this region whose addiction is so strong, they are willing to die just to get high."

Michigan Authorities Warn Public About Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. The Grand Rapids (MI) Press (6/8) says authorities are preparing for the possible arrival of fentanyl-laced heroin in Grand Rapids and are trying to head-off trouble by warning the public about it.

For Addicts, Fentanyl Possibly Easier To Obtain Than OxyContin. The Bluefield (WV) Daily Telegraph (6/8) reports the use of fentanyl "has been on the increase since intense media attention brought the OxyContin plague into the spotlight." It is possible fentanyl "is being used by hard-core addicts who have moved on to fentanyl from OxyContin because it may be easier to obtain."

Proposed End Of Army Support In U.S.-Bahamas Anti-Drug Effort Questioned. The AP (6/8, Anderson) reports U.S. lawmakers and Bahamian officials "say the proposed withdrawal of Army air support from a U.S.-Bahamas anti-drug effort could entice cocaine and marijuana smugglers to return to the islands and undo more than two decades of progress. … Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, citing war needs elsewhere, said in a letter last month that he intends to withdraw seven Army Blackhawk helicopters and their crews from Operation Bahamas, Turks and Caicos _ known as OPBAT for short." Joshua Sears, the Bahamas' ambassador to the U.S. said, "The traffickers obviously would see that as a signal to increase their activity."

Officials Say Escaped DC Inmates Had Accomplice. The Washington Post (6/9, B4, Cauvin, Dvorak) reports, "It began as a remarkably executed escape. In a matter of minutes, Ricardo Jones, 25, and Joseph Leaks, 32, were racing across 19th Street SE and onto a Metro shuttle bus that took them across the Anacostia River. But within hours, authorities were closing in, thanks largely to a system kept by the D.C. Department of Corrections that records calls made by the jail's approximately 1,800 inmates." The Post continues, "Authorities listened to recordings in which at least one of the inmates talked in code about the escape plan, law enforcement officials said. Records of the calls eventually led them to a man they identified as Harold Hines, who appeared to be in on the plot, the officials said." The Post adds, "The role of Hines was among the new details to emerge about how Jones and Leaks engineered the escape and how they were caught the next day. Hines, officials said, got Leaks the Fairfax County motel room where he was found and arrested. .. Saturday morning, Jones and Leaks broke into the warden's unoccupied office, used a heavy-duty floor-buffing machine to smash the window and then slid down a canopy to flee the D.C. jail and Southeast Washington. … Less than 10 hours later, Hines showed up at the Virginia Lodge on Richmond Highway in Fairfax County, told an employee that he had a couple of friends who were going to need a room for the night and paid the $77.85 bill upfront. … It was probably the last Hines thought he would see of the Virginia Lodge. But early the next morning, he was back, and this time he wasn't alone. Federal marshals and other investigators had found Hines, along with Leaks's brother, and persuaded Hines to aid in their investigation by leading them to the motel."

Connecticut Drug Operation Nets 43 Arrests. The AP (6/9) reports, "A yearlong undercover investigation resulted in arrest warrants Thursday charging 43 people with dealing drugs in the borough of Naugatuck (CT)." The AP continues, "Thirty-six suspects were in custody. Five others were either already in prison on other charges or hospitalized, said police Lt. Robert W. Harrison Jr." The AP adds, "The undercover operation, dubbed 'Save Our Streets,' began last year after Naugatuck authorities noticed an increase in drug overdoses, and several drug-related deaths, he said. … 'Undercover police started making undercover buys and that led to these charges,' he said. … The investigation was conducted by Naugatuck and Waterbury police, the Waterbury state's attorney's office, the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. marshals, the state Correction Department and the state Office of Adult Probation."

US Charges Two Illinois Men With Avoiding Tobacco Tax. The Daily Southtown (IL) (6/8, Hack) reports, "Two brothers from Burbank were arrested Wednesday on federal charges they sold truckloads of chewing tobacco, cigars and pipe tobacco here without paying the state's high excise tax." The Southtown continues,

DOJ_NMG_0032789

"Omar Dahla, 41, and Faride Dahla, 44 — who live in different houses in the 5700 block of West 83rd Street — were charged along with a third brother, Samer Dahla, of Lakeland, Fla." The Southtown adds, "According to federal authorities, the brothers ran a wholesale tobacco distribution business called United Brothers Five — which operated an office and two warehouses in Bedford Park — as well as another tobacco distribution business in Florida. They're accused of buying products classified as 'other tobacco products,' which doesn't include cigarettes and importing them to Illinois. … Wholesale tobacco distributors are responsible for collecting an 18 percent excise tax from retailers and turning over the money to the state. The brothers are accused of 'grossly underreporting' taxable sales of their products to Illinois retailers."

IMMIGRATION:

FBI Arrests Border Patrol Agent On Smuggling Bribery Charges. The San Diego Union-Tribune (6/9, Soto, 353K) reports, "For the second time this week, a border inspector was arrested and charged with waiving smugglers into the country in exchange for bribes. Customs and Border Protection Inspector Richard Elizalda of Chula Vista was indicted Friday, along with seven other people, on conspiracy and other charges," and Inspector Michael Gilliland "was brought into San Diego federal court Wednesday on similar charges. … 'These inspectors betrayed the trust of their countrymen,' said Stewart Roberts, the second highest-ranking agent at the San Diego FBI office. He said Elizalda collected $500 to $700 for every immigrant he illegally allowed to enter the country and Gilliland charged $1,500 per smuggled alien." The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Marosi, 958K) adds, "This week's cases, though unrelated, underline continuing corruption at the ports of entry despite efforts to curtail it. … 'The amount of money is tempting for someone who is not an honest individual,' said FBI Special Agent Andrew P. Black, who supervises the Border Corruption Task Force." The AP (6/9, Hoffman) also notes SAC Roberts said, "In both cases the inspectors betrayed the trust of their countrymen by accepting bribes from illegal alien smuggling organizations."

GOP May Split Immigration Reform Into Two Phases. The White House Bulletin/US News reports, "Republican strategists have a new scenario for passing an immigration bill this year. What's being discussed by senior GOP leaders around Washington is a two-stage plan under which the House and Senate would agree on a tough border-enforcement measure, to be followed by a guest-worker program after the enforcement provisions are put in place." The details have "yet to be worked out but a senior Republican says, 'A two-stage approach is do-able. It depends on George W. Bush. He needs to have members of Congress into the Oval Office one on one, the old-fashioned way, to twist arms. The issue cuts 435 different ways. It's different in Arizona and New Mexico than it is in Minnesota. There are so many cross currents that we'll need not only presidential leadership but presidential wisdom.'" But House conservatives are "so dug in with their support for tough border security and their opposition to 'amnesty' that only a concerted effort by Bush can turn things around, the strategists say. But they add a two-stage process might be the answer."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Harwood), meanwhile, reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Immigration debate drifts away from Bush. Even before [Rep.-elect Brian] Bilbray's tough talk helped him win San Diego House seat, lawmakers felt rising constituent pressure to crack down on border security. Republicans in both House and Senate mull possibility of passing security-only bill before midterm elections."

Powell Says Wall Won't Solve Illegal Immigration Problem. The AP (6/8) reports, "Former Secretary of State Colin Powell said Thursday that extending walls along the U.S.-Mexico border will not solve the problem of illegal immigration." Speaking at a business conference in Mexico City, Powell said that "a wall alone is not the answer." Powell also said that "any new barriers should include gates and other entrances to provide easy-access between both countries."

Immigrants Applying For Citizenship In Record Numbers. Immigrants nationwide are applying for US citizenship in record numbers in what the Wall Street Journal (6/9, Raghavan, Brulliard) calls "a move to protect themselves at a time of political uncertainty." Many immigrants "fear that laws could toughen, preventing them from becoming naturalized or from bringing relatives into the United States; others appear to be motivated by the chance to obtain more rights and boost their political clout through voting." The Journal adds, "Between January and April, immigrants filed 251,385 applications, an 18 percent increase from the same period last year, immigration officials said yesterday. They also report a record surge in petitions to sponsor relatives for residency, also up 18 percent for the time period."

DOJ_NMG_0032790

Texas To Put Video Cameras Along Mexican Border. Texas Gov. Rick Perry has announced a $5 million plan to install night-vision cameras on private land along the US-Mexican border. Perry would also put the live video on the Internet, so that anyone who spots illegal immigrants can report it on a toll-free hotline. The AP (6/9, Caldwell) reports, "The plan marks a political about-face for Perry, a Republican seeking re-election, who has long argued that security along the state's 1,200-mile border with Mexico is strictly a federal responsibility. This week, he said cuts in federal homeland security funding, a rise in reports of border violence and the crossing of Mexican soldiers into Texas about two years ago have demonstrated that 'Texas cannot wait for Washington, D.C., to act.'"

Trevio Says Spanish Language Will Persist In US. Writer Marisa Trevio says in a USA Today (6/9) op-ed that the only common ground lawmakers have found in the immigration debate is that "the border must be secured and the insistence that English should be the national language. Though lawmakers suggest the English amendment would be symbolic, there is an unspoken hope that it would significantly alter the use of Spanish in this country." Trevio adds, "Even though English-only proponents are working toward the day when Spanish is rarely heard, they shouldn't hold their breath. … Proficiency might vary with each generation, but the need to keep Spanish alive will persist, no matter what is declared the national language."

TAX:

Senate GOP Falls Short In Effort Hold Up-Or-Down Vote On Estate Tax Repeal. NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 10, 0:35, Williams) reported, "The Senate today voted down an effort to abolish the estate tax, sometimes called the death tax, on inherited wealth. President Bush has already cut it, but those cuts are due to expire in five years. The vote today fell three senators short. Majority Leader Frist, who calls the tax unfair, says the Senate will vote on it again this year. Democrats said they'll oppose it again as a budget-busting giveaway to the wealthiest Americans."

The AP (6/9, Dalrymple) notes Senators "voted 57-41 to advance the bill, but that was three votes short of the 60 needed to overcome objections from a majority of Democrats and a pair of Republicans." Those opposed to the bill "said it would deliver an unwise tax cut when the government needed more money to balance its budget and to wage war." Republicans "staged the vote knowing they did not have the 60 votes to prevail on repealing the tax, a top priority of many GOP voters. Some of the tax's biggest critics had hoped they could attract a few extra votes by extending a cooperative hand to Democrats."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Mullins, Matthews) notes "two Republicans voted against the estate-tax repeal, Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and George Voinovich of Ohio. Four Democrats voted with Republicans: Sens. Max Baucus of Montana, Bill Nelson of Florida, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas. Mr. Voinovich said that he didn't want to vote for further tax cuts at a time when the government is in deficit." The Democrats "voted for the legislation because they believe the estate tax unfairly punishes farmers and small-business owners."

Bloomberg (6/9, Donmoyer) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said Republicans were focusing on a tax that affects less than 1 percent of the population while ignoring higher priority items such as gas prices, uninsured workers, a rising national debt, and an outdated minimum wage." The vote "leaves in question the fate of an alternative proposal championed by Republican Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona and Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa that has gained some support from Democrats. That proposal would only tax estates valued at more than $10 million at rates of between 15 percent and 30 percent."

USA Today (6/9, Wolf) says that "by blocking repeal, most Senate Democrats and two Republicans dealt a blow to Bush's top domestic priority: making the tax cuts passed in 2001 and 2003 permanent," while the New York Times (6/9, Andrews) reports Republicans "are now debating whether to give up on their goal and attack Democrats in the coming midterm elections as obstructionists on a measure that they say has considerable support, or settle for a bipartisan measure that would stop short of eliminating the tax entirely."

The Washington Post (6/9, A6, Birnbaum) reports, "According to the staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, repealing the estate tax would cost the government $71.6 billion a year by 2015. The Treasury Department estimated the revenue loss at $65.8 billion that year. … Not many people are forced to pay the estate tax. According to the Internal Revenue Service, only 1.17 percent of people who died in 2002 left a taxable estate." The House, "acting at the urging of President Bush, has already voted overwhelmingly to permanently repeal the estate tax."

DOJ_NMG_0032791

The Washington Times (6/9, Hurt) says Democrats "filibustered yet another attempt to eliminate the so-called 'death tax,' which Republicans say unfairly taxes already-taxed money and is crippling family farms and small businesses." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "defended the tax as necessary to keep up with government spending." The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Simon) also reports the story.

WSJournal Criticizes Democratic "Flip-Floppers." The Wall Street Journal (6/9) editorializes, "The only two Republicans to oppose repeal were George Voinovich of Ohio and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, who sometimes seems to want to lose his primary this year." But "special credit belongs to four Democratic Senators who voted against repeal yesterday after they'd run for office pledging the opposite. They are Evan Bayh of Indiana, who perhaps had in mind Democratic Presidential primary voters, not the home folks who elected him; Mary Landrieu of Louisiana; Mark Pryor of Arkansas; and Ron Wyden of Oregon. These flip-floppers voted not only to retain the tax but to increase it -- from zero in 2010 back to 55% in 2011 and forever after."

More Commentary. The New York Times (6/9) editorializes, "Any day in which the House or Senate refrains from doing something destructive is about as good as it gets in Washington lately. Yesterday, the Senate cleared that low bar when it rejected efforts to repeal the estate tax. The nation is at war and the budget is so wildly out of balance that the government cannot pay its bills without borrowing money from foreign investors. The idea that this is a good moment to repeal a tax on people who inherit multimillion-dollar estates is mind-boggling."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House, Senate Reach Agreement On Spending Bill For War, Katrina Recovery. The Washington Post (6/9, A6, Murray) reports, "House and Senate negotiators reached agreement last night on a $94.5 billion package to pay for Iraq war and hurricane recovery costs, after shaving numerous extraneous provisions that the Senate had wanted to stuff into the bill." The bill, which is "expected to reach President Bush's desk next week," would designate "$65.8 billion to the Pentagon to cover troop pay, provide recruiting incentives, buy new body armor and fund continued operations of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, among other items. Diplomacy projects in the region would receive $3.9 billion in new funding." The bill would also "provide $19.8 billion in hurricane relief, exactly what President Bush had requested, but nearly $9 billion less than the Senate had sought."

After Veto Threat, Final Product Lower Than Bush's Original Request. The Washington Post (6/9, A6, Murray) reports "some Republicans in the Senate, including Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, who represents storm-ravaged Mississippi, had viewed the must-pass bill as an opportunity to address other pressing needs. The Senate bill wound up exceeding Bush's original $92.2 billion request by $14 billion." But "a White House veto threat dampened the mood, and Republican leaders in both chambers worried that the appearance of out-of-control spending could hurt them in the November elections. They touted the final product -- even lower than what Bush was willing to accept -- as a victory for their cause."

Bush Makes Pitch For Line-Item Veto. CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush made another pitch today that he and other future presidents should have the ability to make line-item vetoes. To make his point, Mr. Bush called in some of the nation's governors, many of whom do have such power in their own states."

Senate Approves Cox, Luddington Judicial Nominations. The AP (6/9) reports, "The Senate on Thursday confirmed Wayne County, Mich., Circuit Judge Sean Cox and Midland County, Mich., Circuit Judge Thomas Ludington to serve on the federal bench, ending a nomination process that had stalled for years." The Senate "unanimously approved both judges, who had stressed their respect for judicial restraint and legal precedent during a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this spring."

Schwab Confirmed As US Trade Representative. The AP (6/9, Crutsinger) reports, "Susan Schwab won Senate confirmation on Thursday to be President Bush's top trade negotiator." Schwab "was approved as the new US trade representative by voice vote. She succeeds Rob Portman, who was picked by the president in April to be the new White House budget director." The AFP (6/9) notes Schwab "said she was 'honoured.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032792

CBC Opposes Effort To Strip Jefferson Of Committee Post. The Congressional Black Caucus has opposed efforts by the Democratic leadership to strip Rep. William Jefferson of his committee post. The AP (6/9, Espo) reports that the Caucus "said the Louisiana lawmaker deserves a 'presumption of innocence.'" Jefferson "has not been indicted and has denied all wrongdoing in connection with a federal bribery investigation that has netted two convictions."

CQ (6/8, Ferrechio) reported that the CBC "thwarted House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's effort to oust embattled Rep. William J. Jefferson from the Ways and Means Committee. The House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee voted to recommend the involuntary removal of the Louisiana Democrat from the powerful tax-writing panel, but a rule challenge from the Congressional Black Caucus prevented a vote on the matter by the entire Democratic Caucus until next week."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Hennessy-Fiske) reports that efforts to oust Jefferson from his committee post appear "headed for a vote by all of the House's Democrats, setting up a debate over Jefferson, who is being investigated by federal officials in a bribery case. … Democratic rank-and-file members are expected to vote on the recommendation at a meeting likely to take place next week. Ultimately, a vote by the full House -- including Republicans -- would be required to force Jefferson from the committee."

Average Age Of Congress Rising. USA Today (6/9, Kiely) reports that the average age of members of the Senate in January 2005 "60.4 years old. That's the oldest it has ever been, according to the Senate Historical Office. The House's average age is 55, the oldest since at least 1949. The national median age in 2004 was 36.2."

Congress Said To Have Cleared Way For Foreign Control Of Domestic Airlines. One of the few non-Zarqawi stories to win broadcast time last night appeared on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (6/8, 6:22 p.m.), with host Dobbs saying foreign investors "are poised to take over another crucial piece of American infrastructure. And again, the White House, the Defense Department, and Department of Homeland Security are doing absolutely nothing to stop it." CNN (Tucker) reported, "The outrage over foreign ownership of U.S. ports apparently taught many in Washington nothing. Congress has just cleared the way to give foreign investors functional control of domestic airlines, removing any roadblocks to the Department of Transportation's changing of a 65-year-old rule prohibiting foreign control of America's airlines. … How this would affect the Department of Defense's relationship with the airlines, which ferry troops and equipment in the time of war, is not clear. While the Department of Defense has verbally okayed the deal, the DOD has refused to put that okay in writing. And in the eyes of critics, it's one more industry where the United States is relinquishing its role."

38.7 Million Have Signed Up For Medicare Drug Benefit. The AP (6/8, Freking) reported, "About 11.5 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit by the May 15 enrollment deadline, bringing the number of beneficiaries with drug coverage to 38.7 million, officials said Thursday." Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt "said an analysis of the enrollment numbers showed that people chose plans that charged the lowest premiums -- $23 on average versus original estimates of $37. … The numbers are in line with what the Bush administration projected in January 2005."

Bush Approval Rating Rebounds to 33% In Harris Interactive Poll. The Wall Street Journal (6/8) reported on its web site, "President Bush's job approval rating rebounded in the latest Harris Interactive poll. Of 1,001 U.S. adults surveyed in a telephone poll June 2-5, 33% think Mr. Bush is doing an 'excellent or pretty good' job as president, up from 29% -- the lowest mark of his presidency -- in the previous poll conducted in May." The poll "was conducted before the death of Iraqi insurgent leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi. Following the capture of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, Mr. Bush's approval numbers climbed."

Nicholson Says Stolen VA Data May Have Been Erased. The AP (6/9, Yen) reports that Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said yesterday that stolen personal data for 26.5 million veterans and military personnel "may have been erased by teenagers who sold the computer equipment, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said Thursday." Nicholson "explained that the burglary occurred in an Aspen Hill, Md., neighborhood in which there had been a pattern of thefts by young burglars who took computer equipment, wiped them clean of the data and then sold them on college campus or high schools. … Lawmakers were skeptical. They noted that the committee and the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm, had warned the VA for years that security was lax."

DOJ_NMG_0032793

Measure Would Help Insurers Get Share Of Personal Injury Suits. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Francis) reports that some lawmakers and employee advocates say a provision of the pension bill under negotiation right now "could make it easier for employers and health insurers to gain a share of money that workers win in personal injury suits. The House and Senate passed different versions of the pension legislation last year, and are negotiating to reconcile them, in a process expected to continue for weeks. The Senate bill doesn't include a similar provision on benefit-plan recoveries." The bill "would let insurers step ahead of injured employees when it comes to divvying up a legal settlement or judgment."

Panel Says Communication Policies Jeopardize Scientific Findings. An independent group of scientists that advises Congress and the White House says that inconsistent policies for communicating scientific findings to the public are jeopardizing the quality and credibility of government research. The New York Times (6/9, Revkin) reports, "The group, the National Science Board, examined the issue at the request of Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona. Mr. McCain sought the review in February after Civil Service workers and scientists at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and other agencies complained publicly that political appointees had interfered with efforts to discuss global warming and other controversial issues."

WPost Says Congress Should Regulate 527s. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/9, A22) says, "The independent political groups known as 527s are a new force in American politics." The FEC has "washed its hands of any attempt to write rules governing their behavior. Broad regulation, the FEC said, was 'inadvisable'; instead, it would rely on case-by-case adjudication of whether the 527s were so immersed in federal campaigns that they had to comply with campaign finance laws. Not surprisingly for anyone familiar with the glacial pace of FEC operations, that has resulted in almost no enforcement at all." The Post adds, "The FEC's foot-dragging underscores the need for congressional action on the subject, something Republicans are pushing and Democrats are fighting because of perceived partisan advantage."

OTHER NEWS:

White House Forecasts 3.6% GDP Growth In 2006. The Wall Street Journal (6/9) reports, "The White House raised its forecast for both economic growth and consumer-price inflation this year, while indicating both would be slower in 2007. … Inflation-adjusted gross domestic product is now expected to increase 3.6% this year, up two-tenths of a percentage point from the Bush administration's previous forecast, which was released in December. That would be a slight increase from the 3.5% expansion in 2005." GDP "is seen slowing to 3.3% next year and slowing slightly more in following years to a rate at or above 3% a year through 2011, according to the new White House forecast." For inflation, the White House "raised its forecast for overall consumer-price-index growth in 2006 by six-tenths of a percentage point to 3%, compared with 3.7% CPI growth last year."

The AP (6/9, Aversa) says "the upgraded forecast comes despite a rise in energy prices and mostly reflects the big growth spurt in the opening quarter of this year. 'We continue to see signs that the U.S. economy is strong,' Treasury Secretary John Snow said." The White House also "expects the jobless rate for all of 2006 to drop to 4.7 percent, compared with its previous forecast of 5 percent." But "in 2007 the rate would inch up to 4.8 percent and to 4.9 percent in 2008, according to the new forecast. Still, that would be better than the old forecast, which had the jobless rates in 2007 and 2008 at 5 percent."

US Stock Markets Mixed As Foreign Exchanges Drop. USA Today (6/9, Krantz) reports, "Stocks dodged a collision with another nasty down day Thursday after several major indexes fought off getting plunged into correction territory." The Nasdaq "ended the day down 6.48 points to 2145.32. … The Standard & Poor's 500 index closed up 1.78 points to 1257.93, even after being down nearly 21 points earlier in the session," and "the Dow Jones industrial average completely reversed its early-day decline of 173 points to rise 7.92 points to 10,938.82. The Dow is up 2.1% this year." NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 11, 0:15, Williams) also noted the US stock numbers, noting major indexes "finished narrowly mixed."

DOJ_NMG_0032794

The Financial Times (6/9, Guha, Brown-Humes, Tassell), meanwhile, says "global markets plunged on Thursday as central banks around the world lined up to raise interest rates amid mounting concern over inflation and growth. … The European Central Bank as well as banks in South Korea, India, Denmark and South Africa, all increased rates." The Washington Post (6/9, D1, Masters, Henderson) headlines a similar story "Global Markets Suffer A Hit," while the Wall Street Journal (6/9, Browning) titles its report "As Foreign Stocks Slide, US Holds Ground."

Household Debt Up In First Quarter 2006. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Conkey) reports, "American households increased their borrowing in the first quarter a bit faster than they did in the fourth quarter, but a robust economy and rising home values led to a gain in net worth, quarterly data from the Federal Reserve show. Despite expectations that consumers would begin to scale back borrowing, household debt grew at an 11.6% annual rate in the first quarter, up from 11.1% in the fourth quarter." Mortgage debt "rose by more than $250 billion during the period." The Journal adds, "Many economists thought household borrowing would decline in the first quarter because of rising interest rates, which make mortgages, home-equity lines and other loans more expensive"

DC Sues InPhonic Over Restrictive Rebate Procedures. The Washington Post (6/9, D4, Shin) reports, "The D.C. attorney general is suing InPhonic Inc., accusing it of failing to deliver on rebates after the District-based retailer of wireless services and cellphones racked up more than 2,000 consumer complaints over the past three years." The Post continues, "In a suit filed yesterday in D.C. Superior Court, the attorney general's office alleges the company imposes 'unusually restrictive conditions' on its rebates, making it 'difficult or impossible' for consumers to obtain them. … In addition, some consumers who contacted the company for assistance in obtaining rebates were routed to automated messages or to live representatives who were not helpful, the complaint said." The Post adds, "As a result of such policies, a majority of consumers who purchase wireless phones and plans through InPhonic either 'never receive the advertised rebates' or are able to secure them only after following 'onerous procedures,' the complaint said."

Frustrated Judge Orders Lawyers To End Squabble With Child's Game. The New York Times (6/9, Liptak) reports, "Fed up with the inability of two lawyers to agree on a trivial issue in an insurance lawsuit, a federal judge in Florida this week ordered them to 'convene at a neutral site' and 'engage in one (1) game of "rock, paper, scissors"' to settle the matter." The Times continues, "Childish lawyers are commonplace, but the use of children's games to resolve litigation disputes is apparently a new development. The judge, Gregory A. Presnell of Federal District Court in Orlando, wrote that his innovation was 'a new form of alternative dispute resolution.'" The Times adds, "The proximate cause of Judge Presnell's ruling, issued Tuesday, was a motion saying the two lawyers in the case could not agree about where to conduct the deposition of a witness. The choices were the building where they both work, four floors apart, or a court reporter's office down the street. … Judge Presnell's order indicated that deciding such things was not part of the job of a federal judge. Still, wary that the lawyers would start a new battle over where to conduct the rock-paper-scissors showdown, Judge Presnell gave them a default site: the front steps of the federal courthouse in Tampa. … That will not be necessary, said David J. Pettinato, a lawyer for the plaintiff. He and his adversary have agreed to meet on June 30, Mr. Pettinato said, at 'an undisclosed location.'"

Federal Judge Benefits From Connections To Old Friend. The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Goodman, Rempel) runs a lengthy investigative piece on US District Judge James C. Mahan and his relationship with businessman George Swarts. The Times reports, "Without help from a friend, James Mahan might never have become a Las Vegas state judge. Certainly he wouldn't have gotten one of the top judicial jobs in town: a lifetime appointment to the federal bench. … Then again, without Mahan, his friend George Swarts would never have gotten to run an Internet porn business, a hotel-casino hair salon or a Southern California software company. Indeed, the careers of Judge James C. Mahan, 62, and his friend George C. Swarts, also 62, whom he appointed again and again as a receiver to manage troubled businesses, might be the ultimate example of how juice replaces justice in Las Vegas courtrooms." The Times continues, "In this town, people speak reverently of having juice, or an 'in,' and Mahan — bearded, likable but sometimes caustic — has made it a striking feature in his courtroom. First as a state judge and now as a federal judge, he has approved more than $4.8 million in judgments and fees during more than a dozen cases in which a recent search of court records found no statement that he disclosed his relationships with those who benefited from his decisions." The Times adds, "On the state bench for three years, and since his appointment as a U.S. District Court judge four years ago by President Bush, Mahan has approved many of these fees for Swarts, a certified public accountant who had served as his judicial campaign treasurer and whose political connections got him appointed. Mahan approved additional fees for Frank A. Ellis III, 51, a former law partner with whom the judge still owned property and participated in a profit-sharing plan. Ellis also provided free legal services for Mahan's family and for his executive judicial assistant. … Mahan, like a number of Las Vegas judges, has taken on cases despite state and federal prohibitions against such apparent conflicts. Some Las Vegas judges have ruled in cases involving their friends, even those to whom they owe money."

DOJ_NMG_0032795

Panel Calls For Guaranteed Health Care By 2012. A non partisan advisory panel created by Congress has recommended that the federal government guarantee a core set of health benefits for all Americans by 2012. The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports that the recommendation is notable because "the legislation that created the 15-member Citizens' Health Care Working Group requires the president to comment and five congressional committees to hold hearings." The recommendations "call for immediate and long-range changes. In the near term, all Americans should have protection against catastrophic healthcare expenses, either through a government program or a private insurance plan, the panel recommended."

DeLay Touts Principled Partisanship. The AP (6/9, Gamboa) reports, "Former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, bowing to legal and ethical troubles, said goodbye to the House on Thursday with a parting shot at his liberal opponents. Some Democrats walked out during the farewell. The 11-term Republican from Texas, said it is customary for departing lawmakers to 'reminisce about the 'good old days' of political harmony and across-the-aisle camaraderie.' 'I can't do that,' he said. 'For all its faults, it is partisanship -- based on core principles -- that clarifies our debates, that prevents one party from straying too far from the mainstream and that constantly refreshes our politics with new ideas and new leaders,' DeLay said." The AP adds, "A Democrat could be heard telling colleagues to walk out of the House chamber as DeLay criticized liberals, who he said stand for 'more government, more taxation, more control over people's lives and decisions and wallets.' At least two dozen Democratic lawmakers rose and left."

The Washington Post (6/9, A3, Grunwald) headlines its report "DeLay Pulls No Punches In Final Speech To House," and says that Democrats who skipped the speech "missed a classic performance by the Hammer. It wasn't all fire-breathing; DeLay, a foster parent, spoke eloquently about the nation's dysfunctional child-welfare system. He also waxed lyrical about his newfound appreciation for Washington's landmarks, now that he has had some free time to explore them after his ouster as majority leader." But "it was surely no accident that what really stood out for him at the Lincoln Memorial was that Honest Abe's left hand was clenched into a fist. DeLay has never been much for 'malice towards none.'"

The Washington Times (6/9, Bellantoni) quotes DeLay saying, "If conservatives don't stand up to liberalism, no one will." He said so "to hissing from the opposite side of the aisle."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Reynolds) notes DeLay said "true statesmen 'are not defined by what they compromise, but what they don't.'" Republicans "greeted DeLay with a standing ovation as he opened his speech, as did the Democrats in the chamber." But "as his remarks became more incendiary and Democrats exited, the Republicans largely held their applause -- except when DeLay introduced his wife, who was in the gallery, and praised the Capitol Police." The Times adds, "One Democrat who stayed to the end was Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., D-Ill. He also was one of the few Democrats who crossed to the Republican side of the chamber after the speech, giving DeLay a hug." Jackson "said that while he does not share DeLay's priorities, he thought walking out was 'not in the best interests of class.'"

The New York Times (6/9, Hulse) reports, "To Mr. DeLay's critics, who include Democrats and some Republicans, the day should have come sooner. They say Mr. DeLay represents, and is responsible for, much that is wrong with the current Congress. Detractors say that in alliance with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the man he handpicked for the top post in 1998, Mr. DeLay trampled legislative traditions in the House and fostered an environment of loose ethical standards that resulted in the growing corruption scandals on Capitol Hill." The Times adds, "Appropriately enough, Democrats and Republicans bickered one last time on Thursday over Mr. DeLay." Democrats "resisted a Republican plan to allow him to deliver his valedictory from the House floor. But Mr. DeLay crossed them up by submitting his resignation from the Appropriations Committee on the floor, providing an opening for his speech celebrating political discord."

DOJ_NMG_0032796

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Crowley) reported that Rep. Tom DeLay "ends his two-decade-long Washington career in Tom DeLay fashion." Asked what he is proudest of, DeLay said, "Pushing the conservative cause. Changing the culture of this town. Bringing the conservative world view into the mainstream." Asked what he most regrets, DeLay said, "I don't have any regrets." CNN added, "The significant chance that Democrats might retake the House has dampened Republican spirits as they head into fall elections. In a private goodbye, DeLay told colleagues to snap out of it."

DeLay Aide Took Trips "Indirectly" Funded By Firms With Business Before Congress. The Washington Post (6/9, A4, Smith) reports, "A former chief of staff to then-House Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) was described yesterday in a nonprofit groups' study as one of the top two recipients of privately financed travel among congressional staff from 2000 to 2005, including some trips paid indirectly by companies with business pending before Congress." Susan Hirschmann, DeLay's chief of staff from 1997 "until she became a Washington lobbyist in 2002," took "18 trips from 2000 to 2002 -- many with her husband -- at a cost to others of more than $85,000, according to a tally by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service." That "put her in a close second place behind Brian Gaston, whose 39 trips over the five-year period studied by the groups cost $87,000. Gaston is now the chief of staff to House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.)."

Krugman Blasts "DeLay Principle." Columnist Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (6/9) that DeLay "has since been dethroned, but the DeLay Principle lives on." The "DeLay Principle isn't really that hard to understand: it's just like the Roosevelt Principle, but the other way around. These days, the state — or rather, the political coalition that controls the state, and depends on campaign contributions to maintain that control -- owes a peculiar obligation to men of great wealth. And nothing is more important than cutting these men's taxes, even in the face of a war."

Texas Republicans Jockey For Candidate To Replace DeLay.. The Christian Science Monitor (6/9, Axtman) reports that the race to replace Rep. Tom DeLay as the Republican nominee on the November ballot is heating up. Democrats "in his suburban Houston district hope that DeLay has tarnished his party enough to give them a victory." The Monitor adds, "To find his replacement, the four counties that make up District 22 will each hold Republican caucuses this summer and select a precinct chair. Those four will then each cast a vote to choose the candidate for the ballot." The district "is heavily Republican, and a Democratic win is a long shot - even for the well-financed and well-known former Congressman Nick Lampson, say political scientists."

Rumsfeld Praises Summers' Support For ROTC. The Washington Times (6/9, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has sent a letter to outgoing Harvard President Lawrence H. Summers praising the educator's support for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC). Harvard is not always a friendly place for the U.S. military. … But Mr. Summers openly embraced Harvard's 50 or so ROTC students, a move that did little to ingratiate himself to the university's overwhelming liberal faculty, which worked to force his resignation, effective June 30."

Dionne Calls Election Results "Sobering" For California Liberals. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (6/9, A23) that "the truly sobering news" for California liberals in this week's voting "was in the statewide voting. Proposition 82, the ballot measure that would have guaranteed access to preschool for all of California's 4-year-olds, went down to resounding defeat, 61 to 39 percent. Not only that, voters also rejected a $600 million bond measure for the state's libraries. A vote against libraries ? Yes, the bonds went down 53 to 47 percent. … It gives me no joy to say these things, since I wish both California propositions had passed. But realism is not the enemy of idealism, and taxpayers aren't being selfish when they place a heavy burden on those who would ask them to part with some of their money. Advocates of public action need to meet that test."

NYTimes Praises Universities' Efforts On Stem Cell Research. The New York Times (6/9) editorializes, "Hats off to Harvard and the University of California at San Francisco for undertaking stem cell research that the Bush administration is trying to discourage and political leaders in Washington seem unwilling to support. Both institutions have started programs to clone human embryos and extract stem cells from them, thus creating stem cell lines tailor-made to study specific diseases." The Times adds that "the potential is enormous, and it is fortunate that these two institutions, and a handful of other laboratories around the world, are getting started."

DOJ_NMG_0032797

IAEA Says Iran Resumed Uranium Processing After West Offered Deal. The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Rubin) reports, "Iran began to enrich a second batch of uranium in its research plant this week on the same day that world powers delivered a negotiating offer to Tehran conditioned on its suspension of nuclear activities, according to a report released Thursday by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The timing of the nuclear work, which Western diplomats suggested was politically calculated, appeared to signal that Iran would fight to continue enriching uranium despite the demands by the international community."

The New York Times (6/9, Sciolino) reports an IAEA report claims that, "on Tuesday, Iran restarted the pouring of a raw form of uranium into a set of 164 centrifuge machines to produce enriched uranium." The Times adds, "That same day," EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "was in Tehran, where he presented Iranian leaders with an international package of incentives to help resolve the crisis caused by the country's nuclear program. There was no explanation for Iran's decision. But it seemed to underscore its often stated determination not to be bullied into accepting any deal requiring it to end activities related to uranium enrichment." The Times opines, "The revelation is likely to stiffen the resolve of the United States and the Europeans in particular that a complete freeze of uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities is a condition for formal negotiations."

The Financial Times (6/9, Dombey, Peel) adds the IAEA claims "Iran resumed sensitive nuclear work this week, just as the world's big powers presented it with an offer aimed at halting such activities." The IAEA report "says that Tehran has just increased the scale of uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme, after scaling it back two months ago." The new information, coming "after several days in which western officials have struck an upbeat note about the prospects of negotiations, highlight how difficult it will be for the world's big powers to persuade Tehran to suspend enrichment."

The Washington Post (6/9, A16, Vick, Linzer)'s reporting on Iran mentions the IAEA report but focuses on President Ahmadinejad's comments, saying he "signaled Iran's readiness to renew negotiations 'to resolve misunderstandings in the international arena. On behalf of the Iranian nation, I'm announcing that the Iranian nation will never hold negotiations about its definite rights with anybody, but we are for talks about mutual concerns.'" The Post calls his comments "the most straightforward indication so far of Iran's willingness to engage six world powers, including the United States, in discussions aimed at avoiding confrontation over its nuclear program. But he did not say whether Iran would agree to the only precondition set for the talks: that the country put its program on hold during negotiations."

Ahmadinejad Says He's Willing To Talk, Blasts Suggestion Of Sanctions. ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 5, 1:05, Gibson) reported, "Iran's president has weighed in, for the first time, on the incentives offered by the US and other world powers, to convince Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions." ABC (Karl) added, "Today, Iran's president made, perhaps, his most conciliatory gesture yet. 'We are for talks to resolve misunderstandings,' he told a crowd of several thousand. But in the same speech, he lashed out at those threatening sanctions, and said his country would never negotiate its fundamental rights." The Washington Times and USA Today runs a similar AP story (6/9, Dareini).

House Rejects Move To Cut Aid To Egypt. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Rogers) reports, "Amid conflicting signals from the Bush administration, the Republican-led House narrowly rejected a bid to cut $100 million from U.S. aid to Egypt as a protest of its suppression of political dissent." The 225-198 vote "came as the House pushed toward passage today of a $21.3 billion foreign-aid budget that already rescinds $200 million from prior economic aid for Cairo."

Israeli Airstrike Kills Commander In Hamas Government. The New York Times (6/9, Erlanger) reports, "In an airstrike against a militant training camp in southern Gaza on Thursday night, Israeli forces killed Jamal Abu Samhadana, a senior commander in the Hamas government, but said he was not the target of their attack." The attack "occurred just hours after Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel promised King Abdullah of Jordan that he would make every effort for progress on a negotiated settlement before moving unilaterally to remove some Israeli settlers from the West Bank."

DOJ_NMG_0032798

The Washington Post (6/9, A17, Wilson) says Samhadanah "oversaw various branches of the 70,000-member Palestinian security services, including a 3,000-member force deployed on the streets of Gaza last month." The Post adds, "Soon after the airstrike, which occurred just before midnight and wounded at least 10 others, scores of armed men stormed the hospital in Rafah. Many of them vowed to exact revenge for Samhadanah's death as they kissed his body and carried it on their shoulders through Rafah's streets in a raucous procession."

House Panel Will Decide On India Nuclear Deal This Month. The House International Relations Committee will decide this month on a controversial civilian nuclear deal with India. AFP (6/9, Parameswaran) reports that a congressional aide said the panel "will 'in the later half' of June decide whether to endorse or give conditional approval to the deal." The panel's findings "would then be submitted to the full House for consideration."

Administration Urged To Pursue Trade Sanctions Against China. The AFL-CIO and Reps. Benjamin Cardin and Chris Smith yesterday urged the Bush Administration to pursue trade sanctions against China. The AP (6/9, Crutsinger) reports, "The group alleged that China's labor practices violate U.S. trade law, which makes repression of workers' rights a violation that would be subject to economic sanctions if the U.S. wins a case on the issue before the World Trade Organization. The petition was an effort to turn up the heat on the administration in an election year over record trade deficits with China, which hit an all-time high of $202 billion last year."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Maher) reports, "The labor federation's petition states that the repression of workers' rights in China constitutes a violation of U.S. trade law. It cites evidence from U.S. government reports that show workers in China frequently are paid less than the country's minimum wage, denied overtime pay, denied collective-bargaining rights and often subjected to abusive treatment. Violations of China's labor laws have led to illegally depressed wages that have contributed to the loss of 1.2 million U.S. jobs, including 930,000 in manufacturing, the petition says."

Bush Meets With Chilean President. The AP (6/9, Gedda) reports that President Bush met with Chile's new President Michelle Bachelet at the White House yesterday. The AP adds, "Neither Bush nor Bachelet publicly acknowledged the Bush administration's strong push to get Chile and other governments in the region to support Guatemala's bid" for a seat on the UN Security Council. Venezuela is also vying for the seat.

Bachelet Urged Not To Let Fear Guide Her Decision On UN Vote. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/9) that on the UN vote, Chile will feel pressure from "Chilean extremists, along with neighboring Argentina and friends like Fidel Castro" and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. O'Grady adds, "Let's hope that fear or political expediency do not drive her decision. That would be a tragedy for regional stability and for Chile's global prestige."

Bush To Visit Budapest. President Bush will visit Budapest later this month to mark the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution. The AP (6/9) reports, "The visit will come after a stop in Vienna, Austria, on June 20-21 for a summit with European Union leaders. Bush originally had planned to travel from Austria to Kiev, Ukraine, but that was put aside because of Ukraine's difficulty in forming a new government. The Kiev visit was never officially announced by the White House although officials had talked privately about Bush stopping there."

Putin's United Russia Party Consolidating Power. The Washington Post (6/9, A14, Finn) reports that Russian President Vladimir Putin's United Russia party "is consolidating its power to a level that critics compare to the Communists' political monopoly in Soviet days. In March, United Russia announced that it had 1 million members and planned to recruit another million before parliamentary elections in 2007, numbers that dwarf every other party's. Regional governors, business leaders and key bureaucrats, seeing where political power lies, have been flocking to its ranks."

Neuarth Calls Putin "Cool Character." Al Neuarth writes in USA Today (6/9) that Putin is a "'cool' character who took criticism calmly and is unlikely to shoot from the hip, a la Bush. … When Bush meets Putin again next month in St. Petersburg, Russia, at the Group of Eight summit of leading industrial nations, he needs to look into those eyes less innocently and more realistically."

DOJ_NMG_0032799

Some Nations Slow In Providing Pledges Of Anti-Poverty Aid. The New York Times (6/9, Dugger) reports that an analysis of giving by the world's richest nations shows that despite pledges to increase aid to combat global poverty in 2010, "several got off to a slow start. Based on their own official statistics, three of the nations — Britain, Germany and France — actually decreased their aid to developing countries in 2005 from 2004, according to the analysis, which was conducted by Oxfam and released Wednesday. In contrast, Oxfam found that development assistance from Italy, Canada and Japan grew substantially during the same period, with Italy registering the largest increase in aid, 46 percent. Giving by the United States grew 16 percent, though after increased aid to Iraq and Afghanistan was subtracted from the total, American giving fell by 4 percent."

Official Says UN Must Stay Engaged In East Timor. Jose Ramos-Horta, Senior Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation for East Timor, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/9), "The capital of our impoverished country, East Timor, is once again the scene of riots, looting, arson and gunfire. … I believe East Timor can recover. This process may require a political change, perhaps in the form of a government of national unity." Ramos-Horta adds, "It is essential that the U.N. stay engaged in East Timor for at least a decade. U.N. management of the 2007 elections is crucial to their success. In close cooperation with my president, I shall seek continued U.N. engagement in East Timor. It's in no one's interest to let another poor country become a failed state."

WSJournal Criticizes UN Official's Speech. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/9) says, "When U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan named Mark Malloch Brown as his deputy, we breathed a sigh of relief. The Briton had distinguished himself as head of the U.N.'s Development Program, and his promotion seemed to promise adult-hour at an institution reeling from the Oil for Food scandal. Well, we're not infallible, and on Tuesday Mr. Malloch Brown gave a speech in which he went out of his way to prove us wrong." The Journal adds, "In a press conference Wednesday, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton described Mr. Malloch Brown's speech as 'the worst mistake by a senior U.N. official that I have seen,' adding that 'even though the target of the speech was the United States, the victim, I fear, will be the United Nations.' He's right. If Mr. Malloch Brown's speech serves any purpose, it is to remind American taxpayers of everything they don't like about the U.N."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"For A Vegas Judge And His Friends, One Good Turn Led To Another."
"Yes, He Does Digress."
"He Was More Symbol Than Sweeping Leader."
"U.S. Tracks Aide To Zarqawi's Doom; Bush Says The War Is Far From Over."
"Wealth, Poverty, Anger Live Together In Venice."
"Bush Takes Measured Tone On Zarqawi, War."

USA Today:

"Inside The Takedown."
"First-Ever Cancer Vaccine Approved."
"Tobacco Giants Test Smoke-Free Products."

New York Times:

"After Long Hunt, U.S. Bombs Kill Al Qaeda Leader In Iraq."
"Hatred He Bred Is Sure To Survive Terrorist's Death."
"U.S. Approves Use Of Vaccine For Cervical Cancer."
"How Surveillance And Betrayal Led To A Hunt's End."
"In The Bayou, 100-Ton Symbols Of A Recovery Still Suspended."

Washington Post:

"After Zarqawi, No Clear Path In Weary Iraq."
"The Young Apprentice."
"How U.S. Forces Found Iraq's Most-Wanted Man."
"FDA Approves Vaccine That Should Prevent Most Cervical Cancers."
"Kaine Delays Execution Of Inmate For 6 Months."

Washington Times:

"'Out Of Business.'"
"Democrats Halt Move To Kill Off 'Death Tax.'"
"Sotheby's To Auction King's Papers, Library."

Detroit Free Press:

"Takeout Of Terror Boss leaves Iraq Still Torn."
"Grandma's Little Sunshine."
"Detroit A Hidden 'Cars' Costar."

DOJ_NMG_0032800

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Iraq's Master Terrorist Dead."
"Writings Of MLK Bound For Auction."
"Help Pours In For Veteran Who Fought Attackers."
"Cervical Cancer Vaccine Gets FDA Approval."

Houston Chronicle:
"U.S. Gets Iraq's Most Wanted."
"'Sweet Girl' Had No Prior Arrests."
"'The Hammer' Strikes In Departure Speech."
"World Cup Is The Start Of A New Chapter For Germany."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Zarqawi Killed; Iraqi Insurgency; Iraqi Reaction; Zarqawi Analysis; Iranian Nuclear Program; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Wendy's Fries; Mt. Merapi Erupts; USS Cole-Persian Gulf.
CBS: Zarqawi Killed; Iraqi Reaction; Zarqawi's Death-Bush; Zarqawi's Death-Khalilzad; Zarqawi Profile; Zarqawi Analysis; Oil Prices; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Zarqawi Recap; Zarqawi's Death-Terror Victims.
NBC: Zarqawi Killed; Iraqi Insurgency; Iraqi Reaction; Zarqawi-Special Forces Team; Zarqawi's Death-Bush; Bush's Reaction-Analysis; Zarqawi's Death-Jordan; Zarqawi's Death-Al Qaeda; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Senate-Estate Tax; Stock Markets; Military Families-High School.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Zarqawi Killed; Cervical Cancer Vaccine.
CBS: Zarqawi killed; Oil Prices; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; House-Internet Neutrality.
NPR: Zarqawi Killed; Senate-Estate Tax; DeLay-Final Day In Congress; Congress-Iraq Spending Bill; MO-Gay Foster Parents; China-Landslides.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — President and Mrs. Bush participate in arrival ceremony for Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, Camp David; joint press availability with Prime Minister Rasmussen, Camp David.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.5252-Communications Opportunity, Promotion and Enhancement Act of 2006.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on cyber security challenges in the Energy Department. Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman; Glenn Podonsky, Energy Department; Tom Pyke, CIO, Energy Department; Linton Brooks, Administrator, National Nuclear Security Administration; Undersecretary of Energy David Garman. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

Other: PRIME MINISTER ANDERS FOGH RASMUSSEN OF DENMARK _ Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Arrives at Camp David for meetings with President Bush. 10:10 a.m. Holds joint media availability with President Bush. Camp David. 4:45 p.m. Holds news conference for the Danish media. Four Seasons Hotel. 7 p.m. Private dinner at the Danish Embassy.

MENTAL HEALTH _ Annual meeting of the National Mental Health Association. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Plenary session on mental health today, with Newt Gingrich. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

CHINA-TECHNOLOGY _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a discussion with Commerce Undersecretary David McCormick on high tech and strategic trade with China, while safeguarding U.S. national security. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

IMMIGRATION-EDUCATION _ 9 a.m. The Population Resource Center, others, hold a briefing on immigration and the U.S. education system, with David Shreve of the National Conference of State Legislatures, Sylvia Martinex of the University of Chicago, others. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

FCC-KATRINA _ 10 a.m. There will be a meeting of the Federal Communications Commission Independent Panel Reviewing the Impact of Hurricane Katrina on Communications Networks. Location: Commission Meeting Room (TW-C305), FCC headquarters, 445 12th St. SW.

GOP BRIEFING _ 10 a.m. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds holds a pen and pad briefing to discuss the midterm elections. Location: 320 1st St. SE.

ENERGY OUTLOOK _ 12 p.m. The National Economists Club holds a luncheon with Deutsche Bank AG (New York) Chief Energy Economist Adam Sieminski on the oil and natural gas outlook. Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0032801

POLITICAL FINANCE _ 2 p.m. IFES holds a discussion on the role of money in politics of 8 post-conflict countries, including Iraq, Afghanistan, Liberia and Haiti. Location: IFES, 3rd floor, 1101 15th St. NW.

AYALON _ 4 p.m. Israeli Amb. Daniel Ayalon holds an Afternoon Newsmaker news conference on Mideast developments. Location: National Press Club.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 9, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Cheney Willing To Work With Specter On NSA Surveillance 3
Judge Admits Chicago Terror Suspect's Statements 3
Cole Deploys To Persian Gulf 4

Homeland Response:
Critics Continue To Attack DHS Distribution Of Anti-Terror Grants 4
Task Force Studies Canadian Border Security 4
California Intelligence Official Blames Demotion On Clash With DHS, FBI 4
Judge Rules Against WTC Leaseholder's Bid For Defense Costs 4
GAO Says FEMA, Red Cross Yet To Resolve Differences 5

War News:
US Officials Warn Zarqawi's Death Won't End Violence In Iraq ... 5
Long-Term Effects Of Zarqawi's Demise Downplayed 9
Identification Of Zarqawi Spiritual Adviser Was Key Point In Operation 11
Iraqi Parliament Approves Three Top Security Officials 12
Maliki Outlines Plan For Democratic Iraq 12
Little Chance Seen That US Will Reduce Troops Levels To 100,000 13
NATO Reaffirms Expansion Of Role In Southern Afghanistan ... 13
US Releases 33 Afghan Detainees From Bagram Air Base 13
School Performance Of Military Children Falls 13

DOJ:
SG Clement Lauded By Peers, Scalia 13

Corporate Scandals:
5th Circuit Frees Two Convicted Merrill Bankers Pending Enron Appeal 14
Milberg Weiss' Expert Witness Feeling Pressure From Federal Prosecutors 14
Michaels Stores To Miss SEC Deadline Due To Stock Options Review 14

Criminal Law:
Dixon Convicted Of Bribery, But Still Alleges Entrapment, Racism By FBI 15
Former New Jersey Municipal Official Convicted Of Taking Bribes 16
Suburban-Chicago Mayor Arrested On Bribery Charges 16
Sorich Lawyer Criticizes Circumstances Of FBI Interview With Daley 17
Defense Lawyer Claims Prosecutors Trying To Isolate, Intimidate Fumo Aide 17
Florida Prisons Suspend Contract Of Vendor Raided By FBI 17
Alleged Cuban Agent Bases Dismissal Motion On FBI Interrogation Transcripts 18
Pennsylvania Attorney Indicted On Embezzlement Charges 18
Bulger Associate Testifies FBI Handler Never Asked About Murders 18
Virginia Governor's Decision To Delay Execution Sparks Criticism 18
Gillespie Testimony Sought In Phone-Jamming Suit 19
North Dakota College Student Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges 19
Matalin To Host Fundraiser For Libby Defense Fund 19
Second Dancer's Statement Disputes Duke Rape Allegations ... 19
Judge Denies Vatican's Motion To Dismiss In Sex Abuse Case 20
LATimes Says Online Gambling Should Be Legal 20

Civil Rights:
FBI Probing Louisiana Inmates' Abuse Allegations 20
Senate Blocks Bill Giving Hawaiians Native American Status 20
Krauthammer Says Gay Marriage Amendment Not Needed 21

Antitrust:
House Passes Telecom Bill 21
FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Lucent-Alcatel Merger 21
General Dynamics Receives FTC Approve For Anteon Buy 21
Microsoft Says It Offered Concessions In Adobe Dispute 21
Canadian Antitrust Regulators Clear Mittal Steel's Bid For Arcelor 22
Falconbridge, Inco Agree To Sell Norwegian Nickel Refinery 22
Cathay Pacific To Gain Control Of Dragonair 22

Environment:
Judge Fines Detroit Metro Airport Authority For River Pollution .. 22
BP Receives Subpoena In Alaska Oil Spill Probe 23
Florida To Remove Manatee From Endangered Species List 23
Appeals Court Ruling Allows Oregon Logging-Rights Auction 23
CDC Says States Should Aim To Contain Bird Flu 23

Senate Seen As Unlikely To Debate New Energy Legislation Soon ... 24
Vermont Yankee License Review May Be Widened After 9th Circuit Decision ... 24
Radioactive Water Spilled At Arkansas Nuclear One ... 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maryland Man Charged In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic ... 24
Congress Suggests MLB Tests Players For Use Of Growth Hormone ... 25
More Heroin Overdoses Reported In Pennsylvania, 4 Arrested In Raid ... 25
Proposed End Of Army Support In U.S.-Bahamas Anti-Drug Effort Questioned ... 26
Officials Say Escaped DC Inmates Had Accomplice ... 27
Connecticut Drug Operation Nets 43 Arrests ... 27
US Charges Two Illinois Men With Avoiding Tobacco Tax ... 27

Immigration:

FBI Arrests Border Patrol Agent On Smuggling Bribery Charges 27
GOP May Split Immigration Reform Into Two Phases ... 27

Tax:

Senate GOP Falls Short In Effort Hold Up-Or-Down Vote On Estate Tax Repeal ... 28

Congress-Administration:

House, Senate Reach Agreement On Spending Bill For War, Katrina Recovery ... 29
Senate Approves Cox, Luddington Judicial Nominations ... 30
Schwab Confirmed As US Trade Representative ... 30
CBC Opposes Effort To Strip Jefferson Of Committee Post ... 30
Average Age Of Congress Rising ... 30
Congress Said To Have Cleared Way For Foreign Control Of Domestic Airlines ... 30
38.7 Million Have Signed Up For Medicare Drug Benefit ... 30
Bush Approval Rating Rebounds to 33% In Harris Interactive Poll ... 30
Nicholson Says Stolen VA Data May Have Been Erased ... 30
Measure Would Help Insurers Get Share Of Personal Injury Suits ... 31
Panel Says Communication Policies Jeopardize Scientific Findings ... 31
WPost Says Congress Should Regulate 527s ... 31

Other News:

White House Forecasts 3.6% GDP Growth In 2006 ... 31
DC Sues InPhonic Over Restrictive Rebate Procedures ... 32
Frustrated Judge Orders Lawyers To End Squabble With Child's Game ... 32
Federal Judge Benefits From Connections To Old Friend ... 32
Panel Calls For Guaranteed Health Care By 2012 ... 33
DeLay Touts Principled Partisanship ... 33
Rumsfeld Praises Summers' Support For ROTC ... 34
Dionne Calls Election Results "Sobering" For California Liberals 34
NYTimes Praises Universities' Efforts On Stem Cell Research .. 34
IAEA Says Iran Resumed Uranium Processing After West Offered Deal ... 34
House Rejects Move To Cut Aid To Egypt ... 35
Israeli Airstrike Kills Commander In Hamas Government ... 35
House Panel Will Decide On India Nuclear Deal This Month ... 35
Administration Urged To Pursue Trade Sanctions Against China 35
Bush Meets With Chilean President ... 35
Bush To Visit Budapest ... 36
Putin's United Russia Party Consolidating Power ... 36
Some Nations Slow In Providing Pledges Of Anti-Poverty Aid ... 36
Official Says UN Must Stay Engaged In East Timor ... 36
WSJournal Criticizes UN Official's Speech ... 36

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 36

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 37

DOJ_NMG_0032804

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Willing To Work With Specter On NSA Surveillance. Fox News' Special Report (6/8, Hume) reported, "The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee seems to have the idea that it is improper for the elected President of the Senate to speak to members of his committee without his permission. That was the gist of a letter Sen. Arlen Specter sent to Vice President Cheney this week. Mr. Cheney has tried to smooth the Senator's ruffled feathers." Fox (Angle) added, "Today the Vice President responded to Specter with his own 2 ½ page letter in which he explained that he only called other members after White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten had talked with Specter about the same issues. Noting he is also a President of the Senate, Cheney wrote that 'I have frequent contact with Senators both at their initiative and mine. The respectful and candid exchange of views is something to be encouraged rather than avoided. These communications are not unusual. They are the government at work.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Koppel) reported that Chairman Specter "said that he had read and received the Vice President's letter and suggested a willingness to let things play out for a little while they try to work out some sort of legislative compromise over this NSA warrantless wiretapping program."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Todd) reported, "Cheney and other White House officials are concerned that if telecom executives testify, it might compromise sensitive information. To Specter's complaint that he was not told Cheney had gone through other Republican senators to block the telecom officials' testimony, Cheney wrote, 'These communications are not unusual. They are the government at work.'"

The AP (6/9) reports Cheney told Specter "he is willing to work with Congress on new rules governing the White House's eavesdropping program. But Cheney stopped short of promising any action as he responded to a terse letter from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the day before."

The New York Times (6/9, Stolberg) reports Specter "was not mollified. 'He does not face head on; he does not deal with his not having taken it up with the chairman,' the senator said in an interview. 'This isn't me personally; this is institutional. This is not the way government works, to deal with a committee without going through the chairman.'"

The Washington Post (6/9, A4, Fletcher) reports Cheney "defended his actions in a letter to Specter yesterday, saying his intention was to avert testimony that may involve 'extremely sensitive classified information.' While Cheney lobbied other members of the committee, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten reached out to Specter himself to discuss the matter, the letter said."

Specter Agrees To Provision Expanding Bush Power Over NSA Surveillance. CQ (6/8, Perine) reports Chairman Specter "made a tactical retreat Thursday on an intelligence bill, agreeing — for now — to a change that would bolster President Bush's claim of broad executive authority over a secret warrantless surveillance program." Specter said Thursday "that he was conceding to other committee Republicans, particularly Jon Kyl of Arizona, only temporarily, to win enough votes from them to move his bill (S 2453) out of the 18-member Judiciary Committee. But he said he would seek to amend the measure on the Senate floor."

Judge Admits Chicago Terror Suspect's Statements. The AP (6/9, Robinson) reports, "A federal judge ruled Thursday that prosecutors may use statements made to Israeli authorities a dozen years ago by a Chicago man when he comes to trial on charges of laundering hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Palestinian militant group Hamas." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve said in her 138-page opinion that federal prosecutors had proven in 13 days of hearings that began in March that Muhammad Salah had made most of the statements voluntarily and not after being tortured as he claimed. … St. Eve, a former federal prosecutor, said that 'the law enforcement conduct on the record before the court does not shock the conscience.'" The AP adds, "Salah, 53, is one of three men charged in the indictment with taking part in a racketeering conspiracy that included funneling cash to Hamas to commit murders, bombings and other violence. … The indictment was announced in August 2004 by then Attorney General John Ashcroft who said at a news conference that the three operated 'a U.S.-based terrorist recruiting and financing cell.' … The evidence prosecutors plan to use at the trial, which is scheduled for October, includes statements Salah made after his January 1993 arrest in Israel on terrorism financing charges. He served five years in Israeli prisons before returning to Chicago."

The Chicago Tribune (6/9, Coen) reports, "Lawyers for Muhammad Salah had argued the incriminating statements, which are central to the government's case, were coerced through physical and psychological abuse over weeks. … Israeli agents tortured Salah after he was arrested at a checkpoint between the Gaza Strip and Israel, they argued, forcing him to sit hooded in a tiny chair for hours, threatening his family and having other detainees beat him." The Tribune adds, "In their attempt to keep the material from being suppressed, prosecutors in March presented the testimony of two Israeli officers who questioned Salah about his links to the militant Islamic group Hamas. Testifying under code names, Maj. 'Haim' and Capt. 'Nadav' of the Israeli Security Agency, the two denied Salah had been tortured. … U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve said in her ruling that she found the officers to be extremely credible, and that Salah's statements were given voluntarily."

DOJ_NMG_0032805

Cole Deploys To Persian Gulf. ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 9, 1:05, Gibson) reported, "Finally tonight, a little bit of irony on this day that Abu Musab al Zarqawi is killed. A guided missile destroyer set sail from Norfolk, headed for the Persian Gulf today. Nothing remarkable in that. But this is the USS Cole, headed for the Gulf for the first time since al Qaeda blew a hold in the side of the ship and killed 17 sailors 6 years ago. And another coincidence of timing." Commander Bradley Roberson, USS Cole commanding officer: "I think it's appropriate that a ship like Cole goes out today. Today happens to be the tenth birthday of the ship, too. Talk about more irony." Gibson: "There are 17 stars on the floor of the ship's dining hall. The 17 that were killed were in that area of the ship."

The Washington Times/AP (6/9, Barisic) reports sailors "in the current crew of 320, including many who asked to be assigned to the Cole, say they are unafraid to deploy to that region." The Cole "is one of six ships and a submarine with 6,000 sailors and Marines leaving the East Coast this week to conduct security operations in support of the war on terrorism."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Critics Continue To Attack DHS Distribution Of Anti-Terror Grants. Under the headline "Uproar Unmuffled Over Anti-terror Money," USA Today (6/9, Hall) reports a week after announcing this year's distribution of urban areas initiative grants, Secretary Chertoff "and his department are struggling to defend funding cuts for New York City and Washington and increases for smaller cities such as Omaha and Charlotte." Chertoff said in January that "he didn't care" about the "heat" he'd likely get over DHS' attempts to "eliminate wasteful spending" in its grants, but the changes "yielded an uproar — especially in New York, where funds were cut 40% — that caught the department off guard." Meanwhile, Chertoff's defense of this year's distribution of funds, which includes the fact that "New York still gets more money than any other city," has "done little to calm critics."

Task Force Studies Canadian Border Security. The Washington Times (6/9, Seper) reports a "task force of former U.S. Border Patrol agents, ex-military personnel, academics and congressional staffers, who last year called for 36,000 National Guard troops to be deployed on the Mexican border, has begun a tour of the Canadian border to study 'options' to better secure the nation's northern frontier." Conclusions from "the three-week mission will be submitted to the House Homeland Security and Armed Services committees and to the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus on July 4 for consideration for legislation."

California Intelligence Official Blames Demotion On Clash With DHS, FBI. The AP (6/9, Marquez) reports former California Department of Justice criminal intelligence chief Edward Manavian "said in a personnel complaint that he was demoted after questioning the legality of federal and state intelligence-gathering methods, but authorities dispute the claims. … The board pulled out of talks to share intelligence with the federal Department of Homeland Security last year because of Manavian's concerns that sharing criminal information in the department's system would violate privacy laws, according to his complaint." He also alleges that "his decision to pull out of an FBI operation to infiltrate the Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front…by planting a state DOJ agent in their meetings on a university campus" was a factor in his ouster. "An FBI spokeswoman said the bureau 'strongly questions' Manavian's allegations, but declined to comment further. The FBI has successfully infiltrated the ELF in the past."

Judge Rules Against WTC Leaseholder's Bid For Defense Costs. The New York Law Journal (6/9, Hamblett) reports, "World Trade Center leaseholder Larry Silverstein has lost his second attempt to have insurance companies cover the costs of defending him in suits over the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein ruled Thursday that the terms of insurance binders that governed coverage for the Trade Center before the attacks, as well as other evidence produced in discovery, show clearly the parties did not intend Silverstein be compensated for defense costs." The Journal adds, "The judge said the evidence was 'overwhelming' that lead insurer, Zurich American Insurance Co., had 'refused, in the absence of adequate loss history data, to issue a policy that included defense cost coverage.' … 'To now impose a defense obligation would give a windfall to Silverstein and subject Zurich to a liability that it was unable to calculate or prepare for by an appropriate premium, and thus would work a manifest injustice,' the judge said in In Re September 11th Liability Insurance Coverage Cases, 03 Civ. 00332. … The judge's decision applied in equal measure to both the primary policy and the umbrella policy issued by Zurich. Both policies were finalized in the months following the attacks, but the binder controlled as to the intent of the parties prior to them."

DOJ_NMG_0032806

GAO Says FEMA, Red Cross Yet To Resolve Differences. A number of articles this morning are reporting on the results of a GAO investigation released Thursday that found FEMA and the Red Cross had difficulty working together during last year's hurricanes. The AP (6/9, Jordan) reports the two "squabbled over chain of command issues…hampering relief efforts," according to the GAO. "As of two weeks ago, there still was confusion about how the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Red Cross would work together in the hurricane season that began June 1, according to the report."

The Washington Post (6/9, A5, Salmon) reports, "FEMA officials complained that Red Cross staffers assigned to coordinate the charity's relief effort with FEMA rotated too quickly -- every two to three weeks, according to the report. Red Cross officials, on the other hand, were frustrated by FEMA's propensity to lose their requests for food, cots and other supplies."

The New York Times (6/9, Strom) reports, "Critics said the two agencies should have put aside their differences by now. 'The report leaves the impression that when the next hurricane hits, leaving people hungry and homeless, FEMA and the Red Cross will be haggling over who's supposed to provide food and shelter,' Senator Charles E. Grassley…said in a statement about the report." Armond T. Mascelli, vice president for response operations at the Red Cross, said "efforts to define roles had begun and cited a meeting yesterday between logisticians from both groups to determine what supplies were needed and when and where they were needed."

Paulison Sworn In As FEMA Director. The AP (6/9) reports that a his swearing-in as FEMA director Thursday, R. David Paulison "promised 'to make America proud'" and "sought to rally agency workers as they prepare for this year's hurricane season that began June 1. 'These are tough times for you, I know,' Paulison told them. 'You hold your head high.'"

Study Finds Race Affects View Of Government Assistance For Katrina Victims. The Washington Post (6/9, A2, Morin) reports an "online study by The Washington Post, washingtonpost.com and Shanto Iyengar, director of the Political Communication Lab at Stanford University," has found "Americans are more willing to provide extended government assistance to white victims of Hurricane Katrina than to African Americans and other minorities -- particularly blacks with darker skin. … More than 2,300 individuals participated in the latest experiment, which tested how much subconscious racial bias shapes attitudes toward disaster relief." For African Americans, the average duration of assistance was a month shorter than for whites, "while the amount of aid was nearly the same, meaning that blacks would collect about $1,000 less than white victims."

Oil Companies Take New Precautions In Gulf Of Mexico. The Washington Post (6/9, D1, Mufson) reports oil companies are "taking new precautions" with platforms in the Gulf of Mexico in an effort "aimed at heading off a repeat of last year's disaster, when platforms were wrecked, oil and gas supplies disrupted and prices sent soaring." Meanwhile, "drilling rig owners, at the urging of the Coast Guard and the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, are also taking precautions by increasing the number of mooring lines."

WAR NEWS:

US Officials Warn Zarqawi's Death Won't End Violence In Iraq. Al Qaeda terrorist Abu Musab al Zarqawi was killed in a US air strike on a safe house near Baquba. The story dominated the evening network news last night, accounting for a total of just over 45 minutes of broadcast time. Zarqawi's death also dominated cable news channels throughout the day Thursday, with little else penetrating the coverage. On CNN alone, Anderson Cooper 360 (6/8, 10:00 p.m.) aired a special edition entitled "Taking Out a Terrorist," Larry King Live (6/8) spent the full hour on the killing of "the most wanted terrorist in Iraq," and daytime shows stayed with the story throughout their broadcasts.

Knight Ridder (6/9, Hutcheson) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Bush first learned of the airstrike that killed Zarqawi at about 4:35 p.m. Wednesday, minutes after his hour-long meeting with members of Congress. National security adviser Stephen Hadley, who left the session with the lawmakers to respond to urgent messages on his BlackBerry, delivered the news to the president in the Oval Office. 'That would be a good thing,' Bush replied, according to Snow."

Media coverage of Zarqawi's killing describes it as a victory for President Bush and the US-led war on terror -- the Wall Street Journal (6/9, Fassihi, Solomon, Shishkin), for example, speaks of "psychological boost after months of seemingly endless bad news – but most reports also emphasize that Bush and other top US officials took a markedly cautious tone yesterday, warning the master terrorist's demise will not immediately end violence in Iraq. A number of stories contrast Bush's tone yesterday with his "Mission Accomplished" televised speech in 2003. For example, the AP (6/9, Hunt) reports there were "no 'Mission Accomplished' banners or joyous celebrations at the White House," and the New York Times (6/9, Rutenberg) headlines its story "Bush Responds To The Killing Of A Terrorist With Caution," and says the President "struck a particularly solemn note, even as he called the killing a blow to Al Qaeda that would build 'renewed confidence' in the war effort." The tone "was starkly different from Mr. Bush's exuberant speech beneath a 'Mission Accomplished' banner on an aircraft carrier in the spring of 2003." But "the handling of Mr. Zarqawi's death was in keeping with a new White House approach: admit mistakes, manage expectations and exude a sense of reality, with optimism."

DOJ_NMG_0032807

On NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 6, 1:20, Williams), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert said, "The White House realizes that there may be a point or two up in the public opinion polls, but they fully expect more violence to continue and this monster named al Qaeda to find a new head. Secondly…we did not hear the President talk about mission accomplished or bring it on. He realizes this is going to be a long and difficult process. The best the President can do is buy some patience, buy some time from the American people, so that in a month or two months or three months, sometime before the midterm elections, the Iraqis have trained enough troops to secure the country and bring some American troops home. They realize that that and only that will have a real political effect here in the United States."

ABC World News Tonight (6/8, lead story, 4:35, Gibson) reported Zarqawi's death is "a tremendous boost in morale for those who tracked him, for troops in Iraq, and, perhaps, for the US as a whole." However, added ABC (Raddatz), when the President addressed the issue in remarks at the White House, his remarks "were very measured. What he does not want to do is raise people's expectations that the violence in Iraq will soon disappear." The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 3, 2:05, Schieffer) said "a White House that has been too often burned by overly optimistic battlefield assessments hung out no mission accomplished signs today. Even so, this was the kind of news the Administration has been looking for, and the President was anxious to talk about it." CBS (Axelrod) added that "as one senior Administration official told me 'We're not delusional. Real challenges lie ahead.' Which explains the sober, measured tone of President Bush this morning." Bush was shown saying, "Zarqawi is dead, but the difficult and necessary mission in Iraq continues."

NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 5, 1:45, Williams) reported, "The reaction from the President on down seemed today designed not to raise public expectations about the future of this war in Iraq." NBC (Gregory) added, "In the Rose Garden, the President appeared subdued, even as he described the killing of Zarqawi as a major blow against terrorists in Iraq." President Bush: "Now Zarqawi has met his end. And this violent man will never murder again." Gregory: "First reports of Zarqawi's death reached the White House yesterday afternoon about 3:45 when the President was meeting with members of Congress just back from Iraq. Press Secretary Tony Snow recalled the suggestion from one." Tony Snow: "That things would be better if somebody would get Zarqawi -- there was a little snickering in the room at the time -- little did we know." Gregory: "An hour later, the news reached the President. Not since the capture of Saddam Hussein in December of 2003 has the White House achieved such a victory in Iraq," but "the President was careful not to overreact."

On ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 4, 3:50, Gibson), chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said, "Everyone was being cautious. At the White House, there is hope what they call a circuit breaker that will open people's minds up to the idea of progress in Iraq. But they know events have to follow on the ground." Newsweek International editor Fareed Zakaria added, "When the President did speak, he said this is a victory for the global war on terror. He did not say this is a victory in establishing stability or peace in Iraq, or allowing our troops to leave."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Henry) said Bush was "very careful as he stepped up to the podium in the Rose Garden to not be celebrating and doing any victory dancing. He walked a very fine line." CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (6/8, 10:08 p.m.) noted Bush "had a warning -- we can expect the terrorists and insurgents to carry on without him."

On its website, Time (6/9, Allen) runs a piece titled "For a Beleaguered President, a Victory," in which it says Bush "was one of the few Administration officials who wasn't smiling. Having learned the hazards of gloating, he maintained a deliberately somber mien." Time adds, "At least for a day, competence problems had been banished. The break came when the President needed it most -- as the daily parade of horribles from Iraq was eroding confidence in his handling of the war, even among conservatives."

USA Today (6/9, Jackson, Benedetto) notes Bush's "subdued approach to Zarqawi's death," and that of "members of his staff," while the Washington Times (6/9, Dinan, Curl) says "the White House took pains to try to temper the news with a sobering look at the challenges that remain." Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (6/9, A1, McManus, Gerstenzang) reports, "It was -- or should have been -- a moment of triumph," but Bush's tone "was noticeably reserved."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Cummings, Dreazen) reports that "as White House officials prepared for yesterday's announcement of the Zarqawi news, they were mindful that car bombs and kidnappings likely will continue, another senior aide said, and concluded 'there was no reason to overstate today's event when it largely speaks for itself -- a ruthless murderer met justice.' Events proved their caution well-founded, as dozens were reported killed across Iraq by a series of bombings."

Bush To Assess Situation In Iraq With Key Advisors, Military Leaders. The Chicago Tribune (6/9, Silva) reports the President "will attempt to capitalize on the moment, summoning his national security advisers and key Cabinet members to meetings Monday and Tuesday at Camp David, Md., on 'the way forward' in Iraq. US military leaders in Iraq will join via teleconference Monday, and Iraqi leaders will join the next day. … Assessing the course ahead, Bush will be joined at Camp David by Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, CIA Director Michael Hayden and other advisers. Iraq's prime minister and newly seated Cabinet members will call in Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0032808

The Washington Post (6/9, A18, Abramowitz, Kessler) reports, "Administration officials said a range of issues will be on the table, including developing a new security plan for violence-ridden Baghdad, spurring reconciliation between warring Sunni and Shiite populations -- perhaps with some kind of amnesty plan for insurgents -- and the possibility of new international economic assistance for Iraq." The Post adds, "Past opportunities to change the story in Iraq, such as the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003, have proved fleeting. Support for Bush on Iraq bumped up after that news, but it quickly receded."

Bush No Longer Keeps Check List Of Terrorists. The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 3, 2:05, Axelrod) reported, "Mr. Bush once told CBS News that he kept little pictures of major terrorists in his desk and put a little check next to each one as they were put on the of business. I asked today if Zarqawi's picture now had a little check and was told the President no longer has those pictures. Well, pictures or not, there's a big name still to be checked off, the biggest, in fact -- Osama bin Laden."

Chertoff Says There Are No Plans No Raise Terror Alert In US. The AP (6/9, Gearan) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday night that there were no plans to raise the nation's terror alert because al-Zarqawi's death 'does not, in itself, directly increase the threat to the homeland.'"

Rumsfeld Appears At Odds With Khalizad On Whether Killing Will Trigger Upsurge In Violence. In Brussels, Secretary Rumsfeld "said Zarqawi's death should slow down the insurgency," CNN (6/8, 10:08 p.m.) added. CNN (6/8, 12:06 p.m.) reported earlier that Rumsfeld said Zarqawi "personified evil and his death marks a victory in the world's fight against terrorism," but as MSNBC (6/8, 12:38 p.m.) reported, Rumsfeld was "a little out of position" by being at the NATO meeting, and offered a "somewhat muted" and "matter-of-fact" first reaction.

His later comments on his flight back from Belgium were shown during a report aired during Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (6/8, 8:34 p.m., Centanni), with Fox News then saying Rumsfeld said "it could take al Qaeda in Iraq some time to recover from the loss of its leader. … Rumsfeld also said he expects no upsurge in violence. He says if there is an upsurge it could be the results of attacks that were already in the planning pipeline and not a violent backlash to the death of Zarqawi." The Baltimore Sun (6/9, Richissin) notes Rumnsfeld also said of Zarqawi, "Over the past several years, no single person on this planet has had the blood of more innocent men, women and children on his hands."

The AP (6/9, Baldor) reports Rumsfeld told reporters, "Given the nature of the terrorist networks, really a network of networks, the death of Zarqawi, while enormously important, will not mean the end of all violence in that country." At the same time, he "discounted as 'utter nonsense' suggestions that Zarqawi's death will trigger a spike in violence. 'You can have an upswing in violence that has nothing to do with his death,' said Rumsfeld."

But on CNN's The Situation Room (6/8), US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said the "killing of Zarqawi was a very important step," but added, "I believe that in the coming few days there is a danger of escalation by the terrorists to demonstrate that they're still relevant and that they might take revenge." On the CBS Evening News (6/8, story 4, 1:00, Schieffer), Khalilzad said, "I think it has done significant damage to al Qaeda, in Iraq in particular because this man was the architect, the mastermind of this movement here, but there is still the organization is able to do harm. And I anticipate they will try to demonstrate that they are still able to do damage, and I expect them to express them to express themselves in the coming hours and days."

The Chicago Tribune (6/9, Sly) notes "Bush, US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top US commander in Iraq, echoed the expectation that further violence could be expected, in stark contrast with the euphoria that greeted the capture of Hussein."

Also, USA Today (6/9, Diamond, Soriano) quotes Maj. Tom Hobbs, "executive officer for 3rd Battalion, 8th Marine Regiment in Ramadi," a city in western Iraq, saying, "Revenge for the martyred Zarqawi may also lead to increased attacks."

Meanwhile, USA Today (6/9, Jackson, Benedetto) quotes Tony Snow saying, "Does this mean that happy days are here again? Of course not." Snow "said that while there could be 'very positive ramifications,' there may also be an upsurge in violence by terrorists who want to prove they haven't been intimidated by Zarqawi's death."

Newsweek's Wolffe Says Death Could "Remove" Rumsfeld's Job Security. On MSNBC's Countdown (6/8, 8:21 p.m., Olbermann), Newsweek's Richard Wolffe said Zarqawi's death could "actually remove job security" from Rumsfeld. Wolffe said Bush "was looking closely at getting rid of Donald Rumsfeld up to the point where everybody was leaning on him to get rid of Donald Rumsfeld. Now that Rumsfeld got this success under his belt, the pressure will decline in terms of saying, 'I think there may be a second look taken here at his position. People have been saying for a long time the President and many people in the White House are not happy with his performance."

DOJ_NMG_0032809

ABC Scooped Competition With Early Report On Zarqawi Death. The New York Times/AP (6/9) reports, "Thanks to a reporter jolted out of a vacation — if not sleep — ABC News scored a beat on its competitors yesterday when it was the first to broadcast news of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death." ABC "broke into regular programming at 2:38 a.m. to say it had confirmed Mr. Zarqawi's death in an American bombing. NBC News issued its report at 3:16, and CBS News at 3:40. The ABC News report was based on a tip phoned from a source to Martha Raddatz."

Picture Of Dead Zarqawi Said To Have Potential To Backfire. The Washington Post (6/9, C1, Kennicott) reports when the picture used to document Zarqawi's death "was displayed at a U.S. military news briefing, Zarqawi's face was seen inside what appeared to be a professional photographic mat job, with a large frame, as if it were something one might preserve and hang on the wall next to other family portraits." So "will this image, given a strange dignity by its prominent frame, be a defining image of the war? Not likely. Its primary function is forensic. It proves, in an age of skepticism (heightened by a three-year history of official claims about the war turning out to be false), that Zarqawi is indeed dead. But beyond that, the image has little power. Indeed, as with so many images in this war, it is loaded with the potential to backfire." The "framed image of a head also has a disturbing sense of the trophy to it -- proof of another small victory brought home from battle -- which connects it to what might be called the ultimate self-destructing image of victory: the 'Mission Accomplished' photo-op staged on an aircraft carrier on May 1, 2003."

USA Today (6/9, Stone) reports Zarqawi's "death at 39 ends a nearly three-year reign of terror that played on ethnic and religious divisions and helped push Iraq to the edge of civil war. But with militant websites declaring him a martyr, the myth of Zarqawi seems destined to grow." Ironically, "the myth was created by the United States, says Vali Nasr, a Middle East expert at the Council on Foreign Relations." Nasr said, "We made him bigger than he was. We overemphasized him, and it fed into this mystique. We helped make him."

More Commentary. USA Today (6/9) editorializes, "Bush struck the right tone Thursday. Zarqawi's death offers a chance to 'turn the tide' but won't end the violence, Bush said. The realism is a welcome change from the premature triumphalism of the past."

The Washington Post (6/9, A22), in an editorial titled "A Good Day In Iraq," says that "it was a little unnerving, in the middle of yesterday's celebrations, to hear President Bush speak of plans to hold high-profile consultations early next week on 'how to best deploy America's resources in Iraq.'" Officials from both countries "were unanimous in predicting yesterday that the challenge from the insurgency will continue to be severe. Perhaps U.S. troops can be drawn down without worsening that threat; but it would be tragic if, after so much suffering, Iraq's first democratic government were denied the means to succeed."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9) editorializes, "Zarqawi's death Wednesday in a U.S. airstrike near Baqubah is about as big a victory as you get. Only 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheihk Mohamed rivals Zarqawi in importance among the al Qaeda leaders who've been captured or killed. No single terrorist has more innocent blood on his hands." Yet "as important as his death is, no one should be overconfident that this is the turning point for Iraq."

The New York Times (6/9) editorializes, "It is good news for Washington, and even better news for Iraq." But "as Americans discovered earlier…it will take far more than the elimination of a handful of iconic leaders to stem the tide of the Iraqi insurgency and reverse the country's alarming slide into civil war." Moreover, "Zarqawi's relationships with home-grown leaders of that insurgency and with top Al Qaeda leaders around Osama bin Laden were, in fact, often troubled. The circumstances of his death, however, could well erase all recollection of those differences in order to enshrine him as a useful martyr. In that new role, his memory could continue to haunt Iraq for some time to come."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9) says in an editorial that Zarqawi's death "may not have been the most important news from Iraq on Thursday. That designation may fall to the appointment of three new security ministers, giving Iraq a complete government for the first time since elections last December. Without Zarqawi, as even President Bush noted in the Rose Garden, the insurgency and attacks in Iraq will continue. Without a competent government, however, there is no hope for an end to the violence."

In an editorial, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/9) writes that Zarqawi's death "should provide a much-needed boost of morale in Iraq as well, among our own troops and among the Iraqi people." However, "as Rumsfeld, President Bush and others noted in celebrating al-Zarqawi's demise, this success may not have immense impact on the long-term direction of affairs in Iraq."

In his Dallas Morning News (6/9) column, Carl P. Leubsdorf writes that Zarqawi's death "gives President Bush a much-needed psychological boost at a time he is struggling to convince Americans it's worth staying the course in Iraq." Leubsdorf writes, "In a sense, the impact of the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi will be more symbolic than substantive."

In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (6/9), Eliot Cohen, Robert E. Osgood Professor of Strategic Studies at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, says, "Counterinsurgency is not chiefly about killing -- but killing is essential to it, and by terminating the career of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, American forces have not only delivered justice, but made real, if limited, progress."

DOJ_NMG_0032810

In his Wall Street Journal column (6/9), Daniel Henninger says, "Zarqawi understood that promising to make constant murder a phenomenon of the world's life, and proving he could deliver on that promise, would corrode the possibility of normal human relationships everywhere -- among Iraqis, between Iraqis and coalition forces, and in the U.S. between supporters of the Iraq war and those opponents of the war who abhor terrorism but have simply gone numb before Zarqawi's limitless capacity to kill. Western Europe has been made supine. Now he has been killed, and this should rightly be called a moral victory."

In his New York Times column (6/9), Thomas Friedman says, "Zarqawi was finally tracked down because someone in his organization or in the Sunni community in Iraq turned against him. We need more of that, because Iraq will only work if more Sunnis turn against the terrorists and join the government. Second, Al Qaeda can talk all it wants about replacing Zarqawi, but he is not so easily replaced, because he was a world-class, first-team all-star terrorist. For three years he terrorized Iraq, while eluding the U.S. Army, Marine Corps, Navy, Air Force and C.I.A. Bad guys like him don't grow on trees. But his death will be a turning point only if it leads more Iraqis to come together into a coherent government and army. Ultimately, that is all that matters."

In a New York Times op-ed (6/9), Daniel Benjamin and Steven Simon say that by killing Zarqawi, "the United States has struck its most important blow in the war on terrorism since driving Al Qaeda out of Afghanistan. Easily the deadliest terrorist at work over the last three years, Mr. Zarqawi was probably responsible for more deaths than Osama bin Laden and leaves behind a jihadist movement that has been drastically changed in no small part by his actions."

In his Washington Post column (6/9, A23), David Ignatius says the "opening provided by Zarqawi's death" is that it "raised the lid of fear a few inches so that Iraq could take a breath. It destroyed the worst of the worst, making life a little safer for everyone else. It offered a too-rare example in modern Iraq that the killers don't always succeed and that the culture of death isn't the only one left for the country. Most of all, his death allows the new Iraqi government to reach a truce with the insurgents who have been cowed or awed into backing Zarqawi."

Long-Term Effects Of Zarqawi's Demise Downplayed. Most media analyses last night and this morning downplayed the long-term effects of al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi's death on the Iraq conflict and the broader war on terror. For example, ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 2, 2:50, Ross) reported, "Even the Ambassador" Zalmay Khalilzad "concedes Zarqawi's death will not dramatically change the nature of the insurgency. Despite his international influence, Zarqawi controlled only 1 of 14 major insurgent groups." NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 2, 1:50, Maceda) reported that "while US officials and Iraqi analysts tell NBC News that Zarqawi's death is a blow to al Qaeda in Iraq, the organization with hundreds of loyal fighters is capable of coming back."

Typical of the coverage is a San Francisco Chronicle (6/9, Sandalow) analysis, which begins, "The United States did not go to war in Iraq to kill Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. … Many cautioned that, by itself, the episode does not bring the United States closer to victory, justify the 2,486 American deaths or seem likely to turn around public opinion."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Roug) headlines its analysis "Few Expect Violence to End With Zarqawi's Death." In a second story titled "He Was More Symbol Than Sweeping Leader," the Los Angeles Times (6/9, Stack) says Zarqawi was "mostly a looming image, a man whose contribution to the war derived largely from his symbolic value. As a military commander, he held sway over just a fraction of a fraction of the fighters who daily sow bloodshed in Iraq."

Knight Ridder (6/9, Lasseter) says Iraq "remains a nation beset by deeply rooted problems that threaten to push it deeper into chaos. There are few expectations that Zarqawi's death will change that." Another Knight Ridder piece (6/9, Strobel, Landay, Walcott) says Zarqawi's death is "unlikely to have a significant impact on the struggle against al-Qaida." Likewise, the Financial Times (6/9, Biedermann, Alden) titles its report "Zarqawi's Death 'Will Not End Insurgency,'"

The New York Times (6/9, Filkins) reports, "While his death could erode the ability of his group, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, to carry out suicide and car bomb attacks — and possibly set off a violent struggle to succeed him -- the insurgency and the sectarian war he helped ignite will go on without him." The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Knickmeyer) also reports, "Analysts and military spokesmen said Thursday that the death of…al-Zarqawi…will not extinguish the sectarian conflict that he helped foment."

The Washington Times (6/9, Behn) takes says Zarqawi's killing, "combined with the selection of a defense minister who has credibility with the Sunnis, has provided the best chance in months for progress against the insurgency, Iraqi officials said yesterday." But "the sectarian killings in Baghdad and southern Iraq are unlikely to end anytime soon, they added."

Similar stories appear in the New York Times (6/9, Burns), which notes "American officials themselves offered an immediate warning against overstating the impact that the death of Mr. Zarqawi," USA Today (6/9, Diamond, Soriano), which quotes Maj. Tom Hobbs, executive officer for 3rd Battalion, 8th Marine Regiment in Ramadi, a city in western Iraq, saying, "Things will remain the same, or get worse as insurgent leaders conduct attacks to make a name for themselves and become the next top dog."

DOJ_NMG_0032811

An exception to the general tenor of the coverage was New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman, who appeared on the CBS Evening News (6/8, story 6, 2:20, Schieffer). He said, "This is the all-star of all-stars of terrorism. And the al Qaeda people can say, 'Oh, we'll replace him with somebody else.' This is a guy who eluded, the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, CIA, NSA; British Intelligence for three years. A guy like that they don't replace really quickly. We have not won by this one-day event, not at all. But it's a good step. It's one day of good news after so many unremitting days of bad." Former CIA intelligence official Michael Scheuer said, "Zarqawi was really off the reservation for al Qaeda in terms of his willingness or eagerness to fight Shias, and with him out of the way, I suspect the next al Qaeda leader in Iraq will focus more on American forces and the Iraqi government than actually just fighting against the Shi'a." Likewise, the Washington Times (6/9, Gertz) calls Zarqawi "a key strategic planner of deadly suicide bombings and gruesome execution-style slayings, and his death is a major setback for Islamist extremists in Iraq and elsewhere," according to "US counterterrorism officials said." One "official" told the Times, "He was leading the charge and was the jihadists' driving force in both planning and operations, and in raising money."

McCain Says Zarqawi's Death Is Not "Defining Event." On CNN's The Situation Room (6/8), Sen. John McCain said Zarqawi's death "was an important event but not a defining event. … This is a significant day but it really doesn't change the long-term challenges we face, as the President I think very well stated this morning."

Murtha Says Impact Of Zarqawi's Death Should Not Be Overestimated. Rep. John Murtha said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/8) that "the encouraging thing about what happened today is, you had information from the Iraqis go to the Iraqis, then go to the Americans. Now, this is a significant event, there's no question about it, to have gotten the top leader of al Qaeda. You have got to remember, though, al Qaeda is a very small part of what is going on in Iraq. And you have got to be careful not to overestimate the impact this is going to have."

Some Democrats Say Zarqawi's Killing Not Significant. The Washington Times (6/9, Fagan) reports, "Some Democrats, breaking ranks with their leadership yesterday, said the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi in Iraq wasn't significant and is being used to divert attention from an unpopular, unsuccessful war that should be ended. 'This is just to cover Bush's [rear] so he doesn't have to answer' for Iraqi civilians being killed by the US military, and his own sagging poll numbers, said Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat. … 'This insurgency is such a confused mess that one person, dead or alive at this point, is hardly significant,' said Rep. Jim McDermott, Washington Democrat. 'Our troops are no safer today than they were yesterday. And no American is safer today.'" Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich "said Zarqawi was a small part of 'a growing anti-American insurgency' and that it's time to get out of Iraq. 'We're there for all the wrong reasons,' he said."

Oil Prices Fall On Word Of Zarqawi Death. The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 7, 1:45, Schieffer) reported, "The price of oil fell today after word of Zarqawi's death. How much of a ripple did this news have on the markets?" CBS (Mason) added, "The oil markets celebrated al-Zarqawi's death." Ray Carbone, trader: "Psychologically, it is good news for oil." Mason: "On the New York Mercantile Exchange, crude dropped below $70 a barrel for the first time in two weeks. It recovered some, but still closed down nearly half a dollar on the day as traders like Ray Carbone saw a blow to the insurgency that's disrupted critical oil supplies." Carbone: "And perhaps leading to some resurgence of the Iraqi exports coming out of Basra and the north of Iraq." Mason: "Iran, OPEC's second largest oil producer also had goes good news for markets. Iran's president said he's willing to discuss Iran's nuclear program with the west to 'resolve misunderstandings.' By some estimates, the troubles in Iraq and Iran have added a $5 to $10 terror premium to the price of every barrel of crude."

Iraqis Skeptical About Positive Effect Of Zarqawi's Death. ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 3, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "Iraqi reaction to Zarqawi's death ranged from jubilation to skepticism." ABC (Marquez) added, "Iraq's government TV declared Zarqawi's death would bring peace and unity." Ishael Zayer, Al Sabah newspaper: "This might be the beginning of the end of the terrorism in Iraq." Marquez: "Zarqawi's death was the lead story on the major Arab television networks. But they questioned whether his end would be the end of attacks on civilians and sectarian violence here."

NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 3, 1:10, Boettcher) reported, "On the streets, it was pretty muted. People did not believe that the death of one man would make a difference, although there were celebrations by police, most of them Shiite, but they want to see the proof that something is going to happen here to secure the situation. Things have been bad. They've gotten worse over the past few months and they don't believe that the death of one man, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, is going to change that."

The New York Times (6/9, Tavernise) reports, "As news of Mr. Zarqawi's death settled into homes across the country, Iraqis at lunch tables and in living rooms found themselves wondering what, if anything, would be different. … The skepticism springs from how Iraqis see the violence. Mr. Zarqawi is part of a larger galaxy of gangs and criminal groups that kill and kidnap with virtual impunity as the state watches helplessly."

DOJ_NMG_0032812

USA Today (6/9, Sabah, Soriano) also reports "most" Iraqis said Zarqawi's death "would do little to slow the pace of insurgent violence and sectarian killings."

The Washington Post (6/9, A18, Hernandez, Nouri), meanwhile, runs a story titled "Joy In The Streets: 'A Day Of Festivity,'" saying "many Iraqis greeted the news with cheers, applause, ululation, celebratory gunfire and feasting." But "Zarqawi's death came as ominous news to other Iraqis who saw him as a fearless defender of the country's Sunni minority against foreign occupiers, Shiite death squads and Iranian agents."

Reaction To Zarqawi's Death Across Middle East Said To Be Mixed. The Washington Post (6/9, A19, Shadid) reports that in the Middle East, "a region roiling with resentment over U.S. policy and fear of its repercussions, Zarqawi's death was greeted much as his life was: with confusion and suspicion. Some in Tripoli and elsewhere in the Arab world hailed him as a hero, as they might anyone fighting the United States. Others expressed relief and joy at the death of a man blamed for killing hundreds of innocent Iraqis. But often heard Thursday was a sense of wariness -- no one was quite sure who Zarqawi was, or what his death meant."

Identification Of Zarqawi Spiritual Adviser Was Key Point In Operation. The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Finer) reports a "crucial breakthrough in the hunt" for Zarqawi "came last month when Jordanian intelligence officers captured one of Zarqawi's mid-level operatives near the Iraqi border, according to the official. Employed by the Iraqi government as a customs clearance officer in Rutbah, along the main road from Amman to Baghdad, the operative identified himself as Ziad Khalaf al-Kerbouly. Kerbouly said in a statement broadcast by Jordanian television on May 23 that he used his position to help Zarqawi smuggle cash and materiel for the insurgency." Kerbouly also "told Jordanian interrogators something that they did not broadcast: The identity and contacts for Zarqawi's new 'spiritual adviser,' Sheik Abdel Rahman."

ABC World News Tonight (6/8, lead story, 4:35, Raddatz) reported, "A special operations team, Task Force 145, had been zeroing in on Zarqawi for months. Tracking his lieutenants and bombmakers. Getting ever-closer to Zarqawi himself." Gen. George Casey: "Tips and intelligence from Iraqi senior leaders from his network, led our forces to Zarqawi and some of his associates, who were conducting a meeting, approximately eight kilometers north of Baquba, when the operation was launched." Raddatz: "Officials tell ABC News the operation began three days ago when Task Force 145 learned that Zarqawi's so-called spiritual adviser, Sheik Rahman, would attending a meeting with Zarqawi."

USA Today (6/9, Nichols, Kelley) reports US military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell "didn't specify how U.S. officials knew for sure that al-Iraqi would meet with Zarqawi, but he indicated that al-Iraqi had been watched for weeks and was considered key to Zarqawi's whereabouts." Caldwell said, "Somebody inside the al-Zarqawi network [had identified al-Iraqi]. It truly was a very long, painstaking, deliberate exploitation of intelligence, information gathering, human sources, electronics, signal intelligence that was done over a period of time — many, many weeks."

The New York Times (6/9, Filkins, Mazzetti, Oppel) reports, "What the Americans had always lacked was someone from inside Mr. Zarqawi's network, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, who would betray him — someone close enough and trusted enough to show the Americans where he was. According to a Pentagon official, the Americans finally got one." The official "said that an Iraqi informant inside Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia provided the critical piece of intelligence about Mr. Rahman's meeting with Mr. Zarqawi. The source's identity was not clear — nor was it clear how that source was able to pinpoint Mr. Zarqawi's location without getting killed himself." A Jordanian official "close to the investigation said the mission that killed Mr. Zarqawi was a joint operation conducted by the Americans and Jordanian intelligence. The source inside Mr. Zarqawi's group, the Jordanian official said, had been cultivated at least in part by Jordanian intelligence agents."

The Washington Times (6/9, Scarborough) reports that after identifying Zarqawi's location, "An attack was planned, but with a twist. Commanders did not use ground troops because Zarqawi had eluded coalition forces before, having been tipped off that armored vehicles were headed his way. Commanders instead decided on a quick air strike, giving Zarqawi's lookouts no time to tip off the man responsible for thousands of deaths in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (6/8, lead story, 2:55, Martin) reported, "The final moments of Zarqawi's violent life were played out in a remote farmhouse amid a grove of palm trees. Isolation, he felt, protected him from prying eyes, but in fact made him a sitting duck." Iraqi police "pulled his body from the rubble and cleaned him up for his final mug shot. Fingerprints proved who it was. There were six bodies in all, including a woman and child, possibly Zarqawi's wife and baby, and this man, Sheik Abn al-Rahman." While American "and Iraqi troops picked through the rubble, other soldiers were going after the rest of Zarqawi's network, raiding 17 of his safe houses in and around Baghdad. They'd been holding off on hitting these safe houses, because they didn't want to spook Zarqawi just as they were closing in on him. The US military says these raids have already yielded a treasure trove of intelligence."

NBC Nightly News (6/8, lead story, 4:05, Williams) reported, "Today, the US allowed the Iraqi prime minister to break this news to the world. A giant framed picture of the dead terrorist was shown and tonight a huge question remains." NBC (Engel) added, "Two US F-16 jets on patrol over Iraq like these were scrambled last evening as part of an intense six-week manhunt for Iraq's most wanted terrorist." When US Special Forces "confirmed Zarqawi was inside, they fired two 500-pound bombs. US military officials who swept the area after the attack say Zarqawi, Rahman, and four others were killed instantly."

DOJ_NMG_0032813

US Military Says Al-Masri Likely Successor To Zarqawi. USA Today/AFP (6/9) reports US military officials said Zarqawi "would be succeeded by an Egyptian-born lieutenant known as Abu al-Masri." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said, "It would probably be Abu al-Masri if you had to pick someone who would be the person that would try to occupy the position that Zarqawi had."

Zarqawi Called "Godfather" Of Terrorism In Iraq. The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Finer) reports in a front page story that US commanders and officials "have consistently called Zarqawi's al-Qaeda in Iraq organization the top threat to the country's security and made eliminating Zarqawi a priority. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad called him 'the godfather of sectarian killing and terrorism in Iraq.' Some outside analysts, however, have said U.S. officials have long overemphasized his role, which by their account further waned in recent months during a growing rift between Iraqi and foreign-born insurgents."

ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 2, 2:50, Ross) reported, "Zarqawi was one of many insurgent leaders in Iraq. But at the age of 39, he became public enemy number one for the US in Iraq. And today, he was remembered as the godfather of terror. Zarqawi was a teenage street thug in Jordan. Sent to prison for petty crimes, before joining al Qaeda in Afghanistan in 1989. He achieved his prominence running al Qaeda in Iraq because what he did was so ruthless and provided dramatic pictures."

The CBS Evening News (6/8, story 5, 2:00, Dozier) reported, "Zarqawi claimed responsibility for some of the worst violence this country has seen, including the massive attack on the United Nations compound in 2003, hauntingly caught on film by a CBS cameraman at a press conference. Zarqawi also attacked Shiite targets, his stated goal to turn Sunni Muslims against Shiites and turn Iraq into a militant fundamentalist state. Zarqawi started the trend of grisly kidnappings and beheading, with American Nicholas Berg his first victim."

The New York Times (6/9, Gettleman) reports Zarqawi "was always something of a phantom, to the American military, to the Iraqi people he was supposedly fighting for and even to the men and women who grew up with him in his native Jordan." As the Iraqi "insurgency increased, American military officials increasingly blamed Mr. Zarqawi for the bloodshed. Military officials portrayed him as a global threat on the scale of Osama bin Laden and shared letters they say he wrote urging sectarian war in Iraq. However, several people who knew Mr. Zarqawi well, including former cellmates, voiced doubts about his ability to be an insurgent leader, or the leader of anything."

Zarqawi Said To Be First To Fully Exploit Internet For Terrorist Organizing. The New York Times (6/9, Shane) reports, "Over the last two years, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi established the Web as a powerful tool of the global jihad, mobilizing computer-savvy allies who inspired extremists in Iraq and beyond with lurid video clips of the bombings and beheadings his group carried out." Yesterday, the "electronic network that he helped to build was abuzz with commentary about his death, with supporters posting eulogies, praising what they called his martyrdom and vowing to continue his fight." The "flood of Web tributes, their tone more defiant than sorrowful, reached an audience that Mr. Zarqawi had greatly expanded. While other militants, from the Chechen separatists to Hamas Palestinians, had built Web sites to spread their message, Mr. Zarqawi and his aides were the first to take full advantage of the technology." Zarqawi's "Web propaganda generated and probably embellished his reputation in the Iraqi insurgency. But it also helped secure the Internet as a center of terrorist recruitment and instruction, partly supplanting the role of old Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan, according to counterterrorism officials and analysts."

Iraqi Parliament Approves Three Top Security Officials. USA Today/AP (6/9) reports Iraq's parliament "approved three key security officials Thursday. Their approval ended an impasse that had threatened Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's plan for Iraqi forces to gradually take over security from U.S. and other foreign troops." The three were "sworn in just minutes after al-Maliki in a separate event announced that U.S. forces had killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." Efforts to "install defense, interior and national security ministers had been held up by squabbling among the Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish parties in the unity government that took office May 20." Iraq's new defense minister "is Gen. Abdul-Qader Mohammed Jassim al-Mifarji, a Sunni Arab," and the "other two ministers are from the Shiite majority: Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani and Sherwan al-Waili, minister of state for national security."

Maliki Outlines Plan For Democratic Iraq. In a Washington Post (6/9) op-ed, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki writes, "The completion of the national unity government Thursday in Iraq marks the starting point for repaying Iraqis' commitment to and thirst for democracy. He writes that Iraq's national unity government will pursue "an uncompromising agenda to deliver security and services to the Iraqi people and to combat rampant corruption." Maliki writes, "Iraqis have elected a national unity government that will always put national interests ahead of sectarian or ethnic agendas. This government will support the judiciary in relentlessly pursuing the murderers and kidnappers who have blighted Iraqi society. With the help of the international community and regional partners, we will be able to defeat the terrorist groups in Iraq." Maliki promises that his government will "persevere to make Iraq a prosperous democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0032814

Little Chance Seen That US Will Reduce Troops Levels To 100,000. The New York Times (6/9, Shanker, Sanger) reports senior Administration "and military officials now acknowledge that there is little chance the United States can reach the milestone of reducing American troop levels in Iraq to 100,000 by December, a goal that earlier in the year had seemed within reach." The subject "of future troop levels is certain to be an important part of President Bush's two-day war cabinet meeting, which will start Monday at Camp David." In preparation, military planners "in Iraq and at the Pentagon have been refining troop-rotation proposals that, in the best case, would reduce levels to 110,000 to 120,000 troops by the end of December, from current levels of about 130,000, administration and military officials said." Any decision "to delay the informal timetable of reducing American troops to 100,000 would signal that the field commanders responsible for securing and stabilizing specific regions across Iraq had prevailed in the military's intense internal discussions of the road ahead."

NATO Reaffirms Expansion Of Role In Southern Afghanistan. The New York Times (6/9, Gordon) reports NATO defense ministers meeting in Brussels "on Thursday reaffirmed their plans to expand the alliance's control of southern Afghanistan in the face of increased resistance by Taliban fighters and drug traffickers." NATO has been "progressively increasing the number of its troops and its reach in Afghanistan. That operation has emerged as a major test of the alliance's ability to respond to new security challenges far from Europe." The plans "for Afghanistan were a main subject at the meeting, which also dealt with plans to establish a NATO Response Force to deal with new crises, among other initiatives that are to be formally ratified when allied leaders hold a summit meeting in November in Riga, Latvia."

US Releases 33 Afghan Detainees From Bagram Air Base. The New York Times (6/9, Gall, Khapalwak) reports the United States military "on Thursday released 33 Afghans from detention at Bagram Air Base and handed them over to the Afghan authorities." The detainees "were given some clothing and money by the Afghan authorities and freed as part of the country's reconciliation program." Several detainees "interviewed after their release complained of harsh treatment in a newly built wing of the detention center. They said there were frequent protests by detainees, which were sometimes put down with tear gas. They also said conditions in the old wing of the detention center were more bearable."

School Performance Of Military Children Falls. NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 12, 2:10, Williams) reported, "In many ways Killeen, Texas, is the ultimate company town. The company happens it's to be the US Army. Fort Hood, Texas, home of 3 Corps, the 4th Infantry, and the 1st Cav. The military is part of the fabric of so many lives there. It's very visible at the local high school where the students study away for finals while so many parents are away in the fight." NBC (Teague) added, "Take two steps through the front entrance of Shoemaker High School in Killeen, Texas, and the price of war becomes impossible to ignore. Seven gold stars hang above the doors, honoring seven parents killed in Iraq." For "most teenagers, simply going to high school is stressful enough, but imagine going to a school where almost 90% of the students have parents in the military and many of those parents are fighting overseas. Teachers say the stress leads to falling grades and disciplinary problems."

DOJ:

SG Clement Lauded By Peers, Scalia. The Legal Times (6/9, Mauro) reports, "Paul Clement has been solicitor general of the United States for less than a year, so he was suspicious when he heard that Georgetown University Law Center's Supreme Court Institute wanted to honor him at its annual reception recently. It sounded valedictory, Clement said. … But judging by the accolades, Clement has substantial job security. Predecessor Theodore Olson said that Clement has already met a '24 karat gold' standard for advocacy. In the way of Washington, Clement was even praised by someone who was his adversary less than a month earlier: Georgetown professor Neal Katyal, who argued against Clement in the Guantánamo Bay detainee case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. … But the warmest words came from Justice Antonin Scalia, for whom Clement clerked in 1993 and 1994. Scalia said that Clement, who had shown his talents as deputy solicitor general before being promoted, was 'the sentimental favorite' among justices for the post. 'I am so glad he is solicitor general, because he makes my job easier.'" The Legal Times continues, "But Scalia mystified the audience somewhat by revealing one complaint he had about Clement: the black vest he wears to the Court with the customary swallow-tail morning coat as solicitor general. … Scalia insisted the vest should be a pearl gray, and he thought Clement had broken with tradition. … But the justice said he had the Court curator look up the history of the outfit, and, sure enough, Clement was right; black is the proper and traditional color for the SG's vest."

DOJ_NMG_0032815

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

5th Circuit Frees Two Convicted Merrill Bankers Pending Enron Appeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Koppel) reports, "The Enron Task Force was dealt a blow as the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals released from prison two former bankers at Merrill Lynch & Co. who were convicted of fraud in 2004 for helping Enron Corp. artificially inflate its profit." The Journal continues, "The circuit ruled that Daniel Bayly, Merrill's onetime investment-banking chief, and Robert Furst, the Enron relationship manager for Merrill, could be released on bail while they appeal their fraud convictions in connection with a barge transaction." The Journal adds, "In 1999, Merrill invested in Enron electricity-generating power barges, allowing Enron to book $12 million in earnings. The government argued that because Enron guaranteed Merrill's profit in the deal, Enron had improperly booked the earnings and overstated its profit. Mr. Bayly was sentenced to 30 months in prison, while Mr. Furst received a 37-month sentence. … The court didn't reverse the convictions, but its ruling was a good sign for the defendants, lawyers said. 'It is hard to imagine why they would order defendants released from prison, unless the court was going to reverse their convictions,' said David Spears, who represents another former Merrill executive, William Fuhs, who also was convicted in the Enron barge matter and later released on bail by the Fifth Circuit."

Ruling Gives Lay, Skilling Hope. USA Today (6/9, Farrell) reports, "There may be hope for Ken Lay yet. … A federal appeals court Thursday ordered two former Merrill Lynch bankers released from prison while they appeal their convictions in an Enron-related fraud case. They could be freed as soon as today." USA continues, "The 5th Circuit Court of Appeals' decision to grant bail to Daniel Bayly and Robert Furst indicates their 2004 convictions are likely to be overturned, say lawyers who have followed the case. … The decision has sparked hope among lawyers for former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, convicted two weeks ago of conspiring to hide the company's financial condition from investors. Their sentencing is set for Sept. 11, and each faces more than two decades in prison." USA adds, "Mike Ramsey, Lay's lead attorney, said his client was 'elated by the news.' During the trial, Ramsey accused prosecutors of overreaching. … 'It means the 5th Circuit is taking the task force seriously, grading their papers seriously,' Ramsey said. 'They're looking seriously at their conduct, the way they investigated this case and their theories of prosecution.'" USA notes, "It wouldn't be the first reversal for the Enron Task Force. Last year, the Supreme Court overturned the obstruction of justice conviction of Arthur Andersen, Enron's former auditor."

Milberg Weiss' Expert Witness Feeling Pressure From Federal Prosecutors. The California Recorder (6/9, Scheck) reports, "As the star expert for the plaintiff firm Milberg Weiss, John Torkelsen became a legend for his ability to cap an all-night binge with a crack performance in a deposition the next morning. … But his latest hangover won't be so easy to shake. As Torkelsen gets ready to start a five-year federal prison sentence -- he pleaded guilty last year in a scheme to defraud the government of investment cash -- he's feeling the squeeze of L.A. federal prosecutors." The Recorder continues, "They indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman and two of its name partners last month on charges of paying illegal kickbacks to clients, and sources close to the case say they're looking deeper into Torkelsen, hoping to generate new charges against the firm -- and to continue their pursuit of William Lerach, Milberg Weiss' former star partner, who now heads his own firm in San Diego." The Recorder adds, "While Torkelsen has long been of interest to the Milberg prosecutors, his presence could underscore plaintiffs lawyers' criticism that the prosecution is politically convenient for the Bush administration. Milberg Weiss is a huge Democratic booster and scourge of Republican supporters, and prosecutors' probe of whether Torkelsen used money from Milberg to make donations could add fuel to that argument. … Of course, like much else in the six-year Milberg probe, the prosecutors' focus is far from new: Torkelsen has long been accused by securities defense lawyers -- and the business press -- of essentially being paid on contingency. That's a particularly stinging charge, given his job was to establish the value of shareholder losses in suits, and since he and the lawyers who employed him told courts that he was paid an hourly rate. That criticism gained steam after a 1998 deposition by L.A. defense lawyer Marshall Grossman, in which Torkelsen admitted he received more than his hourly rate in some cases, and no payment in ones where Milberg didn't get fees."

Michaels Stores To Miss SEC Deadline Due To Stock Options Review. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Maremont) reports, "Crafts retailer Michaels Stores Inc. became the latest company to report trouble with its past stock-options grants, saying it will be unable to file its latest quarterly report on time because the audit committee of its board of directors had initiated a review of its historical stock-options practices." The Journal continues, "The Irving, Texas, company, which operates more than 1,000 stores, said its board had started the review on a 'proactive basis,' due to media reports about problems with options-granting practices at other companies. … In a filing late yesterday, Michaels said the review was primarily focused on the period from 1990 to 2001. In a tacit admission that it might have serious issues, the company said during that period it had 'principally' granted options with exercise prices 'that generally preceded the date' on which the company's board had approved the grants by executing 'unanimous consent resolutions.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032816

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (6/9, Fuquay) reports, "Such options backdating, which frequently involves picking a day when the company's stock was at or near a low for the period, has become an issue for the SEC, Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service. The practice has the effect of maximizing the value of the options, which allow executives to buy shares of company stock at a set price. … More than two dozen public companies reportedly are being investigated. They include Affiliated Computer Services of Dallas, which on March 6 said the SEC was examining its options awards, and Caremark Rx, which has a Fort Worth pharmacy operation."

Cyberonics Latest Company Accused Of Stock Option Violations. The New York Times (6/9, Feder) reports, "New accusations of corporate stock option abuse were leveled yesterday, this time against Cyberonics, a medical device maker that is no stranger to controversy." The Times continues, "The company's board approved stock option grants for top executives one evening in June 2004, a few hours after receiving positive news about the regulatory prospects for a promising product. When trading began the next morning, Cyberonics shares soared, and along with them, the value of the options." The Times adds, "Yesterday, Cyberonics shares plunged nearly 16 percent when trading began, after Amit Hazan, a device industry analyst for SunTrust Robinson Humphrey, published an investor advisory about his concerns over the timing of those stock options, which were granted to Robert P. Cummins, Cyberonics' chairman and chief executive, and two of his lieutenants. … The analyst's report criticized the option grant, saying it gave Mr. Cummins an instant paper profit of $2.3 million, and profit of $150,000 each for the other two executives, but did nothing for other shareholders. … Mr. Cummins and the company countered that because the option grant had been immediately reported to the public and that he and the other men had not yet exercised any of the options, there was no cause for controversy. By the end of regular trading yesterday, the stock had regained most of its losses, closing down 20 cents at $23.59."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Dixon Convicted Of Bribery, But Still Alleges Entrapment, Racism By FBI. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/9, Baird) reports former Tennessee State Sen. Roscoe Dixon "was convicted Thursday of extortion for taking payoffs from a fake company set up by the FBI to catch corrupt lawmakers. … After the verdict, Dixon told reporters he had been tricked by the federal government and the men who gave him money. Dixon, who is black, also said the charges were an attempt to weaken black political power in Memphis. He said he had not decided whether to appeal and refused to comment on whether he might cooperate with prosecutors to get a lighter sentence." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/9, Conley) adds that Dixon, "who contended he was set up by the FBI and former associates, said he was disappointed, but that he accepts the jury's verdict. He said he is prepared to 'take my medicine,' but vowed to 'resurrect myself from the ashes.' … He said the indictments have 'decimated the African-American power base in this community,' but that the setback would be only temporary." But US Attorney David Kustoff "said the evidence in the case was strong. 'The audio and video evidence, the testimony of the government's witnesses and Mr. Dixon's own statements proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant broke the law and violated the trust that the public had entrusted him as an elected official of the State of Tennessee,' Kustoff said."

WPTY-TV Memphis (6/8) reports, "Even in defeat Dixon insists his conviction along with the indictments of other past and present lawmakers was entrapment on the part of the FBI. The now convicted Dixon believes it's an effort to break up the African-American Powerbase in Shelby County. … Federal prosecutors see it as laughable saying Dixon in his own words admitted to taking the money and pointed to the video evidence as proof. 'That is very compelling evidence,' said Tim DiScenza lead prosecutor for the US Attorney, 'I would think for a jury and it's compelling for us as we put the case together.' The question now, what message does this send others indicted. Leslie Ballen, whose client the Barry Myers the accused bagman, says this verdict should make others accused think twice about trial." WMC-TV Memphis (6/8) notes that the guilty verdict "is probably weighing heavily on the minds of four defendants still awaiting trial on Tennessee Waltz corruption charges. Political analyst Susan Adler Thorpe says, 'As long as it took the jury to come to that verdict it was a day and a half of deliberations tells an observer that the jury took its time and took each count very seriously.'"

The Chattanoogan (6/9) reports on the conviction and notes, "Republican gubernatorial candidate Sen. Jim Bryson said, 'When elected officials destroy the public trust they will be severely punished. That is why I led the effort to not allow indicted Sens. Bowers…and Crutchfield…to participate in the ethics special session. Gov. Bredesen was silent on that issue and he defended Sen. Ophelia Ford…when she was removed from the Senate due to a stolen election. Tennessee deserves a government worthy of the people of this state and that requires a governor willing to demand honest, ethical behavior from members of his own party.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032817

Former New Jersey Municipal Official Convicted Of Taking Bribes. The AP (6/9) reports, "A federal jury took about three hours to convict a former municipal official on corruption charges after hearing him brag to undercover FBI agents that he 'could smell a cop a mile away.' Raymond J. O'Grady, once an elected member of the Middletown Township Committee, was convicted of all five corruption charges he faced for taking of more than $10,000 in cash bribes." US District Judge William J. Martini "ordered O'Grady, who had been free on bail, be placed under house arrest until" his sentencing on Sept. 12. The AP notes, "O'Grady was among 11 current and former elected officials in Monmouth County who were arrested in February 2005 following a corruption sting operation." The New York Times (6/9, 1.19M) adds that O'Grady "was found guilty of accepting payments from undercover F.B.I. agents posing as vendors trying to obtain municipal contracts," and he "faces up to 71 months in federal prison."

The Newark Star-Ledger (6/9, Martin, 420K) notes that during the trial, "jurors watched and listened to FBI recordings in which O'Grady took $6,000 from undercover agents posing as contractors and another $2,000 that he believed was from a trucking company doing business with the county. … He was among nearly 20 public officials and contractors charged last year in FBI probes of corruption in Monmouth County. Several suspects have since pleaded guilty to charges, but O'Grady was the first to make the government prove its case before a jury." Assistant US Attorney James Nobile "said he hoped the verdict would send a message to not only the other defendants but 'anyone thinking of doing the kind of things that Mr. O'Grady did.'" The Asbury Park Press (6/9, Alexander) notes Judge Martini said that "the evidence in the case was overwhelming, and that O'Grady was a person 'who has no regard for the integrity of the system.' The judge said he did not believe O'Grady 'had any sense what he did was wrong.'"

New Jersey Agency Documents Subpoenaed In Ongoing UMDNJ Probe. The Newark Star-Ledger (6/9, Margolin, Sherman, 420K) reports, "Federal investigators have subpoenaed records from a powerful bistate agency as part of a widening criminal probe into a former administrator at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey and a prominent state senator, according to two people who have been briefed on the case. The subpoena, served on the Delaware River & Bay Authority last month, seeks records relating to community contributions made by the DRBA, along with expense reports for agency Chairman Warren Wallace and documents related to legal work done by the firm of Sen. Wayne Bryant." DRBA Commissioner Gary Simmerman said yesterday, "I think they're just checking things to make sure they are legitimate. As far as I'm concerned, in this case, they are." The AP (6/9) notes, "Federal prosecutors in New Jersey and Delaware and an FBI spokesman would not comment on the ongoing investigation."

Suburban-Chicago Mayor Arrested On Bribery Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/9, Robinson) reports, "Nicholas Blase, mayor of Niles for 45 years, was arrested as he left his house on his 78th birthday" yesterday, charged with "steering business to a friend's insurance agency in return for bribes over almost two decades. According to court documents, Blase threatened to withhold liquor licenses and business licenses from restaurant owners unless they bought insurance from the agency once owned by his late friend Ralph Weiner and now run by Weiner's sons." The Chicago Tribune (6/9, O'Connor, Keilman, 643K) notes, "Two insiders in the Weiner agency as well as an employee in Blase's law firm have provided crucial help to the FBI, the complaint states. Two of them secretly recorded conversations with the mayor. The Weiner agency secretly kicked back 20 percent of its commissions from Niles businesses to a shell company effectively controlled by the mayor, the charge alleges." The Tribune adds, "Len Reinebach, who tried without success to unseat Blase in the 2001 election, said he had heard rumors about business owners being pressured to buy insurance from a friend of the mayor's. He said he relayed the stories to the FBI that year, but never heard back from the agency. 'This was pre-[U.S. Atty.] Patrick Fitzgerald,' Reinebach said. 'They said, "You got proof? You got the goods?" I said, "No, I don't own a business. I know this from asking around."'"

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/9, Korecki, Main, Herman) reports, "On his way out of court, Blase vowed to fight the charges and denied wrongdoing. When asked if he would step down as mayor he blurted out 'No' and later said: 'I'm going to stay in office. I haven't been convicted of anything.' Blase said he was truthful during an FBI interview earlier this week. 'Oh yes, as a lawyer you know that you have to tell the truth,' said Blase, whose law license will be at risk if convicted." The Skokie Review (6/9, Johnson, Schneider) notes, "The charges were filed after a 4 1/2 year FBI investigation," which "began based on complaints from Niles businesses, Shapiro said. 'We received information from people who believed they were being pushed to buy insurance they didn't need or want,' he said." The Des Plaines Journal (6/9), WBBM-TV Chicago (6/8, Hartman), WLS-TV Chicago (6/8, Meincke) and WMAQ-TV Chicago (6/8, Martinez) also report on Blase's arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0032818

Sorich Lawyer Criticizes Circumstances Of FBI Interview With Daley. The Chicago Tribune (6/8, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports , "The FBI has conducted more than 1,000 interviews during its investigation of Mayor Richard Daley's administration, but Daley alone had a court reporter present to transcribe his statement to investigators, an FBI agent testified Thursday. … The content of that interview has not been made public, but Daley's arrangement with prosecutors became an issue Thursday in the trial of Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three other former city officials." FBI Special Agent John Hauser testified former Streets and Sanitation Department Managing Deputy Commissioner John Sullivan "told federal investigators that he did not know about preferential treatment in hiring for members of HDO and the other pro-Daley group, led by Streets and Sanitation official Daniel Katalinic. On cross-examination, Sullivan's attorney, Cynthia Giacchetti, said her client, unlike Daley, did not have the benefit of a verbatim transcript of his three question-and-answer sessions with the FBI. 'He never asked for it ahead of time, and that's what makes it different from Mayor Daley's interview,' Hauser said."

The Chicago Sun-Times (6/9, Warmbir, Korecki) reports on Giancchetti's criticism and notes, "While the defense suggested that prosecutors gave Daley a concession, that would seem to run contrary to an earlier defense suggestion that prosecutors want to unseat Daley. Daley did get benefits by testifying in a deposition-style setting rather than the grand jury. … But the investigators who interviewed Daley -- assistant U.S. attorneys Patrick Collins and Barry Miller and FBI agent John Hauser -- also would appear to get advantages as well. The investigators got a sworn statement from Daley," and "such a document is much more difficult to attack by a defense attorney if the matter ever came to court."

Defense Lawyer Claims Prosecutors Trying To Isolate, Intimidate Fumo Aide. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/9, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "A lawyer for a former aide to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo complained yesterday that prosecutors have sought to intimidate and isolate his client, cutting him off from a network of friends and colleagues as a condition of bail." Leonard Luchko "is prohibited from speaking to four dozen people who are witnesses or suspects in the FBI's wide-ranging investigation of the Philadelphia Democrat and a South Philadelphia charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods." Defense Lawyer James C. Schwartzman said yesterday, "It's just not done this way. What the government is hoping to gain, I don't know." Expressing outrage about Luchko's arrest, Schwartzman added, "I made it clear to the government for 18 months, that with a phone call, I would bring him in. Instead, they made a show for the public and perhaps for the fear factor."

State Senate Paying Legal Fees Of Subpoenaed, But Not Indicted, Employees. The Philadelphia Daily News (6/9, Hinkelman) reports, "State taxpayers may have been picking up the legal tab for the state Senate employees who have been subpoenaed in the federal grand-jury probe of Sen. Vincent Fumo. Senate Chief Clerk W. Russell Faber said yesterday 'legal representation [paid by the Senate] is available' for employees who testify before the grand jury." However, "Faber said the state Senate doesn't pay legal bills for employees who are charged with a crime or are targets of the probe."

Florida Prisons Suspend Contract Of Vendor Raided By FBI. The AP (6/9) reports, "The Florida Department of Corrections suspended the contract Thursday of a company which sells snacks and drinks to people who visit Florida prisons on weekends after state and federal agents raided its offices. Agents seized business records of American Institutional Services and were at the company all day Wednesday, FBI spokesman Jeff Westcott said Thursday. There were no arrests and the search warrant remains sealed, he said." The AP notes, "The FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are continuing a two-year investigation into the Corrections Department. The investigation led to the ouster of Secretary James Crosby in February and several other key administrators have lost their jobs after James McDonough took over as interim secretary." The Miami Herald (6/9, 323K) also reports on the contract suspension in "Florida Briefs."

Gubernatorial Candidates Returning AIS-Connected Political Contributions. The Miami Herald (6/9, Reinhard, 323K) reports, "Two candidates for governor are returning donations from a prison contractor whose Gainesville offices were raided by the FBI. Democratic state Sen. Rod Smith said Thursday that he will send $2,500 back to American Institutional Services. Republican state Attorney General Charlie Crist said he will return $500. His GOP rival, state Chief Financial Officer Tom Gallagher, is considering what to do with a $500 donation from AIS President Edward Dugger." The St. Petersburg Times (6/9, Liberto) notes that the FBI raid "cast a shadow on the gubernatorial aspirations" of Smith. "Although Smith returned some campaign money associated with Dugger, his gubernatorial bid still stands to benefit from the longtime friendship between the two. Dugger's AIS is the top contributor, at $30,000, to a political committee supporting Smith's campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0032819

Alleged Cuban Agent Bases Dismissal Motion On FBI Interrogation Transcripts. Under the headline "How The FBI Coaxed Cuba 'Confession'," the Miami Herald (6/9, Corral, 323K) reports lawyers for alleged Cuban agent Carlos Alvarez "are arguing that the indictment against Alvarez should be dismissed because 'he was promised that he would not be prosecuted so long as he provided government investigators with truthful information in response to their questions.' They want his confession thrown out." According to "declassified transcripts of the FBI's meetings" with Alvarez filed with the defense motion to dismiss, "the FBI peppered its interrogation with veiled threats and warnings. Alvarez wept as the FBI pressed him for more. 'Here, here, here,' an agent consoled Alvarez, 'everything is going to turn out fine. . . . There are no problems here. . . . Nobody will know that you spoke with us.'" The Herald adds, "FBI spokesman Michael Leverock said Thursday he could not comment on an ongoing case. … After reviewing the transcripts, some legal observers believe the FBI was employing techniques to try to flip Alvarez to cooperate and turn in his alleged Cuban intelligence handlers."

Pennsylvania Attorney Indicted On Embezzlement Charges. The Legal Intelligencer (6/9, Duffy) reports, "An Allentown, Pa., lawyer was indicted Thursday on charges of embezzling more than $1.5 million from the heirs of estates he was handling and real estate clients by transferring their funds to his own personal bank account -- sometimes forging his clients' signatures on checks." The LI continues, "Prosecutors claimed attorney Michael D. Kasprenski, 43, used some of the stolen money to buy a vacation home in Nova Scotia and to pay boarding costs for his horse. … The indictment charges Kasprenski with 11 counts of wire fraud, nine counts of mail fraud, one count of bank fraud and three counts of filing false federal income tax returns." The LI adds, "In addition to his law practice, Kasprenski was president of Turtle Abstract Co. and a sales agent for Lawyers Title Insurance Corp. The 20 instances of alleged embezzlement charged in the indictment range from $8,000 to nearly $500,000. … Kasprenski was arrested in February and was ordered to undergo a psychiatric evaluation by U.S. Magistrate Judge Arnold C. Rapoport. According to Kasprenski's lawyer, John J. Waldron of Huber & Waldron in Allentown, Kasprenski was found incompetent to stand trial. … Since then, Assistant U.S. Attorney Seth Weber and Waldron have filed several joint motions asking for extensions of the ordinary 30-day time limit in which to file an indictment. … In an interview Thursday, Waldron said Kasprenski is currently free on bail and living at home but is undergoing 'competency restoration' treatment with a psychiatrist and a psychologist. Waldron said he couldn't comment on the charges or any possible defenses because he has been unable to work with Kasprenski due to his psychiatric problems."

Bulger Associate Testifies FBI Handler Never Asked About Murders. The Boston Globe (6/9, Murphy, 484K) reports that at the "$50 million wrongful death suit filed against the federal government by the family of John McIntyre" yesterday, "convicted killer Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi testified…his FBI handler," John J. Connelly "never asked him or fellow informant James 'Whitey' Bulger if they killed anyone. And they didn't tell." The Globe adds, "Another former Bulger associate-turned-government witness, Kevin J. Weeks, took the stand yesterday and corroborated Flemmi's testimony. Weeks, now free after serving five years in prison for his role in five murders, including McIntyre's, said Connolly warned Bulger that 'one of the two people that were stopped coming off the Valhalla was cooperating.'" Meanwhile, the Boston Herald (6/9, Sweet, 220K) reports that Weeks "said he turned on his crew because his bosses bedded down with the FBI," and the Herald notes, "The gruesome memories of the former legbreaker and corpse-remover are being used against the FBI in a wrongful-death trial intended to make the feds pay for the very first time for letting Bulger and Flemmi get away with murder."

Virginia Governor's Decision To Delay Execution Sparks Criticism. The Washington Post (6/9, A1, Rondeaux, Shear) reports that Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) "delayed the execution of triple-killer Percy Levar Walton yesterday, a move that political adversaries said renews questions about the governor's commitment to enforce the death penalty. In a statement issued a little more than an hour before Walton's scheduled execution, Kaine said he would conduct an independent inquiry to determine whether Walton is too mentally ill to be put to death. 'Due to the history of judicial concern about his mental status, the claims in Walton's clemency petition are entitled to serious consideration,'" Kaine "wrote, ordering a new execution date in six months. 'It would be imprudent to either proceed with the execution or grant clemency without further review.'" Kaine's "critics said the governor's decision to delay the execution is a slap at the judicial system that convicted Walton, sentenced him to die and later allowed that punishment to stand through years of appeals. 'During the campaign in 2005, a lot of people questioned the governor's commitment to enforcing the death penalty,' said Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling (R). '[Kaine's decision] is going to renew the debate about this governor's willingness to enforce the death penalty when it's clearly in order.'"

Virginia High Court Overturns Death Sentence. The Washington Post (6/9, A8, George) reports, "The Virginia Supreme Court yesterday threw out the death sentence of a man whose case had led to a federal ban on executions of the mentally retarded, in a decision that was widely seen as creating new areas of death-penalty law." The Post continues, "In its 24-page opinion, the court ruled that a jury should not have been told that Daryl Atkins had been handed a death sentence by an earlier panel of jurors. The disclosure, the court wrote, "prejudiced his right to a fair trial on the issue of his mental retardation." … The court ordered a new trial on the single question of whether Atkins, 28, is mentally retarded. His IQ has been measured at various times as 59, 67, 74 and 76. Atkins was convicted eight years ago in the carjacking and murder of Eric Nesbitt, 21, an Air Force mechanic."

DOJ_NMG_0032820

The New York Times (6/9, Liptak) reports, "In 1996, Mr. Atkins, then 18, and another man abducted Eric Nesbitt, 21, an airman from Langley Air Force Base, forced him to withdraw money from an A.T.M. and then shot him eight times, killing him. Prosecutors have contended that the crime itself is evidence that Mr. Atkins is not retarded. … In yesterday's decision, the Virginia Supreme Court said the trial judge, N. Prentis Smiley Jr., of the York County-Poquoson Circuit Court in Yorktown, had made two mistakes in the trial, which was held last year and was limited to the question of whether Mr. Atkins is retarded. … Judge Smiley should not have told the jury that Mr. Atkins had been sentenced to death by another jury, the State Supreme Court ruled. 'In other words,' Justice Cynthia D. Kinser wrote for the unanimous court, 'the jury knew that, if it found Atkins mentally retarded, it would in effect be nullifying another jury's verdict.' … Judge Smiley's second error, Justice Kinser wrote, was to allow testimony from an expert witness who was unqualified."

Gillespie Testimony Sought In Phone-Jamming Suit. New Hampshire Democrats are asking a judge to force former RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie and other RNC operatives to answer questions under oath about a plot that jammed get-out-the-vote telephone lines on Election Day 2002. The AP (6/9) reports, "State Democratic Party officials say they are making deposition requests based on evidence from the criminal trial of former Bush campaign official James Tobin, of Bangor, Maine, who was sentenced last month to 10 months in prison on charges he helped plan the phone jamming. … Democrats are suing New Hampshire Republicans to find out how far up the chain of command the phone jamming plot reached, which tied up Democratic and a nonpartisan get-out-the-vote and ride-to-the-polls phone lines for more than an hour on Nov. 5, 2002, before Republicans called it off. The motion includes a request for White House phone and cell phone records."

North Dakota College Student Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The AP (6/9) reports, "A University of North Dakota student has pleaded guilty to distributing and possessing child pornography, the U.S. attorney says. James Russell Jackson of Grand Forks pleaded guilty on Thursday to one count of distribution of material involving the sexual exploitation of minors, and one count of possession of materials involving the sexual exploitation of minors, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said. … Authorities said Jackson distributed child pornography over the Internet to an FBI undercover special agent," and "the FBI said it executed a search warrant for Jackson's dormitory room at the school and found hundreds of still images and videos of young children involved in sexually explicit conduct, many of which depicted 'sadistic and masochistic conduct.'"

Matalin To Host Fundraiser For Libby Defense Fund. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Ex-Cheney aide Mary Matalin hosts $500-a-head June 20 reception for Libby's defense fund. A flier for the event says $5,000 co-hosts include former Commerce Secretary Don Evans, former Energy Secretary Spence Abraham, and Bush political ad-man Mark McKinnon."

Second Dancer's Statement Disputes Duke Rape Allegations. The New York Times (6/9, Wilson) reports, "A stripper at a Duke University lacrosse team party has contradicted statements by another dancer who says she was raped at the party, and by the detective who described the matter to a judge, defense lawyers said in a court filing Thursday." The Times continues, "The lawyers also said medical evidence did not support the charge of rape by the woman, a 27-year-old student and mother of two who worked for an escort service." The Times adds, "Three Duke students have been charged with rape, kidnapping and assault in the case. They have pleaded innocent. A preliminary court hearing is set for June 22. Benjamin W. Himan, the lead detective on the case for the Durham police, filed a sworn statement on March 23 with Ronald L. Stephens, a Durham County judge, saying the woman had been raped and assaulted for about 30 minutes. The affidavit led the judge to order 46 lacrosse team members to submit to photographs and DNA testing. … But documents in the court filing show that the second dancer, Kim M. Pittman, 32, of Durham, told the police on March 20 and March 22 that she had been with the woman who has said she was raped for all but five minutes of the night of the party, March 13, and that any accusation of sexual assault was 'a crock.' … Ms. Pittman has more recently said in news media interviews that she is not sure what happened." USA Today/AP (6/9) also reports this story.

DOJ_NMG_0032821

Judge Denies Vatican's Motion To Dismiss In Sex Abuse Case. The AP (6/9, McCall) reports, "A federal judge has ruled that a sex abuse lawsuit against the Vatican can move forward with the claim that the Holy See bears responsibility for a priest who was transferred from city to city even though he was known to be a molester." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Michael Mosman said in his decision Wednesday that there are exceptions to the Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act, under which the Vatican is typically immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts. … Rejecting the Vatican's bid to dismiss the case, Mosman ruled that there was enough of a connection between the Vatican and the priest, who died in 1970, for him to be considered a Vatican employee under Oregon law." The AP adds, "No one has ever successfully sued the Vatican over molestation by Roman Catholic priests and some legal experts have dismissed such lawsuits as publicity stunts. … The lawsuit filed in 2002 by a Seattle-area man claims the Vatican, the Archdiocese of Portland and the archbishop of Chicago conspired to protect the Rev. Andrew Ronan by moving him from Ireland to Chicago to Portland despite a history of abuse. … In the ruling, Mosman noted that Ronan admitted to sexual abuse at the Archdiocese of Armagh in Ireland before he was moved to St. Philip's High School in Chicago, where he admitted to abusing three boys. Ronan was then placed at St. Albert's Church in Portland, where the plaintiff claims Ronan repeatedly abused him in the late 1960s."

LATimes Says Online Gambling Should Be Legal. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/9) urges Congress to reject efforts to ban online gambling. The Times notes, "Doesn't the federal government have better things to do than try to block people from going online to make a wager on the Super Bowl or the Final Four?" The Times adds, "Legalizing online gambling and regulating the industry -- as Britain has done -- is the best way to toughen protections against gambling by minors, identify problem gamblers and ensure that online sites are more scrupulous than the back-alley bookie. … Moralistic members of Congress should not be allowed to thwart online freedoms. It's unlikely they will succeed anyway. The issue is whether Washington is to have any leverage over the burgeoning online gambling world, or whether that world will remain beyond the reach of U.S. law."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Probing Louisiana Inmates' Abuse Allegations. The Shreveport Times (6/9, Welborn) reports, "The FBI is investigating some Bayou Dorcheat Correctional Center inmates' claims that they have been mistreated at at the hands of the Webster Parish prison's warden, Sheriff Gary Sexton and the FBI confirmed today." The Times continues, "FBI investigators questioned inmates, prison staff members and Warden Steve Risner on Monday. Their report, when completed, will be submitted to the U.S. Justice Department for review, said Sexton, who was briefed by investigators Monday. … Meanwhile, the sheriff said he is standing firmly behind Risner. 'I'm running a prison, not a day-care center. I stand behind (Risner) 365 days, and we'll go to court 365 days if we have to.'" The Times adds, "FBI Senior Agent Mike Kinder is uncertain how long the investigation initiated this week will take. 'We're looking into it to see if allegations are credible or not.' Allegations came from 'several inmates,' he added. … The inquiry stems from inmates who allege their civil rights were violated when they were sprayed with chemical mace and another inmate claiming he was shot with the Taser, Sexton said."

Senate Blocks Bill Giving Hawaiians Native American Status. The AP (6/9, Abrams) reports, "The Senate on Thursday dashed efforts to give native Hawaiians some of the same powers of self-governance granted to American Indians. Critics argued that the measure could lead to race-based privileges in a state known for its diversity." A procedural vote "fell four short of the 60 votes needed to keep the bill on the Senate floor. With that, the legislation, promoted by Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, over the past seven years, was effectively dead for this session of Congress." The vote was "56-41 in favor of proceeding with the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act. All 41 no votes were cast by Republicans. Thirteen Republicans and one independent joined 42 Democrats in supporting further action on the bill."

The New York Times (6/9, Files) notes the Justice Department "sent a letter this week to the majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, saying that it opposed the bill because it went against the nation's tradition of assimilation and would divide people by race." The United States Commission on Civil Rights "voted last year to recommend that Congress not pass the bill, contending that it would 'discriminate on the basis of race or national origin and further subdivide the American people into discrete subgroups accorded varying degrees of privilege.'"

The Washington Times (6/9, Debose) reports "thirteen Republicans -- including, Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona, one of the bill's chief opponents -- voted for a floor debate. Mr. Kyl would not elaborate on why he voted for cloture except to say, 'I made a commitment, and I honor my commitments.' Two Democrats, Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, did not vote." USA Today (6/9) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0032822

Krauthammer Says Gay Marriage Amendment Not Needed. Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (6/9, A23) that the Senate debate on gay marriage "revolved around the two possible grounds for the so-called Marriage Protection Amendment: federalism and popular sovereignty. Federalism. … Congress's Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) explicitly prevents the state-to-state export of gay marriage. … The Marriage Protection Amendment is therefore superfluous. … Popular Sovereignty. Gay marriage is a legitimate social issue to be decided democratically. The problem is that imperial judges are legislating their personal preferences, striking down popular will and calling it constitutional law." Krauthammer adds that "there is no need (yet) to disfigure the U.S. Constitution with a policy amendment."

ANTITRUST:

House Passes Telecom Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Schatz) reports, "House lawmakers took a step toward the first major rewrite of the nation's telecommunications laws in a decade, approving a bill that makes it easier for phone companies to get into the cable-television business." The measure, which passed on a 321-101 vote, "establishes a national video franchise that would allow phone companies including AT&T Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. to bypass local governments when seeking to offer pay TV service. It extends similar rights to cable companies." It also "authorizes the Federal Communications Commission to enforce "net neutrality" principles, which require Internet providers to allow consumers to use the Internet as they choose." The Washington Post (6/9, D2, Mohammed) calls the vote "a defeat for the cable industry." House passage "shifts attention to the Senate, where telecom analysts believe it will be harder to pass similar legislation this year."

CNET News (6/9, McCullagh) reports, "The U.S. House of Representatives definitively rejected the concept of Net neutrality on Thursday, dealing a bitter blow to Internet companies like Amazon.com, eBay and Google that had engaged in a last-minute lobbying campaign to support it." CNET continues, "By a 269-152 vote that fell largely along party lines, the House Republican leadership mustered enough votes to reject a Democrat-backed amendment that would have enshrined stiff Net neutrality regulations into federal law and prevented broadband providers from treating some Internet sites differently from others." CNET adds, "Of the 421 House members who participated in the vote that took place around 6:30 p.m. PT, the vast majority of Net neutrality supporters were Democrats. Republicans represented most of the opposition. … The vote on the amendment came after nearly a full day of debate on the topic, which prominent Democrats predicted would come to represent a turning point in the history of the Internet. … At issue is a lengthy measure called the Communications Opportunity, Promotion, and Enhancement (COPE) Act, which a House committee approved in April. Its Republican backers, along with broadband providers such as Verizon and AT&T, say it has sufficient Net neutrality protections for consumers, and more extensive rules would discourage investment in wiring American homes with higher-speed connections."

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Lucent-Alcatel Merger. The AP (6/9) reports, "Telecommunications equipment maker Lucent Technologies Inc. said in a regulatory filing Thursday that its $13.4-billion merger with France's Alcatel SA received antitrust clearance." The AP continues, "The Federal Trade Commission on Wednesday granted the companies early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. … The transaction remains subject to additional customary regulatory and governmental reviews in the U.S., Europe and elsewhere, as well as the approval by shareholders of both Lucent and Alcatel and other conditions, Lucent said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission." The AP adds, "Under the deal announced in March, shareholders of New Jersey-based Lucent will get 0.1952 Alcatel American depositary shares for each Lucent share held."

General Dynamics Receives FTC Approve For Anteon Buy. Dow Jones (6/9) reports, "General Dynamics Corp. received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission for its $2.2 billion acquisition of Anteon International Corp." Dow Jones continues, "The agency said Thursday that it granted early termination Wednesday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … As reported, Anteon will be combined with the General Dynamics Network Systems business unit to form a new organization known as General Dynamics Information Technology, which will be based in Fairfax, Va."

Microsoft Says It Offered Concessions In Adobe Dispute. InformationWeek (6/8, Ricadela) reports, "Microsoft said Wednesday it had offered multiple concessions to Adobe Systems, including shipping Adobe's Flash and Shockwave software with Windows Vista, to try to resolve their dispute over document formats." IW continues, "Adobe confronted Microsoft earlier this year over the planned ability for Microsoft's upcoming Office 2007 software to create files in the Portable Document Format, a technology Adobe developed. Adobe also complained about Microsoft's development of technology called the XML Paper Specification, a potential alternative to PDF, and its integration with the upcoming Windows Vista operating system." IW adds, "Microsoft agreed to remove functions for saving documents in PDF and XPS formats from Office 2007, due early next year, and to offer the features as separate downloads. The dispute became public last week when Microsoft's lead attorney said in a report in the Wall Street Journal that Adobe was preparing to file an antitrust lawsuit in Europe over the matter. … Microsoft has said publicly that in addition to agreeing to separate the PDF- and XPS-creation features from Office, it offered to give PC makers the choice not to include XPS viewing and printing technology with installations of Vista on their machines. The Vista operating system is due early next year. A Microsoft spokeswoman said Wednesday the company had also offered to ship Flash and Shockwave, which let PC users view multimedia files, with Vista."

DOJ_NMG_0032823

Canadian Antitrust Regulators Clear Mittal Steel's Bid For Arcelor. AFP (6/9) reports, "Mittal Steel, the world's largest steel producer, said that Canadian antitrust regulators have given a green light to its bid to acquire European rival Arcelor. … 'Mittal Steel today announces that the Canadian Competition Bureau (CCB) has confirmed that it will not challenge the bid by Mittal Steel to acquire Arcelor,' Mittal said in a statement received here. 'This clearance is a further positive and important step towards the successful completion of Mittal's bid,' it said. Mittal added that the CCB clearance was 'unconditional'." AFP adds, "The company's 25.8-billion-euro (32.94-billion-dollar) bid for Arcelor has already been approved by European and US regulators. After the start of Mittal's offer to shareholders in Europe, Arcelor announced plans to acquire Russian steel producer Severstal in a bid to scupper Mittal's ambitions. … Executives from Arcelor and Mittal Steel are to meet for the first time between now and the weekend to discuss the unsolicited takeover bid, Arcelor had said Wednesday. But Arcelor has stressed that the meeting was to discuss a business plan submitted by Mittal detailing its future projects and insisted that the talks did not constitute friendly takeover negotiations."

Falconbridge, Inco Agree To Sell Norwegian Nickel Refinery. Bloomberg (6/9, Donville) reports, "Inco Ltd. and Falconbridge Ltd., seeking regulatory approval for the biggest mining merger ever, agreed to sell a Norwegian nickel refinery to LionOre Mining International Ltd. for $650 million in cash and stock." Bloomberg continues, "LionOre will pay $400 million in cash and $250 million in shares for the Falconbridge-owned Nikkelverk plant, Inco and Falconbridge, both based in Toronto, said today in a statement. The transaction is intended to address antitrust concerns of U.S. and European regulators, the companies said." Bloomberg adds, "Colin Steyn, LionOre's chief executive officer, said in an interview the purchase of the Norwegian refinery would raise his company's 2006 per-share earnings by as much as 45 cents. LionOre last year had earnings from continuing operations of 29 cents a share, according to Bloomberg data. … Inco has offered C$19.1 billion ($17.1 billion) in cash and stock for Falconbridge to create the world's largest nickel producer and one of the biggest in copper. Inco rejected an unsolicited takeover offer by Teck Cominco Ltd., and Falconbridge has turned down a hostile bid by Xstrata Plc. Both rival bids are still pending."

Cathay Pacific To Gain Control Of Dragonair. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Stanley, Santini, Ng) reports, "Cathay Pacific Airways said it has reached an 8.22 billion Hong Kong dollar (US$1.06 billion) deal to buy out Hong Kong Dragon Airlines, in a deal that will give it control of a smaller Hong Kong counterpart and an unmatched presence in mainland China's booming aviation market." The Journal continues, "Cathay will buy the 82.2% of Dragonair that it and Cathay parent Swire Pacific Ltd. don't already own by taking over shares held by two mainland companies and a small minority shareholder stake. Cathay said it would pay Dragonair holders HK$820 million in cash, with the rest funded by new Cathay shares.Chinese flag carrier Air China will take a 17.5% stake in Cathay, while Cathay will double its 10% stake in Air China to 20%." The Journal adds, "The deal, completed after 18 months of negotiations, combines Cathay's strengths in premium long-haul service with Air China's dense domestic network. … Cathay and Air China will operate 'essentially as a joint venture' in China, according to one person knowledgeable about it. Air China and Cathay will share revenue and costs on all the routes where they and Dragonair overlap inside China. Air China will be responsible for sales and marketing in the mainland for all three carriers; Cathay will do the same in Hong Kong, Macau and Taiwan. Dragonair will remain an independent brand for six years. … Cathay and Dragonair also plan to establish a joint-venture cargo airline based in Shanghai. Air China will own 51%, and Cathay the rest."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Fines Detroit Metro Airport Authority For River Pollution. The Detroit Free Press (6/9, Ashenfelter) reports, "A federal judge on Thursday fined the authority that runs Detroit Metropolitan Airport $75,000 and sentenced the body to four years of probation for failing to report the dumping of 25 million gallons of polluted water in May 2001 into a drain that empties into the Detroit River." The Free Press continues, "U.S. District Judge George Steeh also ordered the Wayne County Airport Authority to build an $8.5-million sanitary sewer hookup so polluted water from one pond in particular that collects runoff from airplane deicing fluid in the winter can be sent to the Detroit Water and Sewerage Department for treatment. The project is well under way." The Free Press adds, "Steeh sentenced the authority under the terms of a plea agreement worked out by Justice Department lawyers Kris Dighe and James Morgulec and James Robinson, the authority's Washington D.C.-based lawyer. … The agreement also requires the authority to contribute $25,000 to the Friends of the Detroit River, a non-profit environmental group."

DOJ_NMG_0032824

BP Receives Subpoena In Alaska Oil Spill Probe. The AP (6/9) reports, "British oil company BP PLC confirmed Thursday it had received a subpoena from a U.S. grand jury investigating a massive oil leak in Alaska." The AP continues, "BP blamed the incident at Prudhoe Bay field in March, the largest ever spill on Alaska's North Slope region, on a small hole caused by corrosion in a pipeline. … 'We are fully cooperating with the investigation and we are carrying out our own investigation into what caused the corrosion,' BP spokesman David Nicholas said. 'We believe that our actions were at all times proper.'" The AP adds, "Up to 267,000 gallons were believed to have spilled onto the frozen ground from a 34-inch diameter pipeline in the tundra about 250 miles above the Arctic Circle. … BP discovered and plugged the leak on March 2. … A report prepared by a team of BP and state investigators found that a pipeline leak-detection system sounded warnings on four straight days in the week leading up to the spill, but field workers interpreted the signals as false alarms."

Florida To Remove Manatee From Endangered Species List. The New York Times (6/9, Aguayo) reports, "The Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission voted unanimously on Wednesday to remove the Florida manatee from the state's endangered species list. The move is already creating controversy among environmental groups that say manatees will not get the protection they need. … 'The commissioners are very much being pressured by development interests and to some extent boating interests that depend on consuming Florida wildlife and habitat,' said Patrick Rose, a biologist with the Save the Manatee Club." The Times continues, "The commission voted 7 to 0 to reclassify the manatee as a threatened species. The reclassification means that while the species is still at a high risk of extinction, the commission no longer considers it to be in imminent danger." The Times adds, "On the federal level, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service is re-evaluating the manatee's designation in the Endangered Species Act. … The process to reclassify the manatee in Florida began in 2001, when boating and development groups began a campaign against restrictions intended to protect the mammals. Since then, scientists working for the commission and others conducted studies and reviewed literature before advising commissioners that manatees no longer meet the criteria for listing as an endangered species. … The decision was based on several factors, including an increase in the manatee population to more than 3,000 this year from about 1,000 in the late 1970's."

Appeals Court Ruling Allows Oregon Logging-Rights Auction. The New York Times (6/9, Barringer) reports, "A legal struggle over logging in two roadless tracts of a national forest in Oregon ravaged by fire four years ago is coming to a conclusion as logging rights on more than 400 acres will be auctioned off by the Forest Service on Friday." The Times continues, "A federal appeals court ruled Wednesday that the sale could proceed. The timber sales, on two small tracts inside 500,000 fire-blighted acres, would not usually attract much attention — and indeed, it is unclear how much demand there will be for the timber, most of which has been dead and prey to insects and rot for four years. … But Oregon has long been the central battleground for environmental groups opposed to any logging anywhere on the 500,000 acres." The Times adds, "The objection is that logging could set back the regeneration of the forest by damaging fragile new growth, and that it would set a precedent for logging in an area that, under the currently approved plan for the Rogue River-Siskiyou National Forest, was supposed to remain roadless. .. Opening a roadless area at a time when governors are still drawing up proposals to indicate their preferences for where roads should and should not be built in the federal forests, drew the governors of Oregon, Washington, California and New Mexico to oppose these two sales."

CDC Says States Should Aim To Contain Bird Flu. The AP (6/9, Donald) reports, "States preparing for a possible bird flu outbreak should focus on how to contain the virus because a vaccine will be unavailable for several months," the head of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said Wednesday. "Out of the starting gate there won't be any vaccine, it'll take some time," Dr. Julie Gerberding told the AP. "So we've got to look at old-fashioned ways of slowing the virus down," she added.

CDC Urged To Broaden Scope Of Seasonal Flu Vaccines To Combat Bird Flu. CQ Homeland Security (6/9, Berger) reports scientists and medical experts are calling on the CDC to "expand recommendations for who should be vaccinated against the seasonal flu this fall because of potential benefits against an outbreak of an avian flu pandemic." Robert Webster, an influenza specialist at St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, told congressional aides Wednesday that the "current vaccine that is available will give you some basic immunity from the (avian flu) virus." Curtis Allen, a CDC spokesman, said the advisory committee "will discuss later this month whether to expand the recommendations further."

DOJ_NMG_0032825

Senate Seen As Unlikely To Debate New Energy Legislation Soon. CQ (6/9, Tollefson) reports, "There was a time when Republicans in both chambers were eyeing June as a showcase month for energy legislation, but those hopes are fading rapidly in the Senate." Although Republican leaders are "leaving the door open," CQ says, "don't look for them to bring a comprehensive energy bill to the floor anytime soon." Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M., is "expected to hold hearings on some kind of bipartisan energy legislation this month, but even targeted measures are unlikely to move before the July Fourth recess."

Campaign Seeks To Increase US Energy Independence. The Christian Science Monitor (6/9, Knickerbocker) reports, "In Washington this week, a bipartisan group of lawmakers, industry leaders (including the three Detroit automakers), farm groups, governors, county officials, and environmentalists launched an effort to have the nation get 25 percent of its total energy from renewable sources by 2025." The proposal, which as been dubbed "25x'25," goes "well beyond what Congress and the White House have enacted so far, and it's likely to encounter environmental and economic speed bumps along the way," the Monitor says. Boosters believe "a critical mass of public support has developed that puts a strong political wind at their backs." Meanwhile, a recent poll by Public Opinion Strategies of Alexandria, Va., "shows that 98 percent see shifting to domestically-produced renewable energy sources as important for the country" with 74 percent agreeing that it is "very important."

Vermont Yankee License Review May Be Widened After 9th Circuit Decision. The Vermont Guardian (6/9, Avard, Casa) reports, "In earlier meetings with local groups, NRC officials said nuclear waste storage; emergency planning and existing problems at Vermont Yankee would be excluded from the review." However, a recent 9th Circuit appeals court decision "ordered the NRC to assess potential effects of a terrorist strike at the Diablo Canyon reactor near San Luis Obispo in the scope of an environmental review of dry cask storage at that plant." NRC environmental project manager for the VY application, Rick Emch, "said he didn't want to speculate as to how the 9th Circuit decision might affect the VY process," but "NRC environmental branch division chief Rani Franovich said the decision could have 'broad-reaching implications' for all licenses currently under review."

Ruling May Affect Skull Valley Storage Site Appeal. The Salt Lake Tribune (6/9, Fahys) reports that in the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision, the judges "Several times…mentioned the commission's arguments against undertaking a similar study for the proposed" Skull Valley Nuclear Waste Storage site in Utah – that a terrorist strike was too unlikely to be considered. The NRC "rebuffed Utah's requests to examine terrorist risks" three times. Now, "Assistant Utah Attorney General Denise Chancellor said Wednesday the commission's reasoning in both cases was identical, and she hinted that the Washington, D.C., appeals court judges now considering the state's appeal of the Skull Valley license might have a similar outcome."

Radioactive Water Spilled At Arkansas Nuclear One. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (6/9, Elliott) reports, "Between 500 and 1000 gallons of slightly radioactive water spilled from a pool inside Arkansas Nuclear One on May 30" after "a miscalculation…meant too much water was poured into a 'tilt pit.'" The overflow "was contained in the Russellville power plant and never endangered plant employees or the public." Still, Nuclear Regulatory Commission spokesman Victor Dricks said resident inspectors "will conduct a follow-up review in the next few weeks to look at what steps Entergy has taken to identify the cause of the spill."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Maryland Man Charged In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic. The Baltimore Sun (6/9, Fuller) reports, "A Prince George's County man who authorities say was planning to attack an abortion clinic was arrested on charges of manufacturing an explosive device, a pipe bomb that detonated in a friend's house as authorities tried to disable it." The Sun continues, "Robert F. Weiler Jr., 25, who had a loaded gun at the time of his arrest, surrendered to police early Thursday at a Garrett County highway rest stop, authorities said. … Weiler was charged with possessing an illegal explosive device, making an illegal explosive device, illegally possessing a firearm with a previous felony conviction and possessing a stolen firearm." The Sun adds, "Police said that the target was a College Park abortion clinic and doctors who performed the procedures. … The bomb -- made with black powder, galvanized pipe, nails, seven feet of fuse and one-inch-diameter end caps -- was discovered in the closet of a friend's home in Riverdale and detonated about 3:30 a.m., after Prince George's police bomb technicians were unable to disable it, said Mike Campbell, a spokesman for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

DOJ_NMG_0032826

The Washington Post (6/9, B1, Klein, Rich) reports that Weiler "admitted planning the attack and also told investigators that he intended to 'shoot doctors who perform abortions,' according to a law enforcement affidavit." The Post continues, "Weiler, a convicted felon, was arrested at a rest stop in Western Maryland early yesterday and charged with unlawful possession of the pipe bomb and other offenses. He was expected to appear today in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. … According to the affidavit, which was signed by two agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, authorities learned Wednesday that Weiler had told associates he planned to bomb an abortion clinic. As investigators pursued leads that evening, Weiler contacted them by phone, saying he was at the rest stop in Garrett County and wanted to surrender, the agents wrote. … Weiler also said he had concealed the pipe bomb at a house in the 5700 block of 67th Avenue in the Riverdale Heights area, agents Christopher Hermann and Matthew M. Baccio wrote."

The AP (6/9) reports, "Weiler was charged in U.S. District Court on four counts that included making a destructive device and possessing an illegal handgun. He was being held Thursday afternoon at the Garrett County Detention Center. … Weiler had earlier stolen money from his parents and told friends that he had a gun and bomb for his attack, according to the affidavit. On Wednesday night, some of those friends revealed his plans to the ATF and Prince George's County police. … After Weiler called the ATF later that night, Maryland state troopers arrested him without incident. In his car was the handgun and a magazine with ammunition."

Congress Suggests MLB Tests Players For Use Of Growth Hormone. The Washington Post (6/9, Bryant) reports, "Fifteen months after a seminal confrontation with Major League Baseball over its drug-testing policy, members of Congress expressed disappointment yesterday over the inability of the sport to deter the use of performance-enhancing drugs and suggested that baseball consider instituting regular blood testing of its players for human growth hormone. The reaction came two days after more than a dozen federal agents raided the home of released Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley, who federal investigators say admitted to using growth hormone, anabolic steroids and amphetamines and also implicated other major league players."

In the Wall Street Journal (6/8), Carl Bialik and Jason Fry write, "There was good news of a sort for baseball…Mr. Grimsley said he stopped using steroids after baseball put a new testing regimen in place, and his detailing of the amphetamine culture was past-tense. But that just puts HGH even more squarely in the spotlight: At this point urine tests won't detect HGH -- only blood testing has a chance to do that, and baseball's current testing plan doesn't include blood tests."

In the Arizona Republic (6/9), Joseph A. Reaves notes, "A now-famous affidavit by a federal agent that The Arizona Republic obtained this week has a troubling paragraph that begins: 'Grimsley stated that ...' The word after that is redacted, one of 29 black marks between pages 12 and 15 of the affidavit that have created a world of suspicion and angst."

Mike Lopresti writes in USA Today's sports section (6/9), "Baseball might be weary of its closets being explored for drugs, but clearly, the feds are not weary of looking."

USA Today (6/8, Nightengale) also reports MLB vice president Rob Manfred said, "Human growth hormone, however, is a problem for all sports because there is no universally accepted and validated test — either blood or urine. No governing body in any sport has ever been able to discipline an athlete for the use of HGH. Major League Baseball understands that its policy must continue to evolve to keep pace with scientific development."

For the AP (6/9), sports columnist Jim Litke writes, "Less important than who used performance-enhancers is how many, because it's the only way to begin gauging how much of the offensive barrage we just witnessed was simply better hitting through chemistry."

Former Companion Of Bonds Advised Not To Cooperate With Mitchell Investigation. The New York Times (6/9, Curry, Chass) today reports, "The lawyer for Kimberly Bell, Barry Bonds's former companion, told George Mitchell yesterday that she has been advised by federal authorities not to cooperate with Mitchell's investigation into steroid use in baseball because of 'the pending criminal proceeding.' While the lawyer, Martin Garbus, did not specify a proceeding, in all likelihood he was referring to the investigation of Bonds and the question of whether he committed perjury while testifying in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid distribution case. … Because federal investigators asked Bell to avoid Mitchell, it is a strong indication that they are actively pursuing perjury charges and possibly additional charges of financial malfeasance against Bonds."

More Heroin Overdoses Reported In Pennsylvania, 4 Arrested In Raid. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/9, Greenwood) reports two more people "died Thursday after overdosing on heroin, bringing the death toll in Allegheny County to at least eight since a potent strain of the drug hit the streets last week. Pittsburgh police raided two Hazelwood homes hours after the deaths, arresting four people and seizing 40 stamp bags of heroin and an alligator."

DOJ_NMG_0032827

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/9, Silver) reports, "Police would not identify those arrested or indicate the charges pending against them, citing the integrity of their investigation into the source of the heroin that might have caused 48 overdoses, eight of them fatal, since Saturday. Narcotics Cmdr. Maurita Bryant said during a news conference that the stamp bags seized yesterday were marked differently from a batch called 'Get High or Die Trying' that has tested positive for the powerful painkiller fentanyl."

KDKA-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8) reports on its Web site, "The latest deaths make eight fatalities, among dozens of non-fatal overdoses in Pittsburgh and Allegheny County."

Local TV Coverage. WNPA-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Today is day six of the overdose outbreak in southwestern Pennsylvania, and that batch of lethal heroin continues to cause both concern and heartache in our area. This three foot alligator was one of the items seized when Pittsburgh narcotics detectives showed up at two homes on Flowers Avenue and Hazelwood, a neighborhood where police have been especially active because of two fatal and several nonfatal heroin overdoses in recent days. Four men were taken into custody."

WPXI-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "More people dying to get high. Two more deaths, bringing the total to 10 on the deadly heroin. … Police arrested four possible heroin suspects in Hazelwood today. Seven have been arrested since last Friday."

WTAE-TV, Pittsburgh (6/8, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "New developments in the deadly heroin that's killing people. Today we learned of two more fatal overdoses. … Pittsburgh police led an army of law enforcement personnel to break up the distribution of heroin called Get High or Die Trying. … It is striking that two more heroin deaths were recorded today. Right now investigators with Pittsburgh police say the two deaths are not connected or at least the heroin found on the two people are not connected to that fatal batch of Get High or Die Trying."

Health Alert Issued About Heroin Mixture. USA Today (6/9, Leinwand, Keen) reports, "Nearly two months after unusually potent heroin began killing scores of people in Chicago and several eastern cities, the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration on Thursday issued an alert to rehab centers and addiction specialists. … Heroin sold illegally in the USA typically is diluted with common household substances such as sugar, flour, quinine or starch. The mixing of heroin with a powerful drug such as fentanyl is highly unusual, according to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. The DEA is investigating whether a fentanyl lab in Guadalajara that was shut down last month by Mexican officials is linked to the deaths."

Overdose Suspected In Death Of Illinois Deputy Police Chief's Son. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/8) reports, "The son of a suburban deputy police chief was found dead in Chicago this week from an apparent drug overdose, and authorities are checking to see if his death is linked to fentanyl. … Six tin foil packets containing a white substance were found near his body, and the suspected drugs have been sent for testing, sources said."

WMAQ-TV, Chicago (6/8) also reported on the death of the deputy police chief's son.

DEA Lab Analyzing Heroin. On its Web site, WLS-TV, Chicago (6/8) reports, "Undercover agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration are now buying heroin off the streets of Chicago and other cities and bringing it back to this downtown lab for analysis. 'The heroin that's used on the street comes in very, very small amounts,' said Jim DeFranchesco, a DEA forensic chemist. Through his work and that of others, the feds have been able to trace some of Fentanyl back to a clandestine lab in Mexico. They also think it's possible that dealers are stealing legitimate supplies of the painkiller then using it to 'hype' their heroin."

WLS-TV (6/8) also has posted overdose statistics on its Web site.

The McKeesport (IL) Daily News (6/8) reports U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said, "I'm astounded that there are people in this region whose addiction is so strong, they are willing to die just to get high."

Michigan Authorities Warn Public About Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. The Grand Rapids (MI) Press (6/8) says authorities are preparing for the possible arrival of fentanyl-laced heroin in Grand Rapids and are trying to head-off trouble by warning the public about it.

For Addicts, Fentanyl Possibly Easier To Obtain Than OxyContin. The Bluefield (WV) Daily Telegraph (6/8) reports the use of fentanyl "has been on the increase since intense media attention brought the OxyContin plague into the spotlight." It is possible fentanyl "is being used by hard-core addicts who have moved on to fentanyl from OxyContin because it may be easier to obtain."

Proposed End Of Army Support In U.S.-Bahamas Anti-Drug Effort Questioned. The AP (6/8, Anderson) reports U.S. lawmakers and Bahamian officials "say the proposed withdrawal of Army air support from a U.S.-Bahamas anti-drug effort could entice cocaine and marijuana smugglers to return to the islands and undo more than two decades of progress. … Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, citing war needs elsewhere, said in a letter last month that he intends to withdraw seven Army Blackhawk helicopters and their crews from Operation Bahamas, Turks and Caicos _ known as OPBAT for short." Joshua Sears, the Bahamas' ambassador to the U.S. said, "The traffickers obviously would see that as a signal to increase their activity."

DOJ_NMG_0032828

Officials Say Escaped DC Inmates Had Accomplice. The Washington Post (6/9, B4, Cauvin, Dvorak) reports, "It began as a remarkably executed escape. In a matter of minutes, Ricardo Jones, 25, and Joseph Leaks, 32, were racing across 19th Street SE and onto a Metro shuttle bus that took them across the Anacostia River. But within hours, authorities were closing in, thanks largely to a system kept by the D.C. Department of Corrections that records calls made by the jail's approximately 1,800 inmates." The Post continues, "Authorities listened to recordings in which at least one of the inmates talked in code about the escape plan, law enforcement officials said. Records of the calls eventually led them to a man they identified as Harold Hines, who appeared to be in on the plot, the officials said." The Post adds, "The role of Hines was among the new details to emerge about how Jones and Leaks engineered the escape and how they were caught the next day. Hines, officials said, got Leaks the Fairfax County motel room where he was found and arrested. .. Saturday morning, Jones and Leaks broke into the warden's unoccupied office, used a heavy-duty floor-buffing machine to smash the window and then slid down a canopy to flee the D.C. jail and Southeast Washington. … Less than 10 hours later, Hines showed up at the Virginia Lodge on Richmond Highway in Fairfax County, told an employee that he had a couple of friends who were going to need a room for the night and paid the $77.85 bill upfront. … It was probably the last Hines thought he would see of the Virginia Lodge. But early the next morning, he was back, and this time he wasn't alone. Federal marshals and other investigators had found Hines, along with Leaks's brother, and persuaded Hines to aid in their investigation by leading them to the motel."

Connecticut Drug Operation Nets 43 Arrests. The AP (6/9) reports, "A yearlong undercover investigation resulted in arrest warrants Thursday charging 43 people with dealing drugs in the borough of Naugatuck (CT)." The AP continues, "Thirty-six suspects were in custody. Five others were either already in prison on other charges or hospitalized, said police Lt. Robert W. Harrison Jr." The AP adds, "The undercover operation, dubbed 'Save Our Streets,' began last year after Naugatuck authorities noticed an increase in drug overdoses, and several drug-related deaths, he said. … 'Undercover police started making undercover buys and that led to these charges,' he said. … The investigation was conducted by Naugatuck and Waterbury police, the Waterbury state's attorney's office, the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. marshals, the state Correction Department and the state Office of Adult Probation."

US Charges Two Illinois Men With Avoiding Tobacco Tax. The Daily Southtown (IL) (6/8, Hack) reports, "Two brothers from Burbank were arrested Wednesday on federal charges they sold truckloads of chewing tobacco, cigars and pipe tobacco here without paying the state's high excise tax." The Southtown continues, "Omar Dahla, 41, and Faride Dahla, 44 — who live in different houses in the 5700 block of West 83rd Street — were charged along with a third brother, Samer Dahla, of Lakeland, Fla." The Southtown adds, "According to federal authorities, the brothers ran a wholesale tobacco distribution business called United Brothers Five — which operated an office and two warehouses in Bedford Park — as well as another tobacco distribution business in Florida. They're accused of buying products classified as 'other tobacco products,' which doesn't include cigarettes and importing them to Illinois. … Wholesale tobacco distributors are responsible for collecting an 18 percent excise tax from retailers and turning over the money to the state. The brothers are accused of 'grossly underreporting' taxable sales of their products to Illinois retailers."

IMMIGRATION:

FBI Arrests Border Patrol Agent On Smuggling Bribery Charges. The San Diego Union-Tribune (6/9, Soto, 353K) reports, "For the second time this week, a border inspector was arrested and charged with waiving smugglers into the country in exchange for bribes. Customs and Border Protection Inspector Richard Elizalda of Chula Vista was indicted Friday, along with seven other people, on conspiracy and other charges," and Inspector Michael Gilliland "was brought into San Diego federal court Wednesday on similar charges. … 'These inspectors betrayed the trust of their countrymen,' said Stewart Roberts, the second highest-ranking agent at the San Diego FBI office. He said Elizalda collected $500 to $700 for every immigrant he illegally allowed to enter the country and Gilliland charged $1,500 per smuggled alien." The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Marosi, 958K) adds, "This week's cases, though unrelated, underline continuing corruption at the ports of entry despite efforts to curtail it. … 'The amount of money is tempting for someone who is not an honest individual,' said FBI Special Agent Andrew P. Black, who supervises the Border Corruption Task Force." The AP (6/9, Hoffman) also notes SAC Roberts said, "In both cases the inspectors betrayed the trust of their countrymen by accepting bribes from illegal alien smuggling organizations."

GOP May Split Immigration Reform Into Two Phases. The White House Bulletin/US News reports,

DOJ_NMG_0032829

"Republican strategists have a new scenario for passing an immigration bill this year. What's being discussed by senior GOP leaders around Washington is a two-stage plan under which the House and Senate would agree on a tough border-enforcement measure, to be followed by a guest-worker program after the enforcement provisions are put in place." The details have "yet to be worked out but a senior Republican says, 'A two-stage approach is do-able. It depends on George W. Bush. He needs to have members of Congress into the Oval Office one on one, the old-fashioned way, to twist arms. The issue cuts 435 different ways. It's different in Arizona and New Mexico than it is in Minnesota. There are so many cross currents that we'll need not only presidential leadership but presidential wisdom.'" But House conservatives are "so dug in with their support for tough border security and their opposition to 'amnesty' that only a concerted effort by Bush can turn things around, the strategists say. But they add a two-stage process might be the answer."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Harwood), meanwhile, reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Immigration debate drifts away from Bush. Even before [Rep.-elect Brian] Bilbray's tough talk helped him win San Diego House seat, lawmakers felt rising constituent pressure to crack down on border security. Republicans in both House and Senate mull possibility of passing security-only bill before midterm elections."

Powell Says Wall Won't Solve Illegal Immigration Problem. The AP (6/8) reports, "Former Secretary of State Colin Powell said Thursday that extending walls along the U.S.-Mexico border will not solve the problem of illegal immigration." Speaking at a business conference in Mexico City, Powell said that "a wall alone is not the answer." Powell also said that "any new barriers should include gates and other entrances to provide easy-access between both countries."

Immigrants Applying For Citizenship In Record Numbers. Immigrants nationwide are applying for US citizenship in record numbers in what the Wall Street Journal (6/9, Raghavan, Brulliard) calls "a move to protect themselves at a time of political uncertainty." Many immigrants "fear that laws could toughen, preventing them from becoming naturalized or from bringing relatives into the United States; others appear to be motivated by the chance to obtain more rights and boost their political clout through voting." The Journal adds, "Between January and April, immigrants filed 251,385 applications, an 18 percent increase from the same period last year, immigration officials said yesterday. They also report a record surge in petitions to sponsor relatives for residency, also up 18 percent for the time period."

Texas To Put Video Cameras Along Mexican Border. Texas Gov. Rick Perry has announced a $5 million plan to install night-vision cameras on private land along the US-Mexican border. Perry would also put the live video on the Internet, so that anyone who spots illegal immigrants can report it on a toll-free hotline. The AP (6/9, Caldwell) reports, "The plan marks a political about-face for Perry, a Republican seeking re-election, who has long argued that security along the state's 1,200-mile border with Mexico is strictly a federal responsibility. This week, he said cuts in federal homeland security funding, a rise in reports of border violence and the crossing of Mexican soldiers into Texas about two years ago have demonstrated that 'Texas cannot wait for Washington, D.C., to act.'"

Trevio Says Spanish Language Will Persist In US. Writer Marisa Trevio says in a USA Today (6/9) op-ed that the only common ground lawmakers have found in the immigration debate is that "the border must be secured and the insistence that English should be the national language. Though lawmakers suggest the English amendment would be symbolic, there is an unspoken hope that it would significantly alter the use of Spanish in this country." Trevio adds, "Even though English-only proponents are working toward the day when Spanish is rarely heard, they shouldn't hold their breath. … Proficiency might vary with each generation, but the need to keep Spanish alive will persist, no matter what is declared the national language."

TAX:

Senate GOP Falls Short In Effort Hold Up-Or-Down Vote On Estate Tax Repeal. NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 10, 0:35, Williams) reported, "The Senate today voted down an effort to abolish the estate tax, sometimes called the death tax, on inherited wealth. President Bush has already cut it, but those cuts are due to expire in five years. The vote today fell three senators short. Majority Leader Frist, who calls the tax unfair, says the Senate will vote on it again this year. Democrats said they'll oppose it again as a budget-busting giveaway to the wealthiest Americans."

The AP (6/9, Dalrymple) notes Senators "voted 57-41 to advance the bill, but that was three votes short of the 60 needed to overcome objections from a majority of Democrats and a pair of Republicans." Those opposed to the bill "said it would deliver an unwise tax cut when the government needed more money to balance its budget and to wage war." Republicans "staged the vote knowing they did not have the 60 votes to prevail on repealing the tax, a top priority of many GOP voters. Some of the tax's biggest critics had hoped they could attract a few extra votes by extending a cooperative hand to Democrats."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Mullins, Matthews) notes "two Republicans voted against the estate-tax repeal, Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and George Voinovich of Ohio. Four Democrats voted with Republicans: Sens. Max Baucus of Montana, Bill Nelson of Florida, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas. Mr. Voinovich said that he didn't want to vote for further tax cuts at a time when the government is in deficit." The Democrats "voted for the legislation because they believe the estate tax unfairly punishes farmers and small-business owners."

DOJ_NMG_0032830

Bloomberg (6/9, Donmoyer) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said Republicans were focusing on a tax that affects less than 1 percent of the population while ignoring higher priority items such as gas prices, uninsured workers, a rising national debt, and an outdated minimum wage." The vote "leaves in question the fate of an alternative proposal championed by Republican Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona and Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa that has gained some support from Democrats. That proposal would only tax estates valued at more than $10 million at rates of between 15 percent and 30 percent."

USA Today (6/9, Wolf) says that "by blocking repeal, most Senate Democrats and two Republicans dealt a blow to Bush's top domestic priority: making the tax cuts passed in 2001 and 2003 permanent," while the New York Times (6/9, Andrews) reports Republicans "are now debating whether to give up on their goal and attack Democrats in the coming midterm elections as obstructionists on a measure that they say has considerable support, or settle for a bipartisan measure that would stop short of eliminating the tax entirely."

The Washington Post (6/9, A6, Birnbaum) reports, "According to the staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, repealing the estate tax would cost the government $71.6 billion a year by 2015. The Treasury Department estimated the revenue loss at $65.8 billion that year. … Not many people are forced to pay the estate tax. According to the Internal Revenue Service, only 1.17 percent of people who died in 2002 left a taxable estate." The House, "acting at the urging of President Bush, has already voted overwhelmingly to permanently repeal the estate tax."

The Washington Times (6/9, Hurt) says Democrats "filibustered yet another attempt to eliminate the so-called 'death tax,' which Republicans say unfairly taxes already-taxed money and is crippling family farms and small businesses." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "defended the tax as necessary to keep up with government spending." The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Simon) also reports the story.

WSJournal Criticizes Democratic "Flip-Floppers." The Wall Street Journal (6/9) editorializes, "The only two Republicans to oppose repeal were George Voinovich of Ohio and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, who sometimes seems to want to lose his primary this year." But "special credit belongs to four Democratic Senators who voted against repeal yesterday after they'd run for office pledging the opposite. They are Evan Bayh of Indiana, who perhaps had in mind Democratic Presidential primary voters, not the home folks who elected him; Mary Landrieu of Louisiana; Mark Pryor of Arkansas; and Ron Wyden of Oregon. These flip-floppers voted not only to retain the tax but to increase it -- from zero in 2010 back to 55% in 2011 and forever after."

More Commentary. The New York Times (6/9) editorializes, "Any day in which the House or Senate refrains from doing something destructive is about as good as it gets in Washington lately. Yesterday, the Senate cleared that low bar when it rejected efforts to repeal the estate tax. The nation is at war and the budget is so wildly out of balance that the government cannot pay its bills without borrowing money from foreign investors. The idea that this is a good moment to repeal a tax on people who inherit multimillion-dollar estates is mind-boggling."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House, Senate Reach Agreement On Spending Bill For War, Katrina Recovery. The Washington Post (6/9, A6, Murray) reports, "House and Senate negotiators reached agreement last night on a $94.5 billion package to pay for Iraq war and hurricane recovery costs, after shaving numerous extraneous provisions that the Senate had wanted to stuff into the bill." The bill, which is "expected to reach President Bush's desk next week," would designate "$65.8 billion to the Pentagon to cover troop pay, provide recruiting incentives, buy new body armor and fund continued operations of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, among other items. Diplomacy projects in the region would receive $3.9 billion in new funding." The bill would also "provide $19.8 billion in hurricane relief, exactly what President Bush had requested, but nearly $9 billion less than the Senate had sought."

After Veto Threat, Final Product Lower Than Bush's Original Request. The Washington Post (6/9, A6, Murray) reports "some Republicans in the Senate, including Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, who represents storm-ravaged Mississippi, had viewed the must-pass bill as an opportunity to address other pressing needs. The Senate bill wound up exceeding Bush's original $92.2 billion request by $14 billion." But "a White House veto threat dampened the mood, and Republican leaders in both chambers worried that the appearance of out-of-control spending could hurt them in the November elections. They touted the final product -- even lower than what Bush was willing to accept -- as a victory for their cause."

Bush Makes Pitch For Line-Item Veto. CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush made another pitch today that he and other future presidents should have the ability to make line-item vetoes. To make his point, Mr. Bush called in some of the nation's governors, many of whom do have such power in their own states."

DOJ_NMG_0032831

Senate Approves Cox, Luddington Judicial Nominations. The AP (6/9) reports, "The Senate on Thursday confirmed Wayne County, Mich., Circuit Judge Sean Cox and Midland County, Mich., Circuit Judge Thomas Ludington to serve on the federal bench, ending a nomination process that had stalled for years." The Senate "unanimously approved both judges, who had stressed their respect for judicial restraint and legal precedent during a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this spring."

Schwab Confirmed As US Trade Representative. The AP (6/9, Crutsinger) reports, "Susan Schwab won Senate confirmation on Thursday to be President Bush's top trade negotiator." Schwab "was approved as the new US trade representative by voice vote. She succeeds Rob Portman, who was picked by the president in April to be the new White House budget director." The AFP (6/9) notes Schwab "said she was 'honoured.'"

CBC Opposes Effort To Strip Jefferson Of Committee Post. The Congressional Black Caucus has opposed efforts by the Democratic leadership to strip Rep. William Jefferson of his committee post. The AP (6/9, Espo) reports that the Caucus "said the Louisiana lawmaker deserves a 'presumption of innocence.'" Jefferson "has not been indicted and has denied all wrongdoing in connection with a federal bribery investigation that has netted two convictions."

CQ (6/8, Ferrechio) reported that the CBC "thwarted House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's effort to oust embattled Rep. William J. Jefferson from the Ways and Means Committee. The House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee voted to recommend the involuntary removal of the Louisiana Democrat from the powerful tax-writing panel, but a rule challenge from the Congressional Black Caucus prevented a vote on the matter by the entire Democratic Caucus until next week."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Hennessy-Fiske) reports that efforts to oust Jefferson from his committee post appear "headed for a vote by all of the House's Democrats, setting up a debate over Jefferson, who is being investigated by federal officials in a bribery case. … Democratic rank-and-file members are expected to vote on the recommendation at a meeting likely to take place next week. Ultimately, a vote by the full House -- including Republicans -- would be required to force Jefferson from the committee."

Average Age Of Congress Rising. USA Today (6/9, Kiely) reports that the average age of members of the Senate in January 2005 "60.4 years old. That's the oldest it has ever been, according to the Senate Historical Office. The House's average age is 55, the oldest since at least 1949. The national median age in 2004 was 36.2."

Congress Said To Have Cleared Way For Foreign Control Of Domestic Airlines. One of the few non-Zarqawi stories to win broadcast time last night appeared on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (6/8, 6:22 p.m.), with host Dobbs saying foreign investors "are poised to take over another crucial piece of American infrastructure. And again, the White House, the Defense Department, and Department of Homeland Security are doing absolutely nothing to stop it." CNN (Tucker) reported, "The outrage over foreign ownership of U.S. ports apparently taught many in Washington nothing. Congress has just cleared the way to give foreign investors functional control of domestic airlines, removing any roadblocks to the Department of Transportation's changing of a 65-year-old rule prohibiting foreign control of America's airlines. … How this would affect the Department of Defense's relationship with the airlines, which ferry troops and equipment in the time of war, is not clear. While the Department of Defense has verbally okayed the deal, the DOD has refused to put that okay in writing. And in the eyes of critics, it's one more industry where the United States is relinquishing its role."

38.7 Million Have Signed Up For Medicare Drug Benefit. The AP (6/8, Freking) reported, "About 11.5 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit by the May 15 enrollment deadline, bringing the number of beneficiaries with drug coverage to 38.7 million, officials said Thursday." Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt "said an analysis of the enrollment numbers showed that people chose plans that charged the lowest premiums -- $23 on average versus original estimates of $37. … The numbers are in line with what the Bush administration projected in January 2005."

Bush Approval Rating Rebounds to 33% In Harris Interactive Poll. The Wall Street Journal (6/8) reported on its web site, "President Bush's job approval rating rebounded in the latest Harris Interactive poll. Of 1,001 U.S. adults surveyed in a telephone poll June 2-5, 33% think Mr. Bush is doing an 'excellent or pretty good' job as president, up from 29% -- the lowest mark of his presidency -- in the previous poll conducted in May." The poll "was conducted before the death of Iraqi insurgent leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi. Following the capture of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, Mr. Bush's approval numbers climbed."

Nicholson Says Stolen VA Data May Have Been Erased. The AP (6/9, Yen) reports that Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said yesterday that stolen personal data for 26.5 million veterans and military personnel "may have been erased by teenagers who sold the computer equipment, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said Thursday." Nicholson "explained that the burglary occurred in an Aspen Hill, Md., neighborhood in which there had been a pattern of thefts by young burglars who took computer equipment, wiped them clean of the data and then sold them on college campus or high schools. … Lawmakers were skeptical. They noted that the committee and the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm, had warned the VA for years that security was lax."

DOJ_NMG_0032832

Measure Would Help Insurers Get Share Of Personal Injury Suits. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Francis) reports that some lawmakers and employee advocates say a provision of the pension bill under negotiation right now "could make it easier for employers and health insurers to gain a share of money that workers win in personal injury suits. The House and Senate passed different versions of the pension legislation last year, and are negotiating to reconcile them, in a process expected to continue for weeks. The Senate bill doesn't include a similar provision on benefit-plan recoveries." The bill "would let insurers step ahead of injured employees when it comes to divvying up a legal settlement or judgment."

Panel Says Communication Policies Jeopardize Scientific Findings. An independent group of scientists that advises Congress and the White House says that inconsistent policies for communicating scientific findings to the public are jeopardizing the quality and credibility of government research. The New York Times (6/9, Revkin) reports, "The group, the National Science Board, examined the issue at the request of Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona. Mr. McCain sought the review in February after Civil Service workers and scientists at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and other agencies complained publicly that political appointees had interfered with efforts to discuss global warming and other controversial issues."

WPost Says Congress Should Regulate 527s. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/9, A22) says, "The independent political groups known as 527s are a new force in American politics." The FEC has "washed its hands of any attempt to write rules governing their behavior. Broad regulation, the FEC said, was 'inadvisable'; instead, it would rely on case-by-case adjudication of whether the 527s were so immersed in federal campaigns that they had to comply with campaign finance laws. Not surprisingly for anyone familiar with the glacial pace of FEC operations, that has resulted in almost no enforcement at all." The Post adds, "The FEC's foot-dragging underscores the need for congressional action on the subject, something Republicans are pushing and Democrats are fighting because of perceived partisan advantage."

OTHER NEWS:

White House Forecasts 3.6% GDP Growth In 2006. The Wall Street Journal (6/9) reports, "The White House raised its forecast for both economic growth and consumer-price inflation this year, while indicating both would be slower in 2007. … Inflation-adjusted gross domestic product is now expected to increase 3.6% this year, up two-tenths of a percentage point from the Bush administration's previous forecast, which was released in December. That would be a slight increase from the 3.5% expansion in 2005." GDP "is seen slowing to 3.3% next year and slowing slightly more in following years to a rate at or above 3% a year through 2011, according to the new White House forecast." For inflation, the White House "raised its forecast for overall consumer-price-index growth in 2006 by six-tenths of a percentage point to 3%, compared with 3.7% CPI growth last year."

The AP (6/9, Aversa) says "the upgraded forecast comes despite a rise in energy prices and mostly reflects the big growth spurt in the opening quarter of this year. 'We continue to see signs that the U.S. economy is strong,' Treasury Secretary John Snow said." The White House also "expects the jobless rate for all of 2006 to drop to 4.7 percent, compared with its previous forecast of 5 percent." But "in 2007 the rate would inch up to 4.8 percent and to 4.9 percent in 2008, according to the new forecast. Still, that would be better than the old forecast, which had the jobless rates in 2007 and 2008 at 5 percent."

US Stock Markets Mixed As Foreign Exchanges Drop. USA Today (6/9, Krantz) reports, "Stocks dodged a collision with another nasty down day Thursday after several major indexes fought off getting plunged into correction territory." The Nasdaq "ended the day down 6.48 points to 2145.32. … The Standard & Poor's 500 index closed up 1.78 points to 1257.93, even after being down nearly 21 points earlier in the session," and "the Dow Jones industrial average completely reversed its early-day decline of 173 points to rise 7.92 points to 10,938.82. The Dow is up 2.1% this year." NBC Nightly News (6/8, story 11, 0:15, Williams) also noted the US stock numbers, noting major indexes "finished narrowly mixed."

The Financial Times (6/9, Guha, Brown-Humes, Tassell), meanwhile, says "global markets plunged on Thursday as central banks around the world lined up to raise interest rates amid mounting concern over inflation and growth. … The European Central Bank as well as banks in South Korea, India, Denmark and South Africa, all increased rates." The Washington Post (6/9, D1, Masters, Henderson) headlines a similar story "Global Markets Suffer A Hit," while the Wall Street Journal (6/9, Browning) titles its report "As Foreign Stocks Slide, US Holds Ground."

DOJ_NMG_0032833

Household Debt Up In First Quarter 2006. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Conkey) reports, "American households increased their borrowing in the first quarter a bit faster than they did in the fourth quarter, but a robust economy and rising home values led to a gain in net worth, quarterly data from the Federal Reserve show. Despite expectations that consumers would begin to scale back borrowing, household debt grew at an 11.6% annual rate in the first quarter, up from 11.1% in the fourth quarter." Mortgage debt "rose by more than $250 billion during the period." The Journal adds, "Many economists thought household borrowing would decline in the first quarter because of rising interest rates, which make mortgages, home-equity lines and other loans more expensive"

DC Sues InPhonic Over Restrictive Rebate Procedures. The Washington Post (6/9, D4, Shin) reports, "The D.C. attorney general is suing InPhonic Inc., accusing it of failing to deliver on rebates after the District-based retailer of wireless services and cellphones racked up more than 2,000 consumer complaints over the past three years." The Post continues, "In a suit filed yesterday in D.C. Superior Court, the attorney general's office alleges the company imposes 'unusually restrictive conditions' on its rebates, making it 'difficult or impossible' for consumers to obtain them. … In addition, some consumers who contacted the company for assistance in obtaining rebates were routed to automated messages or to live representatives who were not helpful, the complaint said." The Post adds, "As a result of such policies, a majority of consumers who purchase wireless phones and plans through InPhonic either 'never receive the advertised rebates' or are able to secure them only after following 'onerous procedures,' the complaint said."

Frustrated Judge Orders Lawyers To End Squabble With Child's Game. The New York Times (6/9, Liptak) reports, "Fed up with the inability of two lawyers to agree on a trivial issue in an insurance lawsuit, a federal judge in Florida this week ordered them to 'convene at a neutral site' and 'engage in one (1) game of "rock, paper, scissors"' to settle the matter." The Times continues, "Childish lawyers are commonplace, but the use of children's games to resolve litigation disputes is apparently a new development. The judge, Gregory A. Presnell of Federal District Court in Orlando, wrote that his innovation was 'a new form of alternative dispute resolution.'" The Times adds, "The proximate cause of Judge Presnell's ruling, issued Tuesday, was a motion saying the two lawyers in the case could not agree about where to conduct the deposition of a witness. The choices were the building where they both work, four floors apart, or a court reporter's office down the street. … Judge Presnell's order indicated that deciding such things was not part of the job of a federal judge. Still, wary that the lawyers would start a new battle over where to conduct the rock-paper-scissors showdown, Judge Presnell gave them a default site: the front steps of the federal courthouse in Tampa. … That will not be necessary, said David J. Pettinato, a lawyer for the plaintiff. He and his adversary have agreed to meet on June 30, Mr. Pettinato said, at 'an undisclosed location.'"

Federal Judge Benefits From Connections To Old Friend. The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Goodman, Rempel) runs a lengthy investigative piece on US District Judge James C. Mahan and his relationship with businessman George Swarts. The Times reports, "Without help from a friend, James Mahan might never have become a Las Vegas state judge. Certainly he wouldn't have gotten one of the top judicial jobs in town: a lifetime appointment to the federal bench. … Then again, without Mahan, his friend George Swarts would never have gotten to run an Internet porn business, a hotel-casino hair salon or a Southern California software company. Indeed, the careers of Judge James C. Mahan, 62, and his friend George C. Swarts, also 62, whom he appointed again and again as a receiver to manage troubled businesses, might be the ultimate example of how juice replaces justice in Las Vegas courtrooms." The Times continues, "In this town, people speak reverently of having juice, or an 'in,' and Mahan — bearded, likable but sometimes caustic — has made it a striking feature in his courtroom. First as a state judge and now as a federal judge, he has approved more than $4.8 million in judgments and fees during more than a dozen cases in which a recent search of court records found no statement that he disclosed his relationships with those who benefited from his decisions." The Times adds, "On the state bench for three years, and since his appointment as a U.S. District Court judge four years ago by President Bush, Mahan has approved many of these fees for Swarts, a certified public accountant who had served as his judicial campaign treasurer and whose political connections got him appointed. Mahan approved additional fees for Frank A. Ellis III, 51, a former law partner with whom the judge still owned property and participated in a profit-sharing plan. Ellis also provided free legal services for Mahan's family and for his executive judicial assistant. … Mahan, like a number of Las Vegas judges, has taken on cases despite state and federal prohibitions against such apparent conflicts. Some Las Vegas judges have ruled in cases involving their friends, even those to whom they owe money."

DOJ_NMG_0032834

Panel Calls For Guaranteed Health Care By 2012. A non partisan advisory panel created by Congress has recommended that the federal government guarantee a core set of health benefits for all Americans by 2012. The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports that the recommendation is notable because "the legislation that created the 15-member Citizens' Health Care Working Group requires the president to comment and five congressional committees to hold hearings." The recommendations "call for immediate and long-range changes. In the near term, all Americans should have protection against catastrophic healthcare expenses, either through a government program or a private insurance plan, the panel recommended."

DeLay Touts Principled Partisanship. The AP (6/9, Gamboa) reports, "Former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, bowing to legal and ethical troubles, said goodbye to the House on Thursday with a parting shot at his liberal opponents. Some Democrats walked out during the farewell. The 11-term Republican from Texas, said it is customary for departing lawmakers to 'reminisce about the 'good old days' of political harmony and across-the-aisle camaraderie.' 'I can't do that,' he said. 'For all its faults, it is partisanship -- based on core principles -- that clarifies our debates, that prevents one party from straying too far from the mainstream and that constantly refreshes our politics with new ideas and new leaders,' DeLay said." The AP adds, "A Democrat could be heard telling colleagues to walk out of the House chamber as DeLay criticized liberals, who he said stand for 'more government, more taxation, more control over people's lives and decisions and wallets.' At least two dozen Democratic lawmakers rose and left."

The Washington Post (6/9, A3, Grunwald) headlines its report "DeLay Pulls No Punches In Final Speech To House," and says that Democrats who skipped the speech "missed a classic performance by the Hammer. It wasn't all fire-breathing; DeLay, a foster parent, spoke eloquently about the nation's dysfunctional child-welfare system. He also waxed lyrical about his newfound appreciation for Washington's landmarks, now that he has had some free time to explore them after his ouster as majority leader." But "it was surely no accident that what really stood out for him at the Lincoln Memorial was that Honest Abe's left hand was clenched into a fist. DeLay has never been much for 'malice towards none.'"

The Washington Times (6/9, Bellantoni) quotes DeLay saying, "If conservatives don't stand up to liberalism, no one will." He said so "to hissing from the opposite side of the aisle."

The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Reynolds) notes DeLay said "true statesmen 'are not defined by what they compromise, but what they don't.'" Republicans "greeted DeLay with a standing ovation as he opened his speech, as did the Democrats in the chamber." But "as his remarks became more incendiary and Democrats exited, the Republicans largely held their applause -- except when DeLay introduced his wife, who was in the gallery, and praised the Capitol Police." The Times adds, "One Democrat who stayed to the end was Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., D-Ill. He also was one of the few Democrats who crossed to the Republican side of the chamber after the speech, giving DeLay a hug." Jackson "said that while he does not share DeLay's priorities, he thought walking out was 'not in the best interests of class.'"

The New York Times (6/9, Hulse) reports, "To Mr. DeLay's critics, who include Democrats and some Republicans, the day should have come sooner. They say Mr. DeLay represents, and is responsible for, much that is wrong with the current Congress. Detractors say that in alliance with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the man he handpicked for the top post in 1998, Mr. DeLay trampled legislative traditions in the House and fostered an environment of loose ethical standards that resulted in the growing corruption scandals on Capitol Hill." The Times adds, "Appropriately enough, Democrats and Republicans bickered one last time on Thursday over Mr. DeLay." Democrats "resisted a Republican plan to allow him to deliver his valedictory from the House floor. But Mr. DeLay crossed them up by submitting his resignation from the Appropriations Committee on the floor, providing an opening for his speech celebrating political discord."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/8, Crowley) reported that Rep. Tom DeLay "ends his two-decade-long Washington career in Tom DeLay fashion." Asked what he is proudest of, DeLay said, "Pushing the conservative cause. Changing the culture of this town. Bringing the conservative world view into the mainstream." Asked what he most regrets, DeLay said, "I don't have any regrets." CNN added, "The significant chance that Democrats might retake the House has dampened Republican spirits as they head into fall elections. In a private goodbye, DeLay told colleagues to snap out of it."

DeLay Aide Took Trips "Indirectly" Funded By Firms With Business Before Congress. The Washington Post (6/9, A4, Smith) reports, "A former chief of staff to then-House Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) was described yesterday in a nonprofit groups' study as one of the top two recipients of privately financed travel among congressional staff from 2000 to 2005, including some trips paid indirectly by companies with business pending before Congress." Susan Hirschmann, DeLay's chief of staff from 1997 "until she became a Washington lobbyist in 2002," took "18 trips from 2000 to 2002 -- many with her husband -- at a cost to others of more than $85,000, according to a tally by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service." That "put her in a close second place behind Brian Gaston, whose 39 trips over the five-year period studied by the groups cost $87,000. Gaston is now the chief of staff to House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.)."

DOJ_NMG_0032835

Krugman Blasts "DeLay Principle." Columnist Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (6/9) that DeLay "has since been dethroned, but the DeLay Principle lives on." The "DeLay Principle isn't really that hard to understand: it's just like the Roosevelt Principle, but the other way around. These days, the state — or rather, the political coalition that controls the state, and depends on campaign contributions to maintain that control -- owes a peculiar obligation to men of great wealth. And nothing is more important than cutting these men's taxes, even in the face of a war."

Texas Republicans Jockey For Candidate To Replace DeLay.. The Christian Science Monitor (6/9, Axtman) reports that the race to replace Rep. Tom DeLay as the Republican nominee on the November ballot is heating up. Democrats "in his suburban Houston district hope that DeLay has tarnished his party enough to give them a victory." The Monitor adds, "To find his replacement, the four counties that make up District 22 will each hold Republican caucuses this summer and select a precinct chair. Those four will then each cast a vote to choose the candidate for the ballot." The district "is heavily Republican, and a Democratic win is a long shot - even for the well-financed and well-known former Congressman Nick Lampson, say political scientists."

Rumsfeld Praises Summers' Support For ROTC. The Washington Times (6/9, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has sent a letter to outgoing Harvard President Lawrence H. Summers praising the educator's support for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC). Harvard is not always a friendly place for the U.S. military. … But Mr. Summers openly embraced Harvard's 50 or so ROTC students, a move that did little to ingratiate himself to the university's overwhelming liberal faculty, which worked to force his resignation, effective June 30."

Dionne Calls Election Results "Sobering" For California Liberals. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (6/9, A23) that "the truly sobering news" for California liberals in this week's voting "was in the statewide voting. Proposition 82, the ballot measure that would have guaranteed access to preschool for all of California's 4-year-olds, went down to resounding defeat, 61 to 39 percent. Not only that, voters also rejected a $600 million bond measure for the state's libraries. A vote against libraries ? Yes, the bonds went down 53 to 47 percent. … It gives me no joy to say these things, since I wish both California propositions had passed. But realism is not the enemy of idealism, and taxpayers aren't being selfish when they place a heavy burden on those who would ask them to part with some of their money. Advocates of public action need to meet that test."

NYTimes Praises Universities' Efforts On Stem Cell Research. The New York Times (6/9) editorializes, "Hats off to Harvard and the University of California at San Francisco for undertaking stem cell research that the Bush administration is trying to discourage and political leaders in Washington seem unwilling to support. Both institutions have started programs to clone human embryos and extract stem cells from them, thus creating stem cell lines tailor-made to study specific diseases." The Times adds that "the potential is enormous, and it is fortunate that these two institutions, and a handful of other laboratories around the world, are getting started."

IAEA Says Iran Resumed Uranium Processing After West Offered Deal. The Los Angeles Times (6/9, Rubin) reports, "Iran began to enrich a second batch of uranium in its research plant this week on the same day that world powers delivered a negotiating offer to Tehran conditioned on its suspension of nuclear activities, according to a report released Thursday by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The timing of the nuclear work, which Western diplomats suggested was politically calculated, appeared to signal that Iran would fight to continue enriching uranium despite the demands by the international community."

The New York Times (6/9, Sciolino) reports an IAEA report claims that, "on Tuesday, Iran restarted the pouring of a raw form of uranium into a set of 164 centrifuge machines to produce enriched uranium." The Times adds, "That same day," EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "was in Tehran, where he presented Iranian leaders with an international package of incentives to help resolve the crisis caused by the country's nuclear program. There was no explanation for Iran's decision. But it seemed to underscore its often stated determination not to be bullied into accepting any deal requiring it to end activities related to uranium enrichment." The Times opines, "The revelation is likely to stiffen the resolve of the United States and the Europeans in particular that a complete freeze of uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities is a condition for formal negotiations."

The Financial Times (6/9, Dombey, Peel) adds the IAEA claims "Iran resumed sensitive nuclear work this week, just as the world's big powers presented it with an offer aimed at halting such activities." The IAEA report "says that Tehran has just increased the scale of uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme, after scaling it back two months ago." The new information, coming "after several days in which western officials have struck an upbeat note about the prospects of negotiations, highlight how difficult it will be for the world's big powers to persuade Tehran to suspend enrichment."

DOJ_NMG_0032836

The Washington Post (6/9, A16, Vick, Linzer)'s reporting on Iran mentions the IAEA report but focuses on President Ahmadinejad's comments, saying he "signaled Iran's readiness to renew negotiations 'to resolve misunderstandings in the international arena. On behalf of the Iranian nation, I'm announcing that the Iranian nation will never hold negotiations about its definite rights with anybody, but we are for talks about mutual concerns.'" The Post calls his comments "the most straightforward indication so far of Iran's willingness to engage six world powers, including the United States, in discussions aimed at avoiding confrontation over its nuclear program. But he did not say whether Iran would agree to the only precondition set for the talks: that the country put its program on hold during negotiations."

Ahmadinejad Says He's Willing To Talk, Blasts Suggestion Of Sanctions. ABC World News Tonight (6/8, story 5, 1:05, Gibson) reported, "Iran's president has weighed in, for the first time, on the incentives offered by the US and other world powers, to convince Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions." ABC (Karl) added, "Today, Iran's president made, perhaps, his most conciliatory gesture yet. 'We are for talks to resolve misunderstandings,' he told a crowd of several thousand. But in the same speech, he lashed out at those threatening sanctions, and said his country would never negotiate its fundamental rights." The Washington Times and USA Today runs a similar AP story (6/9, Dareini).

House Rejects Move To Cut Aid To Egypt. The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Rogers) reports, "Amid conflicting signals from the Bush administration, the Republican-led House narrowly rejected a bid to cut $100 million from U.S. aid to Egypt as a protest of its suppression of political dissent." The 225-198 vote "came as the House pushed toward passage today of a $21.3 billion foreign-aid budget that already rescinds $200 million from prior economic aid for Cairo."

Israeli Airstrike Kills Commander In Hamas Government. The New York Times (6/9, Erlanger) reports, "In an airstrike against a militant training camp in southern Gaza on Thursday night, Israeli forces killed Jamal Abu Samhadana, a senior commander in the Hamas government, but said he was not the target of their attack." The attack "occurred just hours after Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel promised King Abdullah of Jordan that he would make every effort for progress on a negotiated settlement before moving unilaterally to remove some Israeli settlers from the West Bank."

The Washington Post (6/9, A17, Wilson) says Samhadanah "oversaw various branches of the 70,000-member Palestinian security services, including a 3,000-member force deployed on the streets of Gaza last month." The Post adds, "Soon after the airstrike, which occurred just before midnight and wounded at least 10 others, scores of armed men stormed the hospital in Rafah. Many of them vowed to exact revenge for Samhadanah's death as they kissed his body and carried it on their shoulders through Rafah's streets in a raucous procession."

House Panel Will Decide On India Nuclear Deal This Month. The House International Relations Committee will decide this month on a controversial civilian nuclear deal with India. AFP (6/9, Parameswaran) reports that a congressional aide said the panel "will 'in the later half' of June decide whether to endorse or give conditional approval to the deal." The panel's findings "would then be submitted to the full House for consideration."

Administration Urged To Pursue Trade Sanctions Against China. The AFL-CIO and Reps. Benjamin Cardin and Chris Smith yesterday urged the Bush Administration to pursue trade sanctions against China. The AP (6/9, Crutsinger) reports, "The group alleged that China's labor practices violate U.S. trade law, which makes repression of workers' rights a violation that would be subject to economic sanctions if the U.S. wins a case on the issue before the World Trade Organization. The petition was an effort to turn up the heat on the administration in an election year over record trade deficits with China, which hit an all-time high of $202 billion last year."

The Wall Street Journal (6/9, Maher) reports, "The labor federation's petition states that the repression of workers' rights in China constitutes a violation of U.S. trade law. It cites evidence from U.S. government reports that show workers in China frequently are paid less than the country's minimum wage, denied overtime pay, denied collective-bargaining rights and often subjected to abusive treatment. Violations of China's labor laws have led to illegally depressed wages that have contributed to the loss of 1.2 million U.S. jobs, including 930,000 in manufacturing, the petition says."

Bush Meets With Chilean President. The AP (6/9, Gedda) reports that President Bush met with Chile's new President Michelle Bachelet at the White House yesterday. The AP adds, "Neither Bush nor Bachelet publicly acknowledged the Bush administration's strong push to get Chile and other governments in the region to support Guatemala's bid" for a seat on the UN Security Council. Venezuela is also vying for the seat.

Bachelet Urged Not To Let Fear Guide Her Decision On UN Vote. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall

DOJ_NMG_0032837

Street Journal (6/9) that on the UN vote, Chile will feel pressure from "Chilean extremists, along with neighboring Argentina and friends like Fidel Castro" and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. O'Grady adds, "Let's hope that fear or political expediency do not drive her decision. That would be a tragedy for regional stability and for Chile's global prestige."

Bush To Visit Budapest. President Bush will visit Budapest later this month to mark the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution. The AP (6/9) reports, "The visit will come after a stop in Vienna, Austria, on June 20-21 for a summit with European Union leaders. Bush originally had planned to travel from Austria to Kiev, Ukraine, but that was put aside because of Ukraine's difficulty in forming a new government. The Kiev visit was never officially announced by the White House although officials had talked privately about Bush stopping there."

Putin's United Russia Party Consolidating Power. The Washington Post (6/9, A14, Finn) reports that Russian President Vladimir Putin's United Russia party "is consolidating its power to a level that critics compare to the Communists' political monopoly in Soviet days. In March, United Russia announced that it had 1 million members and planned to recruit another million before parliamentary elections in 2007, numbers that dwarf every other party's. Regional governors, business leaders and key bureaucrats, seeing where political power lies, have been flocking to its ranks."

Neuarth Calls Putin "Cool Character." Al Neuarth writes in USA Today (6/9) that Putin is a "'cool' character who took criticism calmly and is unlikely to shoot from the hip, a la Bush. … When Bush meets Putin again next month in St. Petersburg, Russia, at the Group of Eight summit of leading industrial nations, he needs to look into those eyes less innocently and more realistically."

Some Nations Slow In Providing Pledges Of Anti-Poverty Aid. The New York Times (6/9, Dugger) reports that an analysis of giving by the world's richest nations shows that despite pledges to increase aid to combat global poverty in 2010, "several got off to a slow start. Based on their own official statistics, three of the nations — Britain, Germany and France — actually decreased their aid to developing countries in 2005 from 2004, according to the analysis, which was conducted by Oxfam and released Wednesday. In contrast, Oxfam found that development assistance from Italy, Canada and Japan grew substantially during the same period, with Italy registering the largest increase in aid, 46 percent. Giving by the United States grew 16 percent, though after increased aid to Iraq and Afghanistan was subtracted from the total, American giving fell by 4 percent."

Official Says UN Must Stay Engaged In East Timor. Jose Ramos-Horta, Senior Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation for East Timor, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/9), "The capital of our impoverished country, East Timor, is once again the scene of riots, looting, arson and gunfire. … I believe East Timor can recover. This process may require a political change, perhaps in the form of a government of national unity." Ramos-Horta adds, "It is essential that the U.N. stay engaged in East Timor for at least a decade. U.N. management of the 2007 elections is crucial to their success. In close cooperation with my president, I shall seek continued U.N. engagement in East Timor. It's in no one's interest to let another poor country become a failed state."

WSJournal Criticizes UN Official's Speech. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/9) says, "When U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan named Mark Malloch Brown as his deputy, we breathed a sigh of relief. The Briton had distinguished himself as head of the U.N.'s Development Program, and his promotion seemed to promise adult-hour at an institution reeling from the Oil for Food scandal. Well, we're not infallible, and on Tuesday Mr. Malloch Brown gave a speech in which he went out of his way to prove us wrong." The Journal adds, "In a press conference Wednesday, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton described Mr. Malloch Brown's speech as 'the worst mistake by a senior U.N. official that I have seen,' adding that 'even though the target of the speech was the United States, the victim, I fear, will be the United Nations.' He's right. If Mr. Malloch Brown's speech serves any purpose, it is to remind American taxpayers of everything they don't like about the U.N."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"For A Vegas Judge And His Friends, One Good Turn Led To Another."
"Yes, He Does Digress."
"He Was More Symbol Than Sweeping Leader."
"U.S. Tracks Aide To Zarqawi's Doom; Bush Says The War Is Far From Over."
"Wealth, Poverty, Anger Live Together In Venice."
"Bush Takes Measured Tone On Zarqawi, War."

USA Today:

"Inside The Takedown."

DOJ_NMG_0032838

"First-Ever Cancer Vaccine Approved."
"Tobacco Giants Test Smoke-Free Products."

New York Times:
"After Long Hunt, U.S. Bombs Kill Al Qaeda Leader In Iraq."
"Hatred He Bred Is Sure To Survive Terrorist's Death."
"U.S. Approves Use Of Vaccine For Cervical Cancer."
"How Surveillance And Betrayal Led To A Hunt's End."
"In The Bayou, 100-Ton Symbols Of A Recovery Still Suspended."

Washington Post:
"After Zarqawi, No Clear Path In Weary Iraq."
"The Young Apprentice."
"How U.S. Forces Found Iraq's Most-Wanted Man."
"FDA Approves Vaccine That Should Prevent Most Cervical Cancers."
"Kaine Delays Execution Of Inmate For 6 Months."

Washington Times:
"'Out Of Business.'"
"Democrats Halt Move To Kill Off 'Death Tax.'"
"Sotheby's To Auction King's Papers, Library."

Detroit Free Press:
"Takeout Of Terror Boss leaves Iraq Still Torn."
"Grandma's Little Sunshine."
"Detroit A Hidden 'Cars' Costar."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Iraq's Master Terrorist Dead."
"Writings Of MLK Bound For Auction."
"Help Pours In For Veteran Who Fought Attackers."
"Cervical Cancer Vaccine Gets FDA Approval."

Houston Chronicle:
"U.S. Gets Iraq's Most Wanted."
"'Sweet Girl' Had No Prior Arrests."
"'The Hammer' Strikes In Departure Speech."
"World Cup Is The Start Of A New Chapter For Germany."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Zarqawi Killed; Iraqi Insurgency; Iraqi Reaction; Zarqawi Analysis; Iranian Nuclear Program; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Wendy's Fries; Mt. Merapi Erupts; USS Cole-Persian Gulf.
CBS: Zarqawi Killed; Iraqi Reaction; Zarqawi's Death-Bush; Zarqawi's Death-Khalilzad; Zarqawi Profile; Zarqawi Analysis; Oil Prices; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Zarqawi Recap; Zarqawi's Death-Terror Victims.
NBC: Zarqawi Killed; Iraqi Insurgency; Iraqi Reaction; Zarqawi-Special Forces Team; Zarqawi's Death-Bush; Bush's Reaction-Analysis; Zarqawi's Death-Jordan; Zarqawi's Death-Al Qaeda; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Senate-Estate Tax; Stock Markets; Military Families-High School.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Zarqawi Killed; Cervical Cancer Vaccine.
CBS: Zarqawi killed; Oil Prices; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; House-Internet Neutrality.
NPR: Zarqawi Killed; Senate-Estate Tax; DeLay-Final Day In Congress; Congress-Iraq Spending Bill; MO-Gay Foster Parents; China-Landslides.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — President and Mrs. Bush participate in arrival ceremony for Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, Camp David; joint press availability with Prime Minister Rasmussen, Camp David.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.5252-Communications Opportunity, Promotion and Enhancement Act of 2006.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on cyber security challenges in the Energy Department. Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman; Glenn Podonsky, Energy Department; Tom Pyke, CIO, Energy Department; Linton Brooks, Administrator, National Nuclear Security Administration; Undersecretary of Energy David Garman. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

Other: PRIME MINISTER ANDERS FOGH RASMUSSEN OF DENMARK _ Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Arrives at Camp David for meetings with President Bush. 10:10 a.m. Holds joint media availability with President Bush. Camp David. 4:45 p.m. Holds news conference for the Danish media. Four Seasons Hotel. 7 p.m. Private dinner at the Danish Embassy.

MENTAL HEALTH _ Annual meeting of the National Mental Health Association. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Plenary session on mental health today, with Newt Gingrich. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

CHINA-TECHNOLOGY _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a discussion with Commerce Undersecretary David McCormick on high tech and strategic trade with China, while safeguarding U.S. national security. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

IMMIGRATION-EDUCATION _ 9 a.m. The Population Resource Center, others, hold a briefing on immigration and the U.S. education system, with David Shreve of the National

DOJ_NMG_0032839

Conference of State Legislatures, Sylvia Martinex of the University of Chicago, others. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

FCC-KATRINA _ 10 a.m. There will be a meeting of the Federal Communications Commission Independent Panel Reviewing the Impact of Hurricane Katrina on Communications Networks. Location: Commission Meeting Room (TW-C305), FCC headquarters, 445 12th St. SW.

GOP BRIEFING _ 10 a.m. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds holds a pen and pad briefing to discuss the midterm elections. Location: 320 1st St. SE.

ENERGY OUTLOOK _ 12 p.m. The National Economists Club holds a luncheon with Deutsche Bank AG (New York) Chief Energy Economist Adam Sieminski on the oil and natural gas outlook. Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

POLITICAL FINANCE _ 2 p.m. IFES holds a discussion on the role of money in politics of 8 post-conflict countries, including Iraq, Afghanistan, Liberia and Haiti. Location: IFES, 3rd floor, 1101 15th St. NW.

AYALON _ 4 p.m. Israeli Amb. Daniel Ayalon holds an Afternoon Newsmaker news conference on Mideast developments. Location: National Press Club.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, June 12, 2006 8:14 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, June 12, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060612.pdf; agnb060612.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JUNE 12, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Guantanamo Under Scrutiny After Three Detainees Commit Suicide 4

Specter Says He Could Force Phone Companies To Testify About NSA Surveillance 5

Defense Attorneys Shut Out As Courtroom Secrecy In Terror Cases Grows....6

Media Said To Be Downplaying Links Between Canadian Suspects, Networks 7

Patriot Act:

SEC, Treasury Mull How To Apply Patriot Act To Hedge Funds....7

Homeland Response:

Fake ID Used To Enter DHS Headquarters....7

Study Finds Arab-Americans Mistrust Police Since 9/11 7

"Technicalities" Leaving New Orleans Homeowners Without Enough To Rebuild 8

War News:

White House Convenes War Cabinet Summit On Iraq 8

Zarqawi Autopsy Results Withheld....11

Defense Lawyers Defend Haditha Marines' Actions 13

House Will Debate Iraq 14

Reid Seeks More Intelligence Oversight On Iran Policy 14

Iraqi Government Releases Second Batch Of Prisoners From Abu Ghraib....14

Krugman Defends Democrats Who Opposed Iraq War 14

Karzai Says Tribesmen Will Be Recruited To Fight Taliban ..14

Humvee Armor Linked to Rollovers 15

Author Decries Demonstrators Outside Military Hospitals, Funerals....15

Critics Say Military Incentives For Immigrant Enlistment Are Exploitative....15

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Returns To Hunton & Williams....15

Corporate Scandals:

Democrats Defend Indicted Law Firm 16

Criminal Law:

Top Lewis Aide Received $2 Million Buyout From Former Lobbying Firm 16

Novak Says Hastert's Reaction To FBI Raid Upset Many GOP Constituents....16

Prosecutor's Silence In Duke Rape Case Raises Questions..17

Suspect In Clemson Rape-Murder Confesses To More Sex Crimes 17

Two Elderly California Women Suspected In Insurance Fraud Scheme 17

Former Fumo Aide Resigns From Charity Under FBI, IRS Scrutiny....18

29 Indicted In FBI Probe Of Connecticut Garbage Hauling Industry....18

Pellicano Assails FBI Probe, Vows Never To "Rat Out" Clients....18

Arizona AG To Seek Federal Task Force In Jeffs Case 19

USAT Warns That Rising Prison Problems Affect Society....19

Prison Rehab Program Ruling Raises Questions About Faith-Based Programs 20

Civil Law:

Firms Seek Dismissal Of Thousands Of Asbestos Cases 20

Allen Vows To Filibuster Attempt To Crack Down On 527s ...20

Civil Rights:

WSJournal Says Voting Rights Act Provision Likely Will Be Renewed....21

Antitrust:

Arcelor Rejects Hostile Bid By Mittal Steel 21

European Shareholder Activists Making Moves On US Firms 21
AXA In Talks To Purchase Credit Suisse Unit 21
Forbes Criticizes Net Neutrality Legislation 22
WSJournal Says Spectrum Auctions Should Proceed Without Interference 22

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Western Governors Say States Need To Take Lead On Global Warming 22
Mercury Fears Add To Tribe's Woes 22
NYTimes Says Washington Should Encourage Green Investments By Business 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

NJ Man Sentenced To 15 Years For Violent Hijacking Of FBI Employee's Vehicle 23
In New Orleans, Doctor Pleads Guilty In Prescription Scheme 23
Man Facing Meth Charges Also Accused In Hawaii Jewelry Heist 23
Accused Gang Members Arrested In Illinois On Drug Charges 23
Interim Haitian Prime Minister Claims "Unequaled" Cooperation With DEA 24
MLB Considering Suspending Grimsley For Admission Of Drug Use 24
California Wrestling Coach Charged With Steroid Possession 25

Immigration:

EU-Style Passport-Free Zone Seen Alternative For US-Canadian Border 25
Immigration Is Key Issue In Competitive AZ5 Race 26
Schwarzenegger Faces Difficult Balance On Immigration 26

Tax:

Democrats Said To Be Laying Ground Work For Tax Hike 26

Congress-Administration:

Administration Launches Effort To Enroll Medicare Drug Beneficiaries 27
Business Lobby Pushes GOP On Competitiveness Agenda 27
Budget Panels To Take Up Line-Item Veto Proposals 27
Hoyer, Murtha To Seek Leadership Posts If Democrats Win House 27
Poll Finds Reid Approval Rating At 48% 28
House Makes Emailing Offices More Difficult 28
OPM To Reexamine Bids To Provide Dental, Vision Benefits 28
Bush Personal Aide Profiled 28
Administration Seeks To Take Focus Off Bush Poll Numbers 28
Conservative Intellectuals Said To Be Rejecting Bush 29
Marcus Calls DeLay's Farewell Speech "Sneering, Belligerent." 29
NYTimes Says State Department Should Cover Programs To Train Foreign Militaries 29
WSJournal Praises FAA Handling Of NATCA Contract 29

Other News:

Fed Keeping Close Eye On Inflation Expectations 29
Gasoline Prices Expected To Decline Further 29
States Move To Transform Medicaid 30
Democrats Lose Ground In Gubernatorial Races 30
Reynolds Says CA50 Result Shows Corruption Won't Be Issue In November 30
Several Clinton Administration Alumni Seeking Elective Office 31
Byrd, In Tough Race, Faces Scrutiny For Votes On Social Issues 31
Edwards Leads Clinton In Iowa Caucus Poll 32
Herbert Says Ohio Was "Hijacked" From Kerry In 2004 32
Local TV Stations Losing, Viewers, Revenue To Internet 32
Growing Number Of Students Finish College Over $100,000 In Debt 32
NYTimes Says American Workers Are Downbeat 32
Iran Wants Talks, But Balks At Immediate Enrichment Freeze 32
Latest Gaza Violence Could Derail Both Leaders' Plans 33
Major North Korean Missile Test Could Be Imminent 34
Domenici Makes Case For India Nuclear Agreement 34
Turkish EU Accession Talks In Jeopardy 34
Iraq War Casts Pall In Lebanon, Other Middle Eastern Countries 35
Somali Warlord Vows To Contest Islamic Militia's Control Of Mogadishu 35
Annan Says US Use Of Financial Leverage Could Hurt Reform 35
G-8 Ministers Say China, Emerging Economic Powers Overloading Poor Countries With Debt 35
Chinese Ambassador Makes Goodwill Tour Of Midwest 36
Disarming Janjaweed Seen As Key To Reaching Peace In Darfur 36
Negotiators Debate Russian Investment In US, European Energy Infrastructure 36
Slovakian Neo-Liberal Government Seen As Likely To Lose Elections 36

DOJ_NMG_0032843

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 37

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 38

DOJ_NMG_0032844

TERRORISM NEWS:

Guantanamo Under Scrutiny After Three Detainees Commit Suicide. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 4, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba is coming under more scrutiny tonight after three suicides there on Saturday. The US military says the bodies of two Saudis and a man from Yemen were found in their cells hanging from nooses made from bed sheets and clothing. The military says all three left suicide notes. But an attorney for the victims' relatives says he believes there was a crime committed and says he plans to sue the US Government."

The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Yesterday we reported on the suicides of terror suspects at Guantanamo Bay. Is that issue expected to be on the table at all at" President Bush's war cabinet summit? CBS (Chen) added, "This summit is supposed to be fairly focused on the way forward as White House calls it for Iraq, but clearly there's going to be a lot of pressure on the President to resolve the Guantanamo situation as well."

The New York Times (6/12, Cloud, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Though the Bush administration has been under pressure -- from the United Nations, European countries and the International Committee of the Red Cross -- about the Guantánamo detention center, White House officials did not indicate that they viewed the suicides as a major political problem." The State Department "alerted American embassies in Europe and the Middle East, and asked them to contact government officials. But White House officials said Mr. Bush did not make calls to world leaders. 'We haven't heard much response,' one senior official said." The United Nations was "also notified of the suicides, the White House said."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Richey, Feldmann, 61K) says "the deaths point up a growing dilemma for the Bush administration as it seeks to maintain an array of options in fighting the war on terror in the face of rising domestic and international criticism." Critics of Guantánamo "say the Bush administration appears to have miscalculated. America's tough policies have generated intense criticism among human rights activists both at home and abroad. US allies in Europe as well as the United Nations Committee Against Torture are calling on the US to close the detention camp." The US Supreme Court "is expected this month to rule on whether the administration's plan for military trials at Guantánamo comports with constitutional safeguards and international treaty obligations." The suicides "inject a sense of urgency into questions about US antiterror tactics."

Knight Ridder (6/12, Clark) reports "a key ally of the Bush administration and staunch supporter of the war in Iraq said Sunday that failing to close the Guantanamo Bay prison would compromise the administration's efforts to fight a global war on terror. The assessment from Anders Fogh Rasmussen, the Prime Minister of Denmark, came the day after the first reported suicides of detainees at the post-Sept. 11 prison camp and followed Rasmussen's trip to Camp David with President Bush." In an interview with CNN, Rasmussen "said keeping prisoners behind bars 'without legal proceedings' contradicts US principles."

The AP (6/12, Selsky) reports the Department of Defense "identified the three as Saudi Arabians Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi Al-Utaybi and Yassar Talal Al-Zahrani and Yemeni Ali Abdullah Ahmed. The two Saudis were also identified earlier by Saudi officials. … None of the three had been formally charged. … Only 10 detainees have been charged with crimes and face military tribunals ordered by President Bush." The Washington Post (6/12, Ricks, 744K) runs a similar report.

Knight Ridder (6/12, Rosenberg) says "the quality of the evidence that the government has on the three has never been tested in court." Rather, "the Pentagon's brief descriptions are what has qualified them for indefinite detention as so-called 'enemy combatants,' a war-on-terror category created by the Bush administration. It is not a designation covered by the Geneva Conventions, international agreements on the treatment of prisoners of war."

USA Today (6/12, Walton, 2.31M) notes "the three prisoners found dead at the Guantanamo prison camp Saturday were the first to succeed at suicide, but about two dozen others have tried to kill themselves at the remote US naval base in southeast Cuba. Before Saturday, there had been 41 suicide attempts by 25 prisoners and no deaths since the United States began using the base to house enemy combatants in January 2002, according to Navy Cmdr. J.D. Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman." The prison camp's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, "said the suicides were acts of 'asymmetrical warfare' linked to a 'mystical' belief that the deaths of three detainees would bring the release of the rest."

DOJ_NMG_0032845

However, the AP (6/11, Dodds) reports, "Dispirited and desperate prisoners at Guantanamo Bay look to suicide as a way out of a hopeless situation, and not because they seek martyrdom, say three British Muslims once held there. 'There is no hope in Guantanamo. The only thing that goes through your mind day after day is how to get justice or how to kill yourself,' said Shafiq Rasul, 29, who waged a hunger strike while at the camp to protest alleged beatings. 'It is the despair -- not the thought of martyrdom -- that consumes you there.'"

Cheney's Office Blocked Efforts To Close Guantanamo. Newsweek (6/19) reports in its "Periscope" column that a plan to shut down the Guantanamo prison "had quietly picked up support last year from Pentagon officials, including Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England, but was blocked by Dick Cheney's office. Cheney and others in the White House feared closing Gitmo would be seen as a capitulation to critics. But even before the suicide hangings of the two Saudis and one Yemeni last week, there were signs that Bush himself was having second thoughts."

Time (6/19, Corliss, Zagorin) reports that President Bush "says he wants to 'empty' the Gitmo facility but can't do so until another country agrees to take the inmates without torturing or freeing them. Yet authorities are currently constructing a new, $30 million prison at Gitmo, where they plan to consolidate many of the camp's maximum- and medium-security inmates"

Reed Says Prison Should Be Closed. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, A1, Williams, 958K) also reports on the "the international clamor against the prison continued," and notesone US senator said "it should be closed as soon as possible." Democratic Sen. Jack Reed "said the facility should be closed 'as quickly as possible,' noting that 'as long as Guantanamo exists, it's a source of international attention and concern.'" Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, meanwhile, "said detainees were 'just out there in limbo, and that creates a very difficult situation.' He concluded, 'Where we have evidence, they ought to be tried, and if convicted, they ought to be sentenced.'"

Saudis Allege Dead Detainees Were Tortured. The AP (6/12, Shihri) reports, "The reported suicides of two Saudi detainees at Guantanamo Bay intensified Saudi anger at the camp, drawing questions Sunday about whether the men really killed themselves or were driven to it by torture. The detention of more than 130 Saudis at the U.S. jail has long grated on people in the kingdom, and there was marked skepticism that the prisoners committed suicide. … The kingdom's semiofficial human rights organization called for an independent investigation into the deaths of the two Saudis, who were identified Sunday by Saudi officials as Mani bin Shaman bin Turki al Habradi and Yasser Talal Abdullah Yahya al Zahrani. … Many Saudis denounced the suicide claim as a fabrication, and some accused US authorities of complicity in the inmates' deaths." Saleh al-Khathlan, "director of monitoring at the rights group, explicitly accused Guantanamo officials of torturing detainees."

NYTimes Says Guantanamo Prison "Beyond The Laws Of Civilized Nations." The New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "The news that three inmates at Guantánamo Bay hanged themselves should not have surprised anyone who has paid the slightest attention to the twisted history of the camp that President Bush built for selected prisoners from Afghanistan and antiterrorist operations." It was "the inevitable result of creating a netherworld of despair beyond the laws of civilized nations, where men were to be held without any hope of decent treatment, impartial justice or, in so many cases, even eventual release."

Specter Says He Could Force Phone Companies To Testify About NSA Surveillance. USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) reports, "Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Sunday that he's ready to force telephone company officials to testify about the National Security Agency warrantless-surveillance program if the Bush administration doesn't cooperate in drafting rules on what's allowable. 'If we don't get some results, I'm prepared to go back to demand hearings and issue subpoenas, if necessary,' Specter said on CNN's Late Edition." Specter "had threatened to subpoena phone company executives to testify about their cooperation with the NSA." But "he said that after talking with Vice President Cheney last week, he's hopeful that hearings and subpoenas can be avoided. Cheney indicated he was willing to work with Congress on new rules governing eavesdropping." The AP (6/12) says Cheney "indicated he was willing to work with Congress on new rules governing eavesdropping." But "he stopped short of promising any action and said a final decision on the bill would be up to President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0032846

Meanwhile, in an editorial titled "NSA Train Wreck," the Washington Post (6/12, A20, 744K) says that "many key lawmakers, including Mr. Specter, have not been briefed fully on what the NSA is doing, so it is way too early to be legislating -- and all the more dangerous not just to tinker but to fundamentally alter the rules."

Specter Says Cheney Phone Call About Wire Taps Was "Step Forward." Appearing on CNN's Late Edition (6/11, Blitzer), Specter said, "Let's make one thing plain. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act provides the exclusive remedy for domestic wiretapping. There's no doubt that law has been violated. Whether the president has inherent Article Two power, constitutionally, which supersedes or trumps the statute, remains to be seen." Asked about his exchange of letters with Vice President Cheney over warrantless wiretapping, Specter said that he is "searching for a way of bringing this matter to a head." He said the Vice President's Thursday phone call to him was "a step forward." Specter said, "[W]e're talking. But if the talks aren't productive, I'm prepared to go back to the hearings and I'm prepared to go back to the subpoenas if necessary."

Specter Won't Give "Amnesty" Over Wiretaps. Specter, asked on CNN's Late Edition (6/11, Blitzer) about a Friday Washington Post (6/9, Pincus, 744K) report that he is ready to give a "blanket amnesty" to anyone who authorized warrantless surveillance, replied, "Absolutely not. That was an erroneous report. If anybody has violated the law, they'll be held accountable, both as to criminal conduct and as to civil conduct. … Take a look at my bill, Wolf. It just doesn't say that."

Judge To Hear ACLU Challenge To NSA Program. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Weinstein, 958K) reports, "The National Security Agency's controversial domestic surveillance program faces its first major court test today before a veteran federal judge in Detroit. In January, groups including the American Civil Liberties Union and the Michigan branch of the Council on American-Islamic Relations as well as several individuals, who said they feared the government was spying on them, filed a 60-page lawsuit seeking to have the warrantless wiretapping program declared unconstitutional. Among the individuals is James Bamford, author of two books on the NSA." The suit in Detroit, "like one filed in New York by the Center for Constitutional Rights, asserts that the NSA's eavesdropping program has violated free-speech and privacy rights and has had a chilling effect on the communications of potential surveillance targets." The Times adds, "None of the plaintiffs have offered proof they were spied on. Rather, they maintain that the simple existence of the program has impeded their ability to perform their jobs as journalists and lawyers."

NSA Case Centers On Security-Privacy Debate. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/12, Deans) reports, "The Bush administration's domestic surveillance program will be challenged in federal court in Detroit Monday when lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union argue that wiretapping without warrants violates the U.S. Constitution." The AJC continues, "It will be the first time a federal court has reviewed the legality of National Security Agency eavesdropping on phone calls between people in the United States and others overseas with suspected links to terrorist groups." The AJC adds, "The case pits constitutional protection of personal freedoms against tactics employed by President Bush to protect the country against terrorist attack. Whatever decision the district court reaches probably will be appealed and the case is expected to reach the U.S. Supreme Court. … The Justice Department sought to have the case dismissed on the grounds that the legal proceedings have the potential to expose national security secrets. But U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, who will preside over today's oral argument, dismissed the government's contention."

Defense Attorneys Shut Out As Courtroom Secrecy In Terror Cases Grows. The AP (6/12, Robinson) reports, "Witnesses used bogus names, the public was barred from the courtroom and part of the hearing was behind closed doors in the judge's chambers -- with defense lawyers shut out. … 'I don't know what took place back there,' grumbled Michael E. Deutsch, chief defense lawyer for Muhammad Salah, a Chicago man charged with laundering hundreds of thousands of dollars to pay for murders, bombings and other acts of terrorism by the Palestinian militant group Hamas." The AP continues, "Court secrecy is getting tighter across the nation as the government wages war on terrorism, and the recent hearings in Salah's case, set for trial Oct. 12, are just one example, attorneys say. … In Maryland, a federal judge last month dismissed a lawsuit filed by a German man, Khaled al-Masri, who claimed to have been illegally detained and tortured in overseas prisons run by the CIA. After receiving a secret written CIA briefing, the judge ruled that going ahead with a civil trial in the al-Masri case would have exposed state secrets." The AP adds, "The New York Civil Liberties Union is asking an appeals court to order a federal judge in Albany to unseal his decision refusing to toss out charges against alleged money launderers Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain. They say they may have been targets of a warrantless wiretap. The judge's decision came two hours after the government submitted a secret court document. … In Chicago, attorneys for Sami Latchin, a man accused of serving as a 'sleeper agent' in the United States for the Saddam Hussein regime, have asked U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer whether the National Security Agency eavesdropped on his telephone conversations. … Prosecutors say a representative of the Justice Department in Washington will answer the question -- but only in the judge's chambers with defense attorneys not allowed. … Such secret procedures, once rare in American courts, have become more common since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Prosecutors say they need secrecy to protect undercover agents, informants and witnesses from terrorist reprisals and keep critical information pipelines from being shut down. … But defense attorneys say the right of defendants to confront their accusers, guaranteed by the 6th Amendment to the Constitution, is being worn away under the guise of national security."

DOJ_NMG_0032847

Media Said To Be Downplaying Links Between Canadian Suspects, Networks. In the Weekly Standard (6/19), Dan Darling says despite "all the uncertainties, a number of media outlets and terrorism analysts, taking a cue from Canadian police, rushed to declare the entire affair the work of homegrown terrorists operating independently of any broader network or organization." Yet "there are good reasons to doubt this view." The "nature of the relationship among the Canadian suspects, their Atlanta counterparts, and any additional accomplices requires further elucidation, as does the nature of any relationship between the younger Abdelhaleen and Mahjoub." With "so many questions unanswered, it is far too soon to rule out connections between the Canadian conspiracy and terrorists abroad. Certainly, much evidence has come to light challenging the view that homegrown terrorism is an entirely insular phenomenon."

PATRIOT ACT:

SEC, Treasury Mull How To Apply Patriot Act To Hedge Funds. Business Week (6/19, Der Hovanesian) reports when "drug runners and terrorists want to park illicit cash, there may be no better haven than hedge funds. Despite tough new anti-money laundering standards put out by U.S. regulators for banks, mutual fund companies, insurers, and money transmitters, the highly secretive hedge fund industry has no restrictions whatsoever." For "more than three years, the Securities & Exchange Commission and the Treasury Dept. have been discussing how to include hedge funds in the USA Patriot Act, the 2001 legislation designed to protect against terrorism. Yet during that time, the $1.3 trillion hedge fund industry has collected record amounts of cash, some of which could well be from questionable sources."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Fake ID Used To Enter DHS Headquarters. The Washington Times (6/12, Dinan, 90K) reports Bruce DeCell, a member of 9/11 Families for a Secure America, used "a fake Matricula Consular card as identification" to enter DHS headquarters for a meeting with officials Wednesday. The card, which "federal rules…say…is not valid ID at government buildings," lists DeCell's "address as '123 Fraud Blvd.' on an incorrectly spelled 'Staton Island, NY.'" DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen "said the department shouldn't have allowed the ID to be used for entry to its headquarters," but that "DeCell's group went through metal detectors and other routine security screening and had an escort at all times while in the building."

Study Finds Arab-Americans Mistrust Police Since 9/11. The New York Times (6/12, Elliott, 1.19M) reports, "In the aftermath of Sept. 11, Arab-Americans have a greater fear of racial profiling and immigration enforcement than of falling victim to hate crimes, according to a national study financed by the Justice Department." The study also "concluded that local police officers and federal agents were straining under the pressure to fight terrorism, and that new federal policies in this effort were poorly defined and inconsistently applied." The Times adds, "The two-year study, released today by the Vera Institute of Justice, explored the changed relationship between Arab-Americans and law enforcement in the years since the 2001 terrorist attacks. The Vera Institute is a nonprofit policy research center based in New York. … Both Arab-American community leaders and law enforcement officials interviewed in the study said that cooperation between both groups had suffered from a lack of trust."

DOJ_NMG_0032848

"Technicalities" Leaving New Orleans Homeowners Without Enough To Rebuild. The AP (6/12, Callimachi) reports that in an "all-too-common" situation for New Orleans homeowners whose houses were "disemboweled nine months ago by Hurricane Katrina," some "are finding that technicalities are keeping them from securing enough from their insurers to rebuild." Consumer advocates say the industry has used "numerous exclusions to reduce payouts," leaving homeowners with "two choices: Give up and leave, or else rebuild by hand, using their savings to pay for labor and materials." And while politicians had blamed New Orleans residents for not purchasing "federal flood insurance on top of their homeowners policies," Gulf Coast recovery czar Donald Powell's office has "found few communities were better insured against flooding."

Tropical Storm Alberto "Could Indicate A Repeat Of Last Year's Pattern." USA Today (6/12, Kasindorf, 2.31M) reports Tropical Storm Alberto, the first "since the devastating 2005 hurricane season," has placed much of Florida's Gulf Coast under a tropical storm watch, with the National Hurricane Center forecasting "up to 10 inches of rain…over the area through Tuesday. Alberto could make landfall over western Florida on Tuesday or could weaken and dissipate at sea, hurricane center forecaster Richard Pasch said." USA Today adds that the storm, "which occurred early, could indicate a repeat of last year's pattern, when Tropical Storm Arlene formed June 9 and Bret on June 28."

Storm Unlikely To Strengthen. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 5, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The fringes of tropical storm Alberto are beginning to sweep across south Florida. Top winds at 45 miles per hour and Alberto is not expected to strengthen into a hurricane."

New Model To Help Scientists Predict Storm Intensity. The Washington Post (6/12, A19, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Scientists at the National Hurricane Center" in Miami are hoping to improve "their record in predicting storm intensity" with what has been "described as 'next generation' in tropical storm forecasting." The Hurricane Weather Research and Forecast Model "will envision the full three-dimensional hurricane, the circulation at its core and the varying winds from its bottom to its top, several miles up." The Post adds, "Predicting storm intensity is considered a critical challenge among forecasters because so many people depend upon forecasts of intensity to determine whether to flee an oncoming storm."

WAR NEWS:

White House Convenes War Cabinet Summit On Iraq. President Bush meets at Camp David today and on Tuesday with members of the war cabinet and other Administration officials to reexamine the US strategy in Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight the White House is moving quickly to make the most of last week's good news out of Iraq. With Zarqawi's death the Bush Administration is gearing up to talk strategy hosting a two-day summit that gets underway tomorrow." CBS (Chen) added, "The President made a quick stop at White House before heading back to Camp David where he spent most weekend prepping for a low-profile high-stakes summit on Iraq capped off by a joint US-Iraqi cabinet meeting through video hookup with Baghdad." The President is "walking a fine line capitalizing on the latest successes in Iraq while trying to persuade Americans US forces are still needed there." This is "a critical moment for both Baghdad and Washington. One official here is quoted as saying today this is a last best chance to get things right but clearly, Russ, that's not an easy job."

NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The question is whether the President is considering a plan that would reduce the number of US troops there." NBC (Corke) added, "US troop levels among the many topics to be discussed this week as the President looks to his closest advisors for a progress report on the war. With al-Zarqawi dead and the new Iraqi government in place, the President this week is calling together his war advisors to chart the course in Iraq. On the table, troop reductions."

Knight Ridder (6/12, Hutcheson) reports on President Bush and his team's upcoming two-day session at Camp David "to plan their next moves in Iraq." The article says that the conference "is not expected to produce any policy shifts or major new initiatives. The issue of troop withdrawals isn't even on the agenda." Gen. George Casey says that he might ask, though he is not planning to do so, for additional troops if "he concludes they are needed to get control of" Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0032849

Congress Keeping Watch On President's Iraq Summit. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Corke, 9.87M) reported, "And as the President and his advisors map out a military plan, some wonder whether there's another way." Rep. Jane Harman, California: "My bottom line is this is a political problem now, it's not a military problem. The US military presence is part of the problem. It's not part of the solution." Corke: "And as we head into this very important meeting, Democrats and Republicans on the Hill will be watching very closely to see which direction the Administration takes to address the problems on the ground in Iraq. And keep in mind this week the Senate will decide whether to authorize more war spending, and of course the House will also debate this issue."

DNSA O'Sullivan Called Central To Bush's Thinking. The New York Times (6/12, Bumiller, 1.19M) profiles Deputy National Security Adviser Meghan O'Sullivan, "who is largely unknown outside the administration, but who colleagues say is instrumental in shaping" President Bush's "views" on stabilization efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan. With NSA Hadley, O'Sullivan "briefs the president in person on Iraq up to several times a week. … She coordinates the political, security and reconstruction efforts for Iraq throughout the agencies of the government. Not least, she briefs the president before all of his phone calls and meetings with Iraqi leaders. Although Ms. O'Sullivan does not make major decisions — the administration's policy is run by" Ambassador Khalilzad and Secretary Rice — "she is important because of her closeness to the president and her role in helping to form his thinking." The Times continues, "Colleagues say that Ms. O'Sullivan holds to the view, reflected in the president's public statements, that rebuilding Iraq's civic institutions and persuading Iraqis to accommodate one another politically is a way out of the sectarian violence. She is more optimistic about the political process than others in the administration. … The question that even her supporters raise is whether she is too close to see the landscape of problems."

Top General In Iraq Predicts Coalition Will Be Able To Reduce Troop Level In Iraq. On CBS's Face the Nation, Gen. George Casey predicted that the US and its coalition partners would gradually be able to reduce troop levels in Iraq, notwithstanding Administration efforts to lower expectations for bringing the troops home. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Chen, 7.66M) reported, "Ahead of the summit the White House has firmly slapped down suggestions it could lead to troop drawdown even as top military officials signal growing confidence in Iraqi forces." Gen. George Casey: "We think by summer 57% of the Iraqi brigades will be in the lead and we think by the end of the year almost all the Iraqi divisions will be capable of leading."

NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Corke, 9.87M) quoted Gen. Casey: "I think that as long as the Iraqi security forces continue to progress and as long as this national unity government continues to operate that way and move the country forward, I think we're going to be able to see continued gradual reductions of Coalition forces over the coming months and into next year." Corke: "But the President appeared to be trying to lower expectations when it comes to bringing troops home."

The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Barnes, Stack, 958K) reports "Casey's comments on televised public-affairs shows underscored an inherent tension in the military's position." The United States "suddenly finds itself with a chance to build on its military blow against al-Qaida in Iraq at the same time it could take advantage of the political stability offered by Iraq's new government to reduce the US presence. … For months, the Pentagon has suggested that Casey would be in a position this spring to recommend further cuts in the U.S. troop deployment, reductions that began last December when orders for two brigades were canceled." But "the long wrangling over who would become Iraq's prime minister and who would fill the posts of defense and interior minister, along with continued violence in Iraq, forced Casey and Pentagon officials to put off decisions about whether to hold back additional brigades." The AP (6/11, Pickler) also reports the story.

Iraqi National Security Adviser Says Most Foreign Troops Will Be Gone By 2009. The Washington Times (6/12, Pfeiffer, 90K) notes "Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak Rubaie went further, giving both a number and a prediction of how soon most US troops will have left his country." Appearing on CNN's Late Edition (6/11, Blitzer), Mowaffak al-Rubaie said that by the end of this year, "I believe that the number of the multinational forces will be probably less than 100,000 in this country." He also predicted, "by the middle of 2008, we will not see a lot of visibility" of the multinational forces in the cities or towns." He said "the overwhelming majority of the multinational forces will leave, probably before the before the middle of 2008." Asked about al-Rubaie's prediction of troop reductions before the end of the year, Army Brigadier General Mark Kimmitt, the deputy director for plans and policy of the US military's Central Command, said, "If we continue to make progress militarily, if this new unity government comes together and is able to bring in more and more of the disinfected Iraqis that have not felt part of this process, I can see a plausible scenario where the numbers could go down, perhaps as much as Mowaffak has said."

DOJ_NMG_0032850

McCaffrey Says Current Pace Of Iraq Deployment Risks "Breaking The Force." Appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (6/11, Russert), NBC News analyst and retired General Barry McCaffrey said the US does not have "an adequate military to sustain this operational pace" in Iraq. McCaffrey said, "the Army is 80,000 soldiers short; the Marines are 25,000 people short. SOCOM is under huge stress, and we aren't resourced to continue this effort. And we've got to make up our mind: Do we want to pay for the kind of strategy that we're prosecuting or not?" McCaffrey said "we've got to draw down and pretty soon, maybe 50,000 to 100,000 troops by next summer" and that "otherwise we risk breaking the force."

Harman Calls For Rumsfeld's Ouster, Redeployment Of Forces Out Of Iraq. Rep. Jane Harman, on Fox News Sunday (6/11, Wallace), said that Bush should fire Rumsfeld and announce "that he is going to start now asking the generals to redeploy our troops because going forward the U.S. objectives -- and we have at least three of them -- can best be achieved politically, not militarily." Harman said the US should start to move its forces out of Iraq and put "some into Kuwait and Jordan." She said "while we're part of the political solution, we're also part of the military problem." Harman called Zarqawi's death "a great achievement, wonderful police work." However, she said, "It won't reduce the insurgency, I don't believe."

Batiste Assails Rumsfeld. In a Knight Ridder op-ed (6/11), retired Gen. John Batiste criticizes Secretary Rumsfeld for "poor decisions and bad judgment in 2003 and 2004." Specifically, he faults Rumsfeld for using too few troops to secure the country and defeat the insurgency, an error compounded by shutting down the Iraqi military, which "gave the insurgency" manpower, weapons, and ammunition. Batiste argues, "The secretary of defense does not understand the human dimension of warfare ... Based upon all the above, the secretary of defense is not a competent wartime leader. He knows everything, except how to win. He surrounds himself with like-minded and compliant subordinates who do not grasp the importance of the principles of war, the complexities of Iraq or the human dimension of warfare."

Kristol Calls For Bush To Challenge Casey, Abizaid. On Fox News Sunday (6/11, Wallace), the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "if General Abizaid and General Casey say we've got it under control, steady as usual, I think the president needs to say I want you to rethink that. He needs to get other generals to second- guess them, because that's what all successful presidents have done in war. I have nothing against Abizaid and Casey, but it cannot be steady as it goes." Kristol said he hopes that at Camp David Bush "really rethinks the war, rethinks troop levels, and challenges Abizaid and Casey to really give him a strategy for victory."

Administration Strikes Tone Of "Tempered Optimism" In Wake Of Zarqawi's Death. Newsweek (6/19, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi's is "the first good news about the insurgency in months, and the President and his advisers know they risk squandering it if they were to gloat. … Announcing Zarqawi's death at the White House, Bush was solemn." Newsweek adds, "The new cautious, low-key approach is part of a larger White House strategy to win back voters' trust in Bush's Iraq plan -- and in Bush himself, whose public-approval ratings are languishing in the basement."

As part of its cover package, Time (6/19, Carney, Allen) reports "as White House speechwriters went to work on the remarks the President would deliver from the Rose Garden" following Abu Musab al Zarqawi's death, "they tried to strike a tone of 'tempered optimism,' according to an aide who worked on the speech. When Bush appeared before the cameras, he sounded muted, speaking of his hope that the death of Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi would allow Iraq's infant government to 'turn the tide' of a war that could still mar Bush's presidency." Bush "wisely shunned any predictions about how much good would come from al-Zarqawi's elimination. But the sense of elation in the US command was impossible to contain."

Zarqawi's Death Exposes "Messy Breech" Among Bush Aides. As part of its cover package, Time (6/19, Carney, Allen) reports that Zarqawi's death "has forced the Administration to confront a messy breach emerging among top aides. While some officials believe the US should maintain its troop strength for the foreseeable future, others have argued that the Administration should capitalize on any improvements in the situation to accelerate the handover to Iraqis. Administration aides tell TIME that West Wing officials had hoped to reduce the number of troops in Iraq from today's 129,000 to about 100,000 by the end of the year, and possibly before the midterm congressional elections. But the country's slide toward an all-out civil war in recent months had begun to convince them that a drawdown anytime soon would not be feasible."

DOJ_NMG_0032851

Officials Note Dissension Among Zarqawi Followers. Time (6/19, MacLeod, Powell) reports in its cover package that a Jordanian security official says that in the wake of the attack, "members of al-Zarqawi's organization in Iraq launched a series of interrogations in search of those who sold out their leader, leading Jordanian officials to hope that the hit is already causing dissension in jihadist ranks."

Zarqawi Death Unlikely To Stop Flow Of Jihadists Into Iraq. In a separate story, U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Kaplan) reports, "Zarqawi's lasting legacy may be his role as lightning rod to the global jihad movement. … Although Zarqawi is history, few experts believe the flow of jihadists into Iraq will cease. Worse, they warn, these new foreign legionnaires are gaining skills in urban war fighting and terrorism -- skills they will take with them when they return home."

Khalilzad Suggests US May Negotiate With Some Insurgent Leaders. Newsweek (6/19, Nordland, Hirsh) reports that Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador in Iraq, "sees a 'big opportunity'" in Zarqawi's death. Khalilzad's "implicit message to Iraq's Sunni insurgents and sympathizers is this: it's safe to come out now, and maybe even act civilly toward your fellow Iraqis among the Shiites. … In an interview with NEWSWEEK, Khalilzad went further than he has before in suggesting that the US administration and new Iraqi government are willing to negotiate directly with some insurgent leaders. 'The elements of reconciliation are there,' Khalilzad said."

Lawmakers See Domestic Political Opportunity In Zarqawi's Death. Newsweek (6/19, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that lawmakers "saw a domestic political opening in Zarqawi's death, and unlike Bush they didn't waste much time trying to find just the right words to express their feelings." Democrats were sure to lace their comments about Zarqawi with praise for the soldiers who killed him -- and reluctant credit for Bush. But Republicans don't intend to let the triumphant moment pass without using it to their advantage."

Extent Of Benefit From Zarqawi's Death Questioned. U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Whitelaw) reports that the airstrike that killed Zarqawi was "the culmination of one of the longest, most intense manhunts ever conducted by the US military. … Working under U.S. Special Forces Command, hundreds of operatives and analysts from the nation's most elite military and intelligence units…worked around the clock to find Zarqawi." However, US News notes that the "level of effort that went into tracking down Zarqawi… belies the extent of the benefit that may result from his death." Zarqawi "was responsible for some of the most horrific attacks in Iraq since the US invasion," but "his followers were only a small part of the predominantly indigenous insurgency that has been impeding the US effort to rebuild Iraq."

Newsweek (6/19, Thomas, Nordland) reports in its cover story that Zarqawi's death "may turn out to be a turning point in the long, frustrating war on terror. … But no one expects the Iraqi insurgency to miraculously vanish, or even significantly abate, in the weeks ahead. If anything, Zarqawi's martyrdom may cause a new surge of killing."

Zarqawi Briefly Survived Bombing. Newsweek (6/19, Thomas, Nordland) reports in its cover story that when US and Iraqi troops located Zarqawi after the safe house in which he was hiding was bombed, "Zarqawi was still alive." He "was still breathing, barely, and muttering prayers."

Time (6/19, MacLeod, Powell) reports in its cover package, "A special-ops exploitation team trained to glean intelligence from raids arrived with photos, fingerprint smudges and descriptions of the scars and tattoos on his body, much of which had been supplied by Jordanian intelligence. As the team began examining him, according to Caldwell, al-Zarqawi muttered something and tried to 'turn away off the stretcher.' He was quickly 'resecured' and died of his wounds shortly thereafter."

Zarqawi Said To Have Created "New Type Of Terrorist." As part of its cover package, Time (6/19, Ghosh) reports that Zarqawi "had not only rewritten the history of the insurgency in Iraq but also bequeathed to the world a deadly new type of terrorist. While Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri issued impotent threats from their hideouts, al-Zarqawi got his hands bloody in Iraq, turning it into the holy war's primary battlefield. … As the insurgency unfolded, al-Zarqawi articulated and then acted upon an ideology more forbidding and toxic than even bin Laden may have imagined."

Zarqawi Autopsy Results Withheld. The AP (6/11, Quinn) reports the completion of the autopsy on

DOJ_NMG_0032852

Zarqawi; however, it notes that "officials were awaiting the results of a DNA test" before releasing the autopsy results. The article notes the initial confusion about how long Zarqawi lived after the airstrike and the uncorroborated claim by a local named "Mohammad" that "he saw U.S. soldiers after the airstrike beating an injured man who resembled the dead terrorist leader until blood flowed from his nose." It quotes Gen. George Casey as calling the allegation "ludicrous." The New York Times (6/12, Oppel, 1.19M) quotes Gen. Casey, this time calling it "baloney." It also cites a second Arab witness who spoke to Al Jazeera and "suggested that American soldiers tore open [Zarqawi's] clothing in what appeared an effort to revive him."

Asked on Fox News Sunday (6/11, Wallace) about an Iraqi man's claim that he saw Zarqawi being beaten before he died, Casey said, "That's baloney, and we've already gone back, looked at it. Our soldiers who came on the scene found him being put in an ambulance by Iraqi police. They took him off, rendered first aid, and he expired. And so he died while American soldiers were attempting to save his life."

Iran Says It Welcomes Zarqawi's Death. Another AP article (6/12, Quinn) reports, "Iran denied it had helped American forces to find Zarqawi. The Islamic republic welcomed his death, though, because it has close ties to the Shi'ite parties now dominating Iraq's government, which Zarqawi had sought to topple." It quotes Maj. Gen. William Caldwell as saying that the US government though the questions about Zarqawi's death urgent enough that "that we grabbed two people in the last 48 hours and told them pack up and move to Iraq."

Iraqi Official Describes Breakthrough Leading To Airstrike. USA Today (6/12, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "The airstrike that killed al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was made possible by a breakthrough in penetrating his secretive group, Iraq's national security adviser said Sunday. A shakedown of the organization continues, he said." Mouwafak al-Rubaie called killing Zarqawi a "paradigm shift" in the Iraq war and "said credit for the operation goes to Iraq's intelligence service and information-sharing between U.S. and Iraqi forces."

Antiterror Forces Will Tackle Zarqawi's Global Web Next. The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Peterson, 61K) reports in a positively toned piece that the "treasure trove" found in the ruins of Zarqawi's safe house will enable authorities to reach as far as Europe: "the information could potentially be in league with that gleaned from the fall of Kabul in 2001 or the capture of Al Qaeda operational mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed in Pakistan in 2003, experts say." It quotes a Singaporean expert as saying, "Zarqawi had penetrated at least 20 European countries, Canada, ... and even established cells in Southeast Asia."

Bremer Says US Should Use "Whatever Force Necessary" To Capitalize On Zarqawi's Death. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Chen, 7.66M) reported, "With the momentum created by Zarqawi's death some question whether the time is right to stamp out Iraqi insurgency with more US troops. The former top US diplomat in Baghdad today said US military commanders should have whatever force is necessary to get the job done." Paul Bremer, former Coalition Administrator in Iraq: "Whether that means more or fewer troops or where we deploy the troops, I don't know, but I do believe it's important that that be the outcome."

Administration Strategy Of Personalizing Insurgency Seen As Masking Its Scope. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Corke, 9.87M) reported the Iraqi insurgency was "dealt a severe, though far from lethal, blow with the death of al Qaeda's al-Zarqawi." Roger Cressey, NBC News terrorism analyst: "The Administration tried to personalize the issues in Iraq and with al Qaeda in terms of individuals, making bin Laden, Saddam and Zarqawi the symbol of what we are dealing with, when in fact the real challenge is a movement in terms of al Qaeda and a broader insurgency well beyond what Zarqawi's capability is."

Al Qaeda In Iraq Vows To Continue. The CBS Evening News (6/11, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Four days after US forces killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi there are new threats this evening from those loyal to the terrorist leader. While those threats include more violence, US military officials insist the insurgency is 'hurting.'" CBS (Palmer) added, "Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's organization promised 'more earth-shattering operations that would convulse the enemy and rob him of his sleep.'"

NBC Nightly News (6/11, lead story, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "A new warning from al Qaeda in Iraq tonight: The terror group released a statement on the Internet declaring its allegiance to Osama bin Laden and threatening more attacks. Despite the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al Qaeda claimed his death would not stop their operations." NBC (Maceda) added, "Four days after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death, more drive-by shootings, roadside and car bombs, the violence perhaps lacking Zarqawi's hallmark brutality, but at least another 30 Iraqis were killed today. Meanwhile, two US military forensic specialists in lethal blast wounds completed an autopsy on Zarqawi. Results are expected to be made public here tomorrow. This evening, an alleged member of the al Qaeda network called into to Al-Jazeera TV to confirm that so far a successor to Zarqawi has yet to be named. But there was a vow of more major attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0032853

The Washington Post (6/12, Partlow, 744K) reports, "Al-Qaeda in Iraq reiterated its faith in Osama bin Laden on Sunday and vowed to carry out attacks that would "shake the earth underneath the enemy.'" The article notes Gen. George Casey's view that the Zarqawi group was "hurt badly" by its leader's death, but it reports, "Four car bombs exploded in Baghdad over a four-hour period in a fiery reminder of the insurgents' capabilities." It also states, "Some terrorism experts had predicted an upsurge in retaliatory killing by members of al-Qaeda in Iraq after Zarqawi's assassination."

Kristol Says Retreat From Iraq Would Give Zarqawi Posthumous Victory. In his Weekly Standard column (6/19), William Kristol asks, "what are the implications for the war in Iraq" of the killing of Abu Musab al Zarqawi? That "depends on some factors that we can't yet know with any confidence -- the resilience of al Qaeda's leadership in Iraq, for one thing, and the true sentiment among the Sunnis of Iraq. But it also depends on what we do. Do we take advantage of this opportunity politically and militarily? Do we pursue the enemy aggressively now when it may be rattled and divided? Or do we do look on this as an excuse to begin to get out--as John Kerry and many others are already advocating? If we do the latter, we will give Zarqawi a victory in death that he could not achieve in life." What "needs to be done now seems clear: a renewed offensive to wipe out what remains of Zarqawi's organization and to defeat the insurgency."

Media Said To Largely Ignore Zarqawi's Pre-2003 Operations In Baathist Iraq. In the Weekly Standard (6/19), Stephen Hayes says, "Many news stories" about Zarqawi's death "simply left out the fact that Zarqawi and his associates were operating openly in Baathist Iraq for months before the U.S. invasion in March 2003. Others went further. Associated Press writer Patrick Quinn suggested that Bush administration claims that Zarqawi was a link between Iraq and al Qaeda were deceptive. 'The myth-building around al Zarqawi began even before the war started in March 2003,' he wrote. 'A month earlier, then-Secretary of State Colin Powell told the U.N. Security Council that al Zarqawi's presence in Iraq was proof of Saddam Hussein's links to al Qaeda. That claim was later debunked by U.S. intelligence officials.'" Hayes adds, "That's wrong. Not only was the claim never 'debunked,' it was confirmed by the Senate Intelligence Committee's July 2004 review of pre-Iraq war intelligence."

Defense Lawyers Defend Haditha Marines' Actions. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 3, 1:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "For the first time, a sergeant in charge on the ground in Haditha that day is revealing his version of the events. Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich's attorney, in an interview with the Washington Post, said Marines did follow the rules of engagement and he says the civilian deaths were the result of a house-to-house hunt that went tragically wrong and not a vengeful massacre." Attorney Neal A. Puckett,: "I can tell you that the method by which they cleared the houses, the first two houses that they went inside, were according to their training. Basically, the houses had been declared a hostile environment, and in a hostile environment, you assume that the bad guys are inside, and you're allowed to protect yourself by any means necessary. They felt that bad guys were on the other side of the door. They bust the door down, throw a grenade inside, and then go in shooting. And that's what happened in two rooms, one in each of two houses, and unfortunately, it resulted in civilian deaths."

The Los Angeles Times (6/11, Perry, 958K) reports that the Haditha suspects' attorneys "said Sunday their clients did nothing wrong and were only following the military's rules on how to combat armed insurgents hiding inside of homes." The attorneys say both that their clients upheld rules of engagement and that perhaps the rules are questionable for the intense situation the Marines encountered: "'I believe the real question is not whether the conduct of these young guys was appropriate,' said Gary Myers ..., 'but rather if those who established the rules of engagement acted appropriately in defining those rules.'" The article, though quotes locals who dispute that version: "Iraqis in Haditha insist the Marines were screaming in anger when they stormed the houses and that they gunned down children, women and an elderly man in a wheelchair, knowing that they posed no threat." It also reports, "Pictures of the dead bodies taken by a Marine intelligence unit have convinced investigators that the Iraqis were shot at close-range, some 'execution style.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032854

Anbar, Haditha Challenges To Marines Described. The Washington Times (6/12, Scarborough, 90K) reports on the difficulties and dangers of patrolling Anbar province. In a piece favoring the Marines' perspective, it states, "Anbar's Sunni Muslim residents mostly have been hospitable to these bands of jihadis led by Abu Musab Zarqawi, who was killed Wednesday in a U.S. air strike in Diyala province. The locals provided the terrorists with a garage or spare bedroom to hide and make their bombs, and to lay in wait for patrolling Marines." It also contends that Marines in Anbar have to fight an enemy willing to kill its own children in order to kill Americans. The Times reports "strict rules of engagement" controlling the Marines and quotes an officer who says, "Marines today have to fill out more paperwork and statements after they use force than cops on the streets of Philadelphia."

In Wake Of Haditha Killings, Military Implements Ethics, Values Training. U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Mulrine) reports that "any allegations of US military misconduct -- most notably the reported execution-style killing of 24 civilians at Haditha by several marines -- set back efforts to win the confidence of ordinary Iraqis." US News adds that the US military, which is implementing "a remedial program of ethics and values training" is trying to turn Haditha "into a teachable moment." American trainers at the Iraqi Center for Military Values, Principles, and Leadership "are preparing to launch a new academy to instruct Iraqi officers in leadership. A list of principles, posted for the benefit of the Iraqi officers who will be attending the institute starting next month, hangs on the wall."

House Will Debate Iraq. Roll Call (6/12, Pershing) reports, "The House will gear up this week for what could be one of its most significant debates in several years, as the chamber spends much of Thursday considering a Republican-crafted resolution on Iraq." Observers say that the resolution will seek to tie Iraq and the war on terror: "The resolution's language linking the two issues makes it likely that many Democrats will vote against it, though some may be hesitant to vote against any measure that calls for supporting the troops."

Reid Seeks More Intelligence Oversight On Iran Policy. The AP (6/11, Ritter) reports, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid made a pitch Saturday to enlist bloggers as a Democratic force in upcoming elections, and said he'll ask Congress for stiffer reporting requirements for the president and the intelligence community." It describes his planned bill: "Reid's proposed bill, called the Iran Intelligence Oversight Act, would require an updated national intelligence estimate on Iran, with an unclassified summary made public. It also would require the president to report to Congress his objectives and strategies for Iran. The administration's national intelligence director would have to show Congress that he has a process in place for reviewing administration officials' statements and ensuring they are consistent with the work of professional intelligence analysts."

Iraqi Government Releases Second Batch Of Prisoners From Abu Ghraib. The CBS Evening News (6/11, lead story, 2:50, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "The second batch of prisoners to be released in a week boarded buses at infamous Abu Ghraib jail bound for home. For many this is their first taste of freedom in months. For some years. Most of these men are Sunnis, arrested on suspicion of involvement in the insurgency but never charged. Their release is a peace offering by Iraq's government anxious to win the support of hard-line Sunnis." USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) and the AP (6/11, Gamel) also report the story.

Krugman Defends Democrats Who Opposed Iraq War. In the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M), Paul Krugman disputes the existence of much-derided "Some Democrats," who he argues are unjustly attacked by Republicans and pundits as "anti-American" and "weak on national security." Krugman argues that actual Democrats who made allegedly inflammatory statements cannot be found and that in any case the critics of the Iraq war were right: "They're ... misrepresenting the views and motives of those who had the good sense and courage to oppose this war."

Karzai Says Tribesmen Will Be Recruited To Fight Taliban. USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) reports, "Afghan President Hamid Karzai said Sunday that his government will recruit local tribesmen to fight the biggest increase in Taliban violence in years. 'We just want to strengthen the districts to safeguard them from terrorist attack,' Karzai said." Karim Rahimi, Karzai's spokesman, "said the plan will not fuel factional fighting because the recruits will be 'community police' loyal to the government."

DOJ_NMG_0032855

The Washington Post (6/12, A15, Shah, 744K) reports Karzai said, "We just want to strengthen the districts to safeguard them from terrorist attack." The Post adds, "Western diplomats briefed on the plan expressed concern that the effort could fuel factional fighting by arming forces loyal to warlords with long histories of factional disputes. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic."

UK Soldier Killed In Afghanistan As Taliban Resurgence Continues. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 3, 1:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "In Afghanistan a British soldier was killed today as a Taliban offense in the south refocuses attention on that war. More than 500 people, mostly militants, died over three weeks since mid-May in the worst fighting since the Taliban's fall in 2001. US forces launched 750 air strikes last month. That's a big jump since last year. Not long ago the US thought it had the Taliban on the ropes, what's going on?" CBS (van Dyke) added, "What happened is the United States started to focus on Iraq instead of Afghanistan. We went in with 30,000 soldiers after 9/11 and went primarily to hunt for al-Qaeda, to a lesser degree the Taliban. After that the US and its allies and Japan began to put billions of dollars into Afghanistan. The trouble is there's a lot of corruption, security became an issue and the Taliban watched from the side. They never changed their ideology and have started to come back." NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 8, 0:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) also reported on the violence in Afghanistan.

Humvee Armor Linked to Rollovers. The AP (6/12) reports, "Thousands of pounds of armor added to military Humvees in Iraq have made the vehicles more likely to roll over and kill or injure soldiers, a newspaper reported. 'I believe the up-armoring has caused more deaths than it has saved,' Scott Badenoch, a former Delphi Corp. vehicle dynamics expert, told the Dayton Daily News for its Sunday editions." The Dayton Daily News stated that the M1114 was the most dangerous Humvee: "An analysis of the Army's ground-accident database, which includes records from March 2003 through November 2005, found that 60 of the 85 soldiers who died in Humvee accidents in Iraq -- or about 70 percent -- were killed when the vehicle rolled, the newspaper said."

Author Decries Demonstrators Outside Military Hospitals, Funerals. In a New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) op-ed, author Karen Spears Zacharias asks antiwar demonstrators to show mourners "some respect." She pleads, "March to the steps of Congress and the White House. Shout your protests at the president who drummed up this war. But grant some peace to the men and women trying to heal in our military hospitals, and the families grieving at funerals and memorials. Haven't we earned a moment of silence?"

Critics Say Military Incentives For Immigrant Enlistment Are Exploitative. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 7, 2:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "'How far is too far when it comes to military recruiting? With US forces stretched thin around the globe, critics say immigrants are being exploited by tempting offers of citizenship." NBC (Mullen) added, "Fernandos Juarez Del Salar never supported the war in Iraq, but he was proud when his son, Jesus, joined the Marines. After all, the recruiters promised money for college, a bright future for his son, and citizenship for family." But when Corporal Suarez "was killed in Iraq in 2003, his father became active against recruiting in the Latino community." Juarez Del Salar: "I believe the recruiting system in United States is very strong against the immigrant community." Mullen: "Of the more than 2400 US casualties in Iraq since 2003, 270 have been Latino. Staff Sergeant Rodrigo Lopez, a US Army recruiter, works the schools in South Central Los Angeles, armed with new benefits." Staff Sergeant Rodrigo Lopez, US Army recruiter: "A lot of non-citizen, green card-holding applicants have actually asked about the expedited citizenship process." Mullen: "An executive order issued by the White House allows non-citizens serving in the US military to apply for citizenship after only one day of active duty. Hispanics make up 13% of all new recruits. In the last four years, nearly 24,000 active duty soldiers were made US citizens."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Returns To Hunton & Williams. The Washington Post (6/12, D04) reports, "Hunton & Williams LLP said Wendell L. Taylor rejoined the firm's D.C. office as a partner in the global competition practice group after a stint at the Justice Department." The Post continues, "Since leaving the firm in 2004, Taylor had served as counsel to the deputy attorney general -- with responsibilities including the antitrust division, the tax division and the civil division -- and then handled criminal trials as special assistant U.S. attorney in the District, the firm said."

DOJ_NMG_0032856

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Democrats Defend Indicted Law Firm. Four House Democrats last week released a statement condemning last month's indictment of the securities class action law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman. The New York Times (6/12, Creswell, 1.19M) reports that the statement, signed by Reps. Charles Rangel, Carolyn McCarthy, Gary Ackerman and Robert Wexler, says, "The Justice Department's crusade against trial lawyers, the first line in the average citizen's protection against corporate greed, has taken a new low in the indictment of an entire leading law firm in the plaintiffs' bar."

Former Milberg Weiss Partners Seek Capital, Unpaid Fees. The New York Law Journal (6/12, Lin) reports, "As the legal community ponders whether the criminal indictment of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman will eventually lead to that firm's dissolution, two of its former partners are arguing that the firm actually dissolved two years ago at the time of its bi-coastal split. They claim they are now owed millions of dollars in returned capital and unpaid fees as a result." The Journal continues, "If the timing of the claims is awkward, the identity of the ex-partners making them is more so. They are Alan Schulman and Robert P. Sugarman, both of whom have been widely reported to be key cooperating witnesses in the prosecution's case against the firm over the alleged payment of kickbacks to class action plaintiffs." The Journal adds, "It is unclear if and how the two matters will proceed together. The lawyers representing the two sides in the monetary dispute both said Friday they were not aware of their clients' strategies in the criminal case. But one source close to the investigation said the ex-partners' claims showed they had a strong financial interest in 'bringing the whole firm down.' … The survival of the firm has indeed been called into question by the indictment last month of the firm and individual partners David J. Bershad and Steven G. Schulman, who is not related to Alan Schulman. Several lawyers and clients have left the firm since the announcement of criminal charges, increasing parallels with accounting firm Arthur Andersen, which was obliterated by defections months before its trial on criminal charges relating to work it performed for Enron Corp. .. Both Alan Schulman and Sugarman have been cooperating with federal prosecutors in Los Angeles for some time, said the source close to the investigation. The two partners first raised the money issue with the firm in February 2005."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Top Lewis Aide Received $2 Million Buyout From Former Lobbying Firm. Roll Call (6/12, Kane, Bresnahan) reports Jeff Shockey, a top aide to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), "received almost $2 million last year in a buyout package from his old lobbying firm, which specializes in placing earmarks in annual spending bills and is now under federal investigation." Shockey's attorneys "said his buyout from the firm, now known as Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White, met all ethical and legal guidelines applicable to House staffers. They added that Shockey's current position on the Appropriations Committee staff does not directly involve him in the approval of earmarks for any Members, or for his former clients." The attorneys "revealed the new buyout figures — more than triple the total previously disclosed to the media — in a conference call with reporters Friday morning, releasing the 2005 personal financial disclosure form for Shockey several days before it was required."

Novak Says Hastert's Reaction To FBI Raid Upset Many GOP Constituents. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (6/12) writes that FL5 Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R) "last Thursday introduced a resolution repudiating the stand of her leader, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. It avows that a 'Congressional office may be subject to searches and seizures' in an 'ongoing criminal investigation' of a House member." Over the Memorial Day recess, voters in Brown-Waite's district, "she told me, 'were irate' over Hastert's criticism of the FBI raiding" LA2 Rep. William Jefferson's (D) offices. Brown-Waite "found fellow Republican House members also had been 'read the riot act' by constituents. … Nobody escapes from this episode untarnished, including" President Bush's "decision to seal for 45 days the evidence obtained from Jefferson's office under court approval." Heading "into the weekend, Brown-Waite had collected 20 Republican co-sponsors…and had not yet circulated it among Democrats." Novak notes, "When I asked for the Speaker's view of the Brown-Waite amendment…a spokesman said: 'We agree with it, and believe it should be done in a constitutional way. We are working on that process.' If Hastert had said that a week earlier, he would have saved himself and his party from more embarrassment in a difficult period."

DOJ_NMG_0032857

Prosecutor's Silence In Duke Rape Case Raises Questions. The New York Times (6/12, Wilson, Glater) reports, "When a woman hired to dance at a Duke University lacrosse team party claimed that members of the team raped her, Michael B. Nifong, the district attorney for Durham County, responded with an aggressive, unflinching and very public investigation. … 'There's no doubt in my mind that she was raped and assaulted at this location,' Mr. Nifong said on national television after the case surfaced in March. Mr. Nifong called other lacrosse players 'hooligans' who had aided, abetted or covered up for the rapists. Local police officers seemed equally certain that they had a horrific crime to solve. … But in the intervening months, the case has come to appear far less robust. Three players have been indicted, but evidence that has surfaced, much of it turned over to defense lawyers by prosecutors and then filed in court with defense motions, has thrown the woman's claims into doubt. Mr. Nifong, so vocal at first, has refused to speak publicly about the case since the beginning of April." The Times adds, "The result is a growing perception of a case in trouble. Increasingly, the onus is on the district attorney. People in Durham are asking what Mr. Nifong is up to, whether his prosecution was influenced by politics — he was in the midst of a campaign when the case began — and what other evidence he might have. … Mr. Nifong's silence makes it impossible to evaluate the case as a whole. Certainly some evidence has not been revealed — the next hearing is set for June 22 — and the defense has released evidence selectively, presumably showing only those parts that strengthen its public position."

Suspect In Clemson Rape-Murder Confesses To More Sex Crimes. The Washington Times (6/12, Price) reports, "The suspect charged in the May 26 kidnapping, rape and murder of a 20-year-old Clemson University student has also confessed to committing two other sex crimes at about that time, and like most sex offenders, he has a long criminal history involving sex abuse." The Times continues, "DNA has linked Jerry Buck Inman, 35 -- described as a 'serial sexual predator' by South Carolina authorities -- to the abduction, rape and strangling of Tiffany Souers, a junior at Clemson." The Times adds, "Based on confessions Inman reportedly made after his arrest, the district attorney of Sevier County, Tenn., is also seeking charges of aggravated rape and aggravated burglary against him in a May 22 assault there. Inman also has been charged with burglary and attempted rape in a May 23 incident in Rainsville, Ala. … More than 5 percent of convicted sex offenders are rearrested for another sex crime within three years of their release from prison, according to a comprehensive study by the U.S. Department of Justice's Bureau of Justice Statistics. That makes them four times more likely than people who are not sex offenders to be arrested for sex crimes after their prison discharge. … What's more, the federal research showed that of the released sex offenders who commit another sex crime, 40 percent perpetrate the new offense within a year of their release. … The Justice Department (DOJ) study found that sex offenders with the highest rate of committing another sex crime were those who had a history of prior arrests for various offenses. Inman also meets that qualification."

Two Elderly California Women Suspected In Insurance Fraud Scheme. The New York Times (6/12, Chang) reports, "Dwight Emile says his neighbor Olga Rutterschmidt always had a thing for get-rich-quick schemes. … 'She'd say, "Dwight, do you want to make some extra money?"' said Mr. Emile, a music producer and songwriter who lives in Hollywood. 'I'd say, "No, if it's not legal."' … Mr. Emile said he would invite Ms. Rutterschmidt into his apartment to play Debussy and Mozart on his keyboards, but he said he had nagging suspicions about her. … 'I always used to say to her that one day I'd see her on the 11 o'clock news,' Mr. Emile said. … Now he has." The Times adds, "Ms. Rutterschmidt, 73, and another woman, Helen Golay, 75, pleaded not guilty last week to federal charges of mail fraud and submitting false insurance applications. According to the authorities, the two women extended helping hands to two homeless men, getting them off the streets and putting them up in apartments, while at the same time plotting their deaths. … Posing as aunts, fiancées or cousins, they took out numerous life insurance policies on the men, Paul Vados and Kenneth McDavid, with themselves as the beneficiaries, collecting over $2.2 million after the men died in separate hit-and-run traffic cases, the authorities said. … The women have not been charged in the deaths, but the police said they were the main suspects. Ms. Rutterschmidt, who is from Hungary, met Mr. Vados, also born in Hungary, at a local Hungarian church, the authorities said."

DOJ_NMG_0032858

Former Fumo Aide Resigns From Charity Under FBI, IRS Scrutiny. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/10, Shiffman, 423K) reported, "The executive director of the charity at the center of the FBI and IRS investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo…has stepped down from her post. Ruth Arnao, who also worked for Fumo's Senate staff from 1984 to 2004, helped the senator form Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods…in 1991." The Inquirer notes, "The new, interim executive director is Christian A. DiCicco, a Philadelphia lawyer who serves on the SEPTA board and is a longtime Citizens Alliance board member. Christian DiCicco's father is Philadelphia City Councilman Frank DiCicco." The Philadelphia Daily News (6/11, Davies) added, "Arnao is being investigated for possible obstruction of justice in connection with the deletion of e-mails from Citizens Alliance computers which were sought by the FBI. State Senate aides Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister were charged 10 days ago with destroying e-mails and other electronic evidence in order to hide them from the FBI." The AP (6/11) also reported on Arnao's resignation.

29 Indicted In FBI Probe Of Connecticut Garbage Hauling Industry. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/10, Apuzzo) reported, "A reputed mob boss, a former mayor and the owner of a trash-hauling business were among 29 people charged Friday in a federal investigation into the mob's influence over the region's trash-hauling industry. The indictment alleges that companies owned by James Galante paid a 'mob tax' to Matthew Ianniello, the reputed boss of the Genovese crime family. The payments were part of a scheme in which trash haulers carved out routes and agreed not to steal each other's customers, according to the indictment. … 'Organized crime's stranglehold on the citizens of Connecticut through its control of the trash industry has been broken,' said Kimberly Mertz, the state's top FBI agent." The AP noted, "Ianniello, known as 'Matty the Horse,' was released on $1 million bond and sent home, where he was under house arrest in an unrelated case." Joseph Santopietro "was released on $200,000 bond," and "Galante was held without bond." The Connecticut Post (6/10, Mayko) added, "The federal investigation also ensnared law enforcement officers, including a federal drug agent and a state trooper who once ran Danny's Drive-In in Stratford and was recently selected to star in a TV pilot. … The probe also uncovered fraud in the operation of the Danbury Trashers, the team that nearly captured the United Hockey League title this year."

The New York Daily News (6/11, Connor, 729K) reported, "He might be 85 years old, but the mob apparently hasn't put Matty the Horse out to pasture yet." On Friday, Ianello "was indicted in Connecticut…for collecting half a million dollars in 'tributes' from a corrupt trash hauler, prosecutors said. … But if the old-time wiseguy is feeling the heat, he didn't show it as he was sent home on $1 million bond following a hearing in New Haven. 'What can I say, right? Nothing,' Ianniello said, smiling broadly and shaking hands with marshals and FBI agents at the courthouse." The Danbury News-Times (6/10, Gold) noted, "The federal government now runs Automated Waste Disposal. As the government froze the bank records and assets of James Galante's Danbury garbage company, U.S. Marshals spent Friday figuring out how many companies they need to hire to run different parts of AWD and several of Galante's other trash firms." The Danbury Times (6/10) also lists all 29 defendants and the charges against them.

Pellicano Assails FBI Probe, Vows Never To "Rat Out" Clients. The Los Angeles Times (6/11, Philips, 958K) reported, "In his first interview in three years, jailed private eye Anthony Pellicano accused federal authorities of exaggerating the strength of their case against him, which he predicted would soon fizzle out like a box-office flop. Speaking by telephone from the federal Metropolitan Detention Center in Los Angeles one morning last week, a defiant Pellicano insisted that he would never cooperate with authorities or testify against a bevy of A-list lawyers, Hollywood executives, business moguls and celebrities who have hired him over the years to dig up dirt on their adversaries." Pellicano declared, "You're not going to see me take the stand against the clients and employees and other people that are going to be testifying against me. I didn't rat them out. … I am never going to besmirch a client or any other person that I gave my trust to or who gave their trust to me." Pellicano added, "The federal government has purposely tried to make this thing larger than life — like a Hollywood movie. To me, these are the acts of overzealous FBI agents and prosecutors who have never really accomplished anything in their careers. They are trying to use my name and reputation to build something better for themselves."

DOJ_NMG_0032859

The AP (6/11) reported, "He also said it was ironic that the federal government is accusing him of wiretapping at a time when it is under fire for authorizing the National Security Agency to monitor Americans' telephone calls without court warrants in search of terrorist connections. 'If the American public had any idea of all the surveillance, wiretapping and illegal things that our own government actually does, they would be shocked,' Pellicano said. 'Chasing terrorists is what the FBI is supposed to be doing. I've got to tell you, if instead of keeping me behind bars here, they gave me the job of finding Osama bin Laden, I guarantee you I would find him.'"

Arizona AG To Seek Federal Task Force In Jeffs Case. The Salt Lake Tribune (6/12, Adams) reports, "Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard will make a pitch today to FBI officials for a federal task force to oversee the hunt for fugitive polygamous leader Warren S. Jeffs, saying the effort so far has 'not been optimal.' Goddard specifically criticized 'local law enforcement' for a lack of coordination and failure to pass along information in a timely manner to federal authorities. … But Goddard is getting no backing from Utah officials in his call for a federal task force. Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff has said coordination with FBI here is 'excellent.'" In DC "to discuss with the Department of Justice gas prices and possible antitrust violations by oil companies," Goddard is "scheduled the stop at the FBI, where he'll meet with a deputy director and an investigations chief." He "said a 'spotty' relationship with FBI staff in Arizona has impeded progress, though that may improve since a new person has assumed the special agent-in-charge post." The Tribune notes, "FBI Director Robert Mueller discussed his agency's ramped up effort to find Jeffs during a visit to Utah last week. 'Always in a situation like this, it takes time,' Mueller said. 'My expectation is, we will catch him.'"

The Deseret Morning News (6/10, Winslow) reported that in an interview with the paper on Friday, "Goddard criticized the FBI for not using state and local investigators enough in the manhunt for the polygamist leader. … 'They're not being taken sufficient advantage of.' … 'I've seen too many examples where the lack of coordination has been a benefit to Mr. Jeffs and his efforts to stay on the lam,' he said." However, "The Utah Attorney General's Office said it has had 'tremendous' communication with the FBI's Salt Lake City office," and "others say it appears the FBI has taken a heightened interest in Jeffs since the polygamist leader was added to the agency's Ten Most Wanted list last month. FBI Director Robert Mueller was in Salt Lake City Wednesday and was briefed on the manhunt efforts."

Utah, Arizona Authorities Belief Jeffs Recently Performed More Child Marriages. The Deseret Morning News (6/10, Winslow) also reported, "Authorities believe…Jeffs has recently been in the polygamous border town of Colorado City, Ariz., performing more child-bride marriages. 'I've heard from a number of different sources who said he's been here,' Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard told the Deseret Morning News Friday. 'They said he's performed marriages, and (they) pointed out a mobile home they said was the wedding chapel.' Some living in the polygamous border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City said they have also heard that Jeffs has been there within the past 1 1/2 months. The Utah Attorney General's Office said it has heard from credible sources that Jeffs continues to exercise his religious authority."

USAT Warns That Rising Prison Problems Affect Society. USA Today (6/12) editorializes, "It's difficult for most people to muster any sympathy for the 2.2 million people serving time in the nation's overcrowded prisons and jails, half of them for violent crimes. … Sexual assaults, gang violence, lack of rehabilitation and shoddy medical care are shrugged off as givens, or even deserved. Comedians joke about what'll happen to former Enron CEO Ken Lay once he's behind bars. Most people feel that what goes on in prisons doesn't affect them. … That attitude couldn't be more wrong." USA continues, "What happens in prisons returns to the community with a vengeance. Over the course of a year, 13.5 million people spend time in jails or prisons, and 95% of them are eventually released back into society. Many return as more hardened felons eager to commit new crimes and responsible for spreading infectious diseases — such as HIV, hepatitis and tuberculosis — that went untreated while they were incarcerated." USA notes, "A report released Thursday by the independent blue ribbon Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons, established by the non-profit Vera Institute of Justice in New York, is a scathing indictment of the nation's correctional system. … Congress and states passed get-tough-on-crime laws without providing funding and resources to allow prisons to cope with new inmates, the report says. As a result, too many prisons and jails are unsafe, unhealthy or inhumane, and their failures spill over into the community."

DOJ_NMG_0032860

Corrections Official Responds. In an op-ed in USA Today (6/12), James A. Gondles Jr., the executive director of the American Correctional Association, writes, "USA TODAY ought to be thanking the 750,000 dedicated professional men and women who work in our correctional systems for maintaining public safety. It is big news when a riot, an escape, an injury or death occurs within a facility — because it rarely happens." Gondles continues, "Inmates are the only group of Americans with the constitutional right to adequate health care, while more than 45 million Americans have no health insurance. … Correctional facilities have more oversight than nearly any other governmental agency. Our 'watchers' include the U.S. Department of Justice Civil Rights Division, federal and state courts, the American Civil Liberties Union, fire marshals, health inspectors, ombudsmen, inspector generals, and thousands of U.S. citizens serving as volunteers. There is little doubt we are the most transparent system in the world. Many nations never open their correctional systems to any visitor." Gondles adds, "For more than 40 years, the American Correctional Association has maintained standards and accreditation of our jails and prisons. The Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons even urged all facilities to become ACA-accredited. Countries worldwide look to our standards as a benchmark of professionally administered systems. … Can we do more? Of course we can, but we need county, state and federal governments to step up to the plate and fund treatment, education, job skills training for inmates and adequate pay for our workers. Public health has let this nation down. The 350,000-plus inmates with serious mental illness were that way when they entered our systems. Corrections cannot be blamed for a lack of treatment. Inmates are our brothers and sisters and our sons and daughters, and nearly every one of them will return to our communities. We need to treat their diseases, mental and physical, to help them turn the corner on living a productive, positive life."

Prison Rehab Program Ruling Raises Questions About Faith-Based Programs. A federal judge in Iowa ruled on June 2 that an evangelical Christian prison rehabilitation program paid for by tax dollars is unconstitutional. The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Paulson, 61K) calls the decision "a major victory for those who believe America has gone too far in supporting religious or semireligious activities using public money. But given the broad spectrum of faith-based organizations that offer programs tackling social ills from substance dependency to illiteracy, the decision also raises questions over where to draw the line of demarcation when it comes to mixing religion and social services, and whether there's a right way and a wrong way for the government to encourage the involvement of faith-based groups."

CIVIL LAW:

Firms Seek Dismissal Of Thousands Of Asbestos Cases. The Legal Intelligencer (6/12, Duffy) reports, "In a bold and unprecedented move that could drastically alter the nature of asbestos litigation, a coalition of 47 companies last week asked a federal judge to dismiss tens of thousands of pending cases, alleging that the vast majority of them are premised on flawed or fraudulent medical diagnoses." The LI continues, "In the motion, defense lawyers say they are targeting claims that stem from "mass medical screening enterprises' which, they say, have clogged the courts with thousands of bogus asbestos claims." The LI adds, "The motion was filed before U.S. District Judge James T. Giles, who is presiding over a case known as MDL 875, the name for the multidistrict litigation in which all pending federal asbestos claims were consolidated. In the motion, the asbestos defendants are asking Giles to do two things. … First, they want the judge to exclude all expert testimony from six doctors who the companies say either have taken the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination when asked to testify about their methods or have disavowed diagnoses attributed to them. … According to court papers, a federal grand jury in the Southern District of New York is currently looking into asbestos doctors and screening companies. Since the probe began, some of the doctors have begun invoking the Fifth Amendment when asked to testify. The brief says that since 2002, the six doctors have authored more than 140,000 medical reports for asbestos claimants." The LI notes, "The second request is that Giles 'dismiss without prejudice all nonmalignant cases' in MDL 875 "subject to reinstatement upon production by plaintiffs ... of diagnosing documents by a doctor other than the six doctors."

Allen Vows To Filibuster Attempt To Crack Down On 527s. Roll Call (6/12, Newmyer, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) faces a strong challenge on his right if he brings to the floor a lobbying reform package that cracks down on the independent political groups known as 527s. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) plans to send a letter to Frist this week threatening to filibuster the bill if it includes the provision, which was approved by the House but is absent from the Senate version of the lobbying rules overhaul. The letter is so far co-signed by GOP Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.), Tom Coburn (Okla.), Jim DeMint (S.C.), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), John Sununu (N.H.) and David Vitter (La.)."

DOJ_NMG_0032861

Contribution Caps Said To Benefit Challengers. Deborah Goldberg, who directs the Democracy Program at the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law, writes in Roll Call (6/12) that three new studies on campaign contribution limits, "one published in Public Choice, a second forthcoming in Political Research Quarterly, and the third to be published by the Brookings Institution in The Marketplace of Democracy," offer "empirical evidence to quell that familiar but flawed argument" that caps on political contributions are an incumbent-protection device." In their Public Choice article, economists Thomas Stratmann and Francisco Aparicio-Castillo "found that contribution limits appear to help challengers in state Assembly elections. … Two forthcoming studies focusing on gubernatorial elections reached similar conclusions. … These recent statistical analyses of the empirical data comport with common sense."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

WSJournal Says Voting Rights Act Provision Likely Will Be Renewed. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) says "you can be fairly certain that the coming debate over updating the Voting Rights Act will sidestep what's really at stake, which isn't the right to vote but rather the power of politicians to pick their voters through gerrymandering. Unless Republican backbones miraculously stiffen, expect the expiring penalty provisions of the Voting Rights Act to be renewed this year for another quarter-century." Congress "could reassure Americans that the most important provisions of the Voting Rights Act -- the bans on poll taxes and literacy tests and grandfather clauses -- are permanently enshrined in law and thus not in need of renewal. But the political reality is that an embattled GOP Congress has no interest in allowing Democrats to use opposition to something called the Voting Rights Act against Republican candidates in November."

ANTITRUST:

Arcelor Rejects Hostile Bid By Mittal Steel. The Financial Times (6/12, Marsh) reports Luxembourg steelmaker Arcelor has formally rejected a bid for the company made last month by Mittal Steel. Arcelor "reiterated that it planned to go ahead with an agreed merger with Severstal of Russia to form the world's biggest steel producer." The FT says Arcelor's "rejection of the hostile offer from Mittal, controlled by Lakshmi Mittal, will disappoint the Indian steel magnate but is expected to put fierce pressure on him to increase his bid within the next few weeks."

European Shareholder Activists Making Moves On US Firms. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, B1, Lublin) writes, "Here's some bad news for U.S. executives frustrated by American shareholder activists: The Europeans are invading, with plans to stir up more trouble. Big European institutional investors with sizable U.S. portfolios are pursuing quiet diplomacy, lobbying regulators and breaking with home-country tradition by filing shareholder lawsuits," as well as "backing efforts to give shareholders a voice in executive-pay decisions, akin to practices in the United Kingdom and Australia." Wal-Mart is one of the "biggest U.S. companies to feel the foreign heat. Five European institutions were among seven big investors who faulted Wal-Mart directors last month for not appointing a special committee to investigate possible weaknesses in legal and regulatory controls. A core group of four U.S. and British funds first sought creation of the panel in May 2005."

AXA In Talks To Purchase Credit Suisse Unit. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Singer, Taylor) reports, "French insurance giant AXA SA is in exclusive talks to buy Credit Suisse Group's Winterthur insurance unit, a person familiar with the matter said. A potential sale could be valued in excess of 10 billion Swiss francs, or about $8 billion." The Journal continues, "The development comes amid preparations by Credit Suisse to float Winterthur this year and as the Swiss banking giant focuses on its core businesses of corporate and investment banking, retail and private banking, and asset management." The Journal adds, "Last week AXA gained exclusive negotiating rights to purchase Winterthur, a person familiar with the matter said. AXA is unlikely to buy all of Winterthur's operations, as Credit Suisse will likely retain some parts, the person said. … Credit Suisse in 2004 began putting out feelers to U.S. and European banks for potential bids, but there was no serious interest in the 130-year-old business, say people familiar with the matter. Finding buyers for Winterthur was tough because of its size and because insurers were recovering from a patch of poor performance and credit-ratings concerns. Credit Suisse forged ahead with plans for an initial public offering of shares set to take place this year, but didn't rule out a sale."

DOJ_NMG_0032862

Forbes Criticizes Net Neutrality Legislation. Steve Forbes, president and CEO of Forbes, Inc., writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) that in Congress right now, "well-financed lobbyists are pushing for Net Neutrality legislation. According to their benign-sounding definition of Net Neutrality, it simply means that Internet network operators like the phone and cable companies would have to give equal treatment to all traffic on their networks, without giving anybody's content preference in handling. But scratch the surface of what the Net Neutrality crowd is really asking for and Net Neutrality shifts from benign to ominous." Forbes adds, "Passing Network Neutrality legislation would be a re-run of the disastrous Telecom Act of 1996 which forced telecom companies to provide network access to competitors at below market prices. That certainly put a chill on network innovation."

WPost Warns Against Preemptive Government Regulation Of Internet. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/12, A20, 744K) says, "The advocates of neutrality suggest, absurdly, that a non-neutral Internet would resemble cable TV: a medium through which only corporate content is delivered. This analogy misses the fact that the market for Internet connections, unlike that for cable television, is competitive." The Post adds, "It seems unlikely that broadband providers will degrade Web services that people want and far more likely that they will use non-neutrality to charge for upgrading services that depend on fast and reliable delivery, such as streaming high-definition video or relaying data from heart monitors. If this proves wrong, the government should step in. But it should not burden the Internet with preemptive regulation."

WSJournal Says Spectrum Auctions Should Proceed Without Interference. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) says, "The Justice Department settled its spat with money manager Mario Gabelli over cellphone licenses last week, but that's not all, folks. The story behind this story is a government process of auctioning telecom spectrum that invites the kind of political gamesmanship that tripped up Mr. Gabelli. … This policy introduces all manner of inefficiencies." The Journal adds that "policy makers would be better off simply allowing these auctions to proceed without interference. And so would consumers."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Western Governors Say States Need To Take Lead On Global Warming. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Wilson, Nicholas, 958K) reports a "bipartisan group of western governors on Sunday formally acknowledged that greenhouse gases are on the rise and said their states need to take action to reduce global warming while meeting growing energy demand." The Western Governors' Assn. unanimously passed a resolution calling on states and cities to reduce human-caused greenhouse gases, but it contained no specifics on what action should be taken." Though the resolution "was a major step, especially for governors of states with power plants or major coal and oil reserves, its language was carefully nuanced. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had urged his fellow governors just before the vote to take an even stronger stand."

Mercury Fears Add To Tribe's Woes. The Washington Post (6/12, Lydersen) reports, "Tina and Rick Van Zile are members of the Mole Lake Ojibwe tribe here (in Mole Lake) in northern Wisconsin. Each spring for more than 15 years, they have gone spearfishing together, engaging in a tradition for their tribe and gathering food that is vital to their diet. … But in recent years they have added something new to the old ways -- they consult a color-coded map that tells them which of the more than 50 lakes in the region have the highest mercury levels." The Post continues, "According to the Environmental Protection Agency, 22 states including Wisconsin have statewide mercury advisories, and 23 more have advisories for specific bodies of water. Typical advisories warn children and women of childbearing age against eating more than one game fish per month. The mercury in the fish can cause neurological damage in children and fetuses as well as health problems in adults. … Because fishing is so central to the traditions, social life and economic sustenance of many Indian tribes, the warnings have special significance for them. … 'Fishing is a big part of what we eat and how we eat; it ties back to the culture and traditions of who we are as a people,' said Mole Lake tribal leader Wayne LaBine. … He describes mercury as an organ of 'Mother Earth's body' that has been turned into a toxin through exploitation of natural resources such as coal. Mercury is emitted from coal-burning power plants, paper mills and older chlorine plants. … 'Fossil fuels were not intended to be burned like this, so the balance of the Earth is thrown off and mercury is misplaced,' LaBine said."

DOJ_NMG_0032863

NYTimes Says Washington Should Encourage Green Investments By Business. An editorial in the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) notes that Goldman Sachs is among "a growing number of investment and manufacturing enterprises chasing emerging technologies that could help provide the alternative energy sources that politicians from President Bush on down say they want and that the country will certainly need in years to come. Meanwhile, more and more companies — including heavyweights like DuPont, Johnson & Johnson and United Technologies — have been busily cleaning up their own acts, using less energy by making themselves more efficient. Over time, these efforts could place the United States in the forefront of an emerging global market for cleaner technologies. … If Washington is smart, it will throw its weight behind these efforts by providing the necessary incentives, whether as loans, direct grants or targeted tax breaks."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

NJ Man Sentenced To 15 Years For Violent Hijacking Of FBI Employee's Vehicle. The Newark Star-Ledger (6/10, Martin, 420K) reported Jimmy K. White of Elizabeth, N.J., was sentenced on Friday to 188 months "in prison…for carjacking and badly injuring a Good Samaritan who tried to stop him during a mugging in Jersey City last year." White "bit the victim's hand and face as she struggled for control of her sport utility vehicle, then ran over her during his getaway. He was arrested after the FBI lab matched his DNA to samples from bite marks he left on the woman, an employee for the FBI in Newark." The Star-Ledger noted, "The victim drove her Jeep into the parking lot of a Jersey City bagel store on May 15, 2005, and saw White trying to rob a man of his wallet, according to documents filed in the case." The Jersey Journal (6/10, Herman, 27K) added, "As the victim was hospitalized for her injuries, the FBI extracted DNA samples from the wounds on her face and hand and flew them by helicopter to its lab in Quantico, Va. Within four days, they found a match from a database of offenders and arrested White. The victim spent three days in the hospital and then missed four months of work. Because of White's criminal history -- which includes a 1995 sexual assault, a 1997 violent robbery and a number of disorderly persons offenses -- he qualified as a career offender eligible for the stiff prison sentence of 188 months." The AP (6/10) also reported on the sentencing.

In New Orleans, Doctor Pleads Guilty In Prescription Scheme. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/9, Perlstein) reports Dr. Joseph Guenther "pleaded guilty Wednesday to four felony counts of prescribing narcotics without a legitimate medical reason and one count of conspiracy. In his plea…Guenther admitted that he issued hundreds of preprinted prescriptions for an addictive drug cocktail consisting of hydrocodone, Xanax and Soma. … The DEA, aided by the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. attorney's office and local police agencies, confiscated more than $10 million in assets in the case."

Man Facing Meth Charges Also Accused In Hawaii Jewelry Heist. The Honolulu Advertiser (6/11, Boylan) reports the recent armed robbery of a salesman "carrying $2 million in jewelry in the parking lot of a Waipahu restaurant is highly unusual for Hawaii, state and federal law enforcement officials said. … Two men have been charged in connection with the jewelry heist in the parking lot of the Golden Coin restaurant in Waipahu. Bryan T. Higa, 25, was arrested June 1, and Marvin Quemado Jr., 31, was arrested June 5. … Higa was charged in federal court for his alleged role in a methamphetamine smuggling ring. … He is accused of working as a middleman for a narcotics distributor arrested by agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Accused Gang Members Arrested In Illinois On Drug Charges. The Rockford (IL) Register Star (6/11) reports police "arrested two known gang members on multiple drug charges Friday, ending a month-long criminal investigation. Jamie Spates, 30, and Michael Jones, 22, both of Rockford, are each charged with two felony counts of unlawful delivery of crack cocaine and two felony counts of criminal drug conspiracy." The Register Star notes the DEA's involvement in the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0032864

Interim Haitian Prime Minister Claims "Unequaled" Cooperation With DEA. The New York Daily News (6/11, Meek) writes, "Unlike most former Haitian leaders, [Gerard] Latortue left Port-au-Prince last month on two feet and without an armed gang in hot pursuit. The New York Daily News joined Latortue, 71, on Friday as his turbulent, 26-month term as Haiti's leader ended quietly. … Among the accomplishments Latortue cites were firing corrupt customs officers and police and taking steps to help free the civil service of political cronyism. He claimed unequaled cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration on counternarcotics efforts."

MLB Considering Suspending Grimsley For Admission Of Drug Use. According to the Los Angeles Times (6/9, Brown), Major League Baseball "is strongly considering suspending former Arizona pitcher Jason Grimsley for admitting to federal authorities he used performance-enhancing drugs, which would set a precedent for future cases. Grimsley's agent said Thursday the pitcher will retire. MLB would pursue the penalty, however, if only to ensure Grimsley is penalized if he reconsiders retirement."

Grimsley's Amphetamines Claim Not Backed By Players. The Los Angeles Times (6/10, Shaikin) reports, "Although Jason Grimsley told federal agents an equipment salesman distributed amphetamines within the Angels' clubhouse in 1996, three players on that team said Friday they had no recollection of such an individual." An affidavit "included this sentence: 'Grimsley stated that while he was with the California Angels, an individual who sold bats and gloves would come around the clubhouse with a supply of two-toned green amphetamines, or 'greenies.'"

Grimsley Seeks Remainder Of Salary. The Los Angeles Times (6/11, Reports) reports Jason Grimsley "plans to fight the Arizona Diamondbacks' decision to withhold the remainder of his $825,000 salary. … The reliever was given his release Wednesday, a day after federal agents searched Grimsley's home in an investigation into performance-enhancing drugs."

Bonds To Cooperate With Investigator, Drops Lawsuit Against Reporters. The AP (6/11) reports Barry Bonds "wants to cooperate with special investigator George Mitchell, but will only talk to him if he is assured the information won't be given to federal prosecutors. Bonds also dropped his lawsuit against two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who published a book claiming the Giants slugger used steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. … A federal grand jury in San Francisco is now investigating whether Bonds lied under oath about using the performance-enhancing drug known as "the clear" during that grand jury testimony."

In its "NL Notebook," the Washington Post (6/11) reports Bonds "sued…Penguin Group Inc.'s Gotham Books and others, claiming the authors illegally obtained his secret grand jury testimony from a U.S. criminal case against Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or Balco."

Ex-Girlfriend Said To Be Potential Trouble For Bonds In Investigation. The AP (6/10) reports FBI agents "asked Barry Bonds' ex-girlfriend not to cooperate in Major League Baseball's steroid probe while a federal grand jury investigates whether the Giants slugger lied under oath about drug use."

In a separate column for the AP (6/10), Tim Dahlberg writes, "There are few things in life worse than a scorned mistress who talks too much. Barry Bonds knows that better than most. A woman named Kimberly Bell is a big part of the reason he may soon find himself in some serious trouble with the law. … By various accounts, Bell has spilled the beans about both alleged steroid use by Bonds and a reported $80,000 in allegedly undeclared income the slugger gave her to buy a house in Arizona."

Mitchell Seen As Facing Roadblocks In MLB Investigation. In the Arizona Republic (6/10), Joseph A. Reaves writes, "While the federal government ramps up its investigation of baseball's ugly drug mess by playing hardball with the likes of Jason Grimsley, a separate, independent probe led by former Sen. George J. Mitchell is running into serious roadblocks that threaten to undermine any chance of uncovering the scope of the scandal this year. Reluctant witnesses and a hard-line stand by the players' union are seriously hampering Mitchell, who was hired in March by Commissioner Bud Selig to conduct a comprehensive investigation for Major League Baseball."

Current HGH Test Considered Impractical, Unreliable. In USA Today (6/9), Dick Patrick and Bob Nightengale write that Major League Baseball doesn't test for human growth hormone. The International Olympic Committee "brags it has had an HGH test since before the 2004 Olympics, but that is semantics. Yes, there is a blood test for HGH. But because antibodies necessary for the process are in such short supply, virtually no HGH testing is conducted. In addition, the test only detects HGH right after injection so it's impractical for in-competition testing."

DOJ_NMG_0032865

The Washington Post (6/10) reports the NFL does not intend to "implement blood testing of its players for human growth hormone. Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, said that he and other league leaders doubt the reliability of a blood test for growth hormone first used at the 2004 Athens Olympics."

In the New York Times "Week in Review" section (6/11) Ian Austen writes, "The hormone can be uncovered in a blood test, which was introduced on a limited basis by the World Anti-Doping Agency at the 2004 Olympics. But amid concerns about the invasiveness of blood testing, Major League Baseball is financing research at the University of California at Los Angeles to create a urine test."

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 7, 3:10, Mitchell) reported, "Barry Bonds is willing to cooperate with the steroids investigation if the terms are right. Bonds' attorney told the New York Daily News he will talk but only if he is assured his information won't be passed onto Federal prosecutors. You can add human growth hormone to the list of suspect drugs in baseball. Following revelations this week following Arizona Diamondback Jason Grimsley and that's tonight's 'Sunday Cover,' the investigation into HGH and the race to find a foolproof test." HGH is "produced by the pitutary gland to stimulate normal development. Athletes looking for an edge inject HGH to shed fat and increase muscle regeneration." Since it's "undetectable in urine none of the four major American sports leagues test for it." The International Olympic Committee "used a blood test for HGH. But it's not definitive. It also requires frequent testing and few believe American pro players will ever agree to it."

California Wrestling Coach Charged With Steroid Possession. The Los Angeles Times (6/10, Lin) reports, "A Tustin High School wrestling coach has been charged with possession of steroids and counterfeit money, prosecutors said Friday. Tustin Unified School District officials said there were no indications that Ramon Hernandez Serrano distributed the muscle-building drugs to students. He has been placed on administrative leave."

IMMIGRATION:

EU-Style Passport-Free Zone Seen Alternative For US-Canadian Border. In a New York Times op-ed (6/12), Stephen Handelman says "the most high-profile solution" to the security problem on the US-Canadian border "would complicate the lives of millions of Canadians and Americans, and perhaps seriously damage their closely linked economies. That solution comes out of laws passed by Congress in response to 9/11 mandating that next year Americans and Canadians crossing the border by airplane will need passports or other federal government-approved identification to get through United States customs. In 2008 similar requirements will be imposed at the 140 land-border crossings between the United States and Canada." Business owners "in both countries say the added security provided by the jumped-up ID requirements won't compensate for the loss of tourism and consumer revenue." There are "smarter options. Europeans have created a passport-free zone of 13 member states of the European Union along with Norway and Iceland, called the Schengen system. They agreed in 1985 to draw a 'virtual' border around countries that had agreed to harmonize visa rules. The Schengen frontier is policed by the customs authorities of each participating country, but everyone plugs into a shared intelligence database that stays alert to outside threats and tracks suspected felons, drug smugglers and terrorists inside the zone."

Latino Assimilation More Prevalent Than Assumed. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/12, A21), Tyler Cowen, professor of economics at George Mason University and general director of its Mercatus Center, and Daniel M. Rothschild, associate director of the Global Prosperity Initiative at the Mercatus Center, say, "Beneath the surface of the immigration debate is a debate about shared values. If we look at just three of those values -- the English language, family and hard work -- we see a higher level of Latino assimilation than is often presumed."

Border Patrol Group Wants Parole Denied For Killer Of Two Agents. The Washington Times (6/12, Seper, 90K) reports the National Border Patrol Council, "which represents all 10,500 of the U.S. Border Patrol's nonsupervisory agents, has asked the U.S. Parole Board Commission to deny parole to a man convicted in the killing of two Border Patrol agents." Florencio Lopes Mationg, "who was convicted with three other men in the June 1967 murder of agents Theodore L. Newton Jr., 25, and George F. Azrak, 21, is scheduled for a parole hearing this week." Border Patrol Agent Ronald Zermeno, "who has coordinated an effort to keep Mationg in prison, said that a petition with 4,000 signatures was presented to the commission and that several law-enforcement authorities and family members will attend the hearing tomorrow at the federal prison in Florence, Colo."

DOJ_NMG_0032866

Immigration Policy Seen As Creating Quandary For Domestic Partners. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/12, A21), Susan Laurel Hodges explains the difficulties in arranging for an H-1B visa for her domestic partner, a German physician with skills highly sought after in her own country. A US employer "must be willing to jump through hoops to sponsor her, and until that happens, no visa can be issued. Among the hoops: extensive advertising to find an American citizen who can fill the job before it is given to an outsider, and retaining an attorney who can competently navigate and file the blizzard of forms that must be filled out by the potential employer and potential employee."

Public Opinion Said To Back Both Pro-Enforcement, Pro-Immigrant Bill. In the Weekly Standard (6/19), Jeffrey Bell says, "What voters do not like is an immigration system that increasingly relies on, and winks at, breaking the law. Voters never liked this, but they became especially unfavorable to it after 9/11. They want greater control of our borders, and more enforcement of immigration laws inside our borders." Political elites, "Republican and Democratic alike, often seem to operate on the assumption that voters are either pro-immigrant or pro-enforcement, but not both. In fact, most voters see no contradiction between the two. Nor is there a huge difference between rank-and-file Republicans and rank-and-file Democrats. Solid, but by no means unanimous, majorities in each party favor both immigration -- including a path to legalization for those already here -- and increased enforcement of immigration laws."

Immigration Is Key Issue In Competitive AZ5 Race. The Washington Post (6/12, A4, Slevin, 744K) reports that in Arizona's 5th CD, Republican Rep. J.D. Hayworth "is a firebrand by disposition and design." Democrat Harry Mitchell is "so low-key his advisers make a point of saying he really is energetic." Hayworth "is an immigration hawk who favors cracking down on illegal immigrants and wrote a book called 'Whatever It Takes.' The Democrat calls himself an immigration realist who would combine tighter border controls with a path toward legal status." Hayworth is "running hard for reelection, describing himself to GOP campaign workers as 'not real subtle, and you know exactly where I stand.' Mitchell is a local political legend who contends that Hayworth 'has a lot of explaining to do,' not least about his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The CD race is "considered competitive for the first time in a decade. Analysts point to troubles in the White House and Congress, as well as Hayworth's outsize profile on immigration. It all makes for an intriguing contest in an unpredictable state where pollsters see a shift to the center." Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report "believes Hayworth has the edge in a district that has eight registered Republicans for every five registered Democrats. But the district's substantial slice of independents complicates the picture, as does the image of local Republicans as more moderate and temperate than their congressman."

Schwarzenegger Faces Difficult Balance On Immigration. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Cooper, 2.11M) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's "frequent invocation of his achievements as a foreign national -- millionaire status, megacelebrity and a swift rise to a pinnacle of American politics -- is a major element of his strategy for navigating the issue of immigration in a tight re-election campaign in a state roiled more than any other by the different poles in the debate." On "specifics like border enforcement and benefits for the estimated three million illegal immigrants in his state, he tries to walk a middle ground. But often he tries to avoid the specifics altogether." California Republican Party Chairman Duf Sundheim "believes that the governor, in coupling a mix of personal anecdotes with a moderate policy stance, may be able to win support from moderates and the expanding Latino electorate on the issue without offending his deeply conservative base, which would like to see a tough crackdown on illegal immigrants."

TAX:

Democrats Said To Be Laying Ground Work For Tax Hike. Stephen Moore writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) that many congressional Republicans "want to negotiate a blockbuster budget deal to tackle the stampeding cost of entitlements. Meanwhile, Democrats and left-leaning think tanks are already laying the groundwork to build a Washington tax-hike consensus." Moore adds, "Tax increases anywhere near 25% of GDP would cripple the rate of economic growth and slow the rate of capital accumulation and the build-up of national wealth -- leaving future generations worse off." Moore concludes, "For 25 years, virtually every bipartisan budget deal has meant higher taxes, higher spending and political carnage for the GOP. … Republicans forget this lesson of history at their own peril."

DOJ_NMG_0032867

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Administration Launches Effort To Enroll Medicare Drug Beneficiaries. The Bush Administration today will begin an effort to locate and sign up low income people on Medicare who are not receiving prescription drug coverage. USA Today (6/12, Wolf, 2.31M) reports, "The Social Security Administration will start by sending out 500,000 applications to a select group of seniors age 79 and up. The applications will also target seniors in low-income neighborhoods, people with disabilities, Hispanics and those who do not handle their own financial affairs." The effort is "the latest in a series of attempts by the government and private groups to lure those seniors who stand to benefit the most from Medicare's prescription-drug program -- but who are most likely to have missed out on the coverage."

Business Lobby Pushes GOP On Competitiveness Agenda. The business lobby is using the competitiveness agenda proposed by congressional Democrats as leverage against Republicans, who they feel are not pushing the issue hard enough. Roll Call (6/12, Rasmussen) reports, "Business groups want to see action on President Bush's American Competitiveness Initiative," but "the proposal -- unveiled in Bush's 2006 State of the Union address -- has languished in the GOP-controlled Congress. … Lobbyists have grown increasingly worried that Congress, riven by bitter partisan infighting, does not share their feelings of urgency on the issue, and that Congress might go to recess in August without passing major parts of the initiative."

Budget Panels To Take Up Line-Item Veto Proposals. Roll Call (6/12, Yachnin) reports that the House and Senate budget committees are preparing to move forward with legislation to establish a presidential line item veto. According to Roll Call, "both panels have indicated they intend to overhaul the measure proposed by the Bush Administration and produce a bill that provides significantly less license than the executive branch had sought." While Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg "did not expand on his plans to amend the bill, introduced by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in March, he previously had suggested that the measure should be tailored more narrowly to prevent abuse by the executive branch, as well as to give Congress more flexibility to respond to line-item veto activity." In the House, Rep. Paul Ryan "said he believes the legislation should include time limitations restricting the period in which the president may propose rescissions for specific legislation."

Hoyer, Murtha To Seek Leadership Posts If Democrats Win House. Roll Call (6/12, Kornacki) reports that House Minority Whip Steny and Rep. John Murtha have both indicated that they will seek the Majority Leader's post if Democrats take control of the House in November. Roll Call notes, "The unusually timed competition…was triggered on Friday when Murtha, the Pennsylvania appropriator whose change of heart on the Iraq war last year made him one of the most recognized faces in Congress, stunned his colleagues by circulating a letter announcing his bid." Hoyer "strongly affirmed Friday afternoon his plans to seek a promotion to Majority Leader, a job, he suggests, that he would have earned by virtue of Democratic successes at the polls this fall." Roll Call also notes, "Murtha's move immediately raised questions about [Minority Leader Nancy] Pelosi's role, since he is one of her closest allies in the House and Hoyer, as the No. 2 Democrat, is the most obvious threat to Pelosi's position among the current crop of Democratic leaders."

Time (6/19, Tumulty) reports in its "Notebook" column that a "nasty fight" has broken out in the House Democratic caucus. Vocal Iraq war critic Rep. John Murtha, "sent a two-sentence letter last week to his Democratic colleagues notifying them that he plans to run for majority leader if his party wins back the House. That's a direct challenge to the man who would be in line for the job, Democratic whip Steny Hoyer, a moderate who supported the war." Murtha managed Rep. Nancy Pelosi's successful campaign against Hoyer for Minority Leader. She and Murtha "have stayed tight. But sources close to Pelosi say she had nothing to do with Murtha's surprising announcement; sources close to Hoyer suggest they don't believe that."

DOJ_NMG_0032868

Poll Finds Reid Approval Rating At 48%. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid received what the Washington Times (6/12, Hurt, 90K) calls "raucous applause" from a gathering of liberal bloggers in Las Vegas. But, "outside the convention hall, the Nevadans who sent Mr. Reid to Washington aren't quite so thrilled with the job he's doing. A poll conducted last month for the Reno Gazette Journal found just 48 percent of Nevadans approving of the job he's doing, compared with 41 percent who disapprove. … What's more, the poll by Research 2000 found that Nevadans don't think much of the job Mr. Reid is doing for the national Democratic Party either. Asked whether 'Democrats under Harry Reid's leadership have a workable agenda,' 35 percent of state voters said 'yes,' while 43 percent said 'no.' And by a 46 percent to 36 percent margin, his constituents said Mr. Reid doesn't have the 'leadership qualities' to guide Democrats to control of the Senate this year. The survey polled 600 likely Nevada voters last month and has a margin of error of 4 percentage points."

House Makes Emailing Offices More Difficult. The Washington Post (6/12, D1, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "Congress to Lobby Groups: Drop Dead! That could be the headline on the latest development from the House of Representatives. Last month the House quietly began to make it harder for interest groups to send large numbers of e-mails to lawmakers." Increasingly, citizens "are being forced to demonstrate a basic knowledge of mathematics to have any chance of communicating electronically with their congressional offices." At the end of May, "the House started to offer congressmen the chance to add an extra obstacle -- the completion of a math problem -- to their already difficult-to-penetrate e-mail systems. The purpose, officials said, was to cut down on the deluge of messages they receive." Even with "many impediments, lawmakers still bellyache that the torrent of e-mails they get every day is more than their staffs can handle. According to a recent study, electronic messages to the House doubled to 99 million from 2000 to 2004. In the Senate, the number of e-mails more than tripled to 83 million during the same period." The math problem idea "is to ensure that only actual people -- and not mass-mailing computers of the kind often used by interest groups -- will send e-mails to the House from now on."

OPM To Reexamine Bids To Provide Dental, Vision Benefits. The Washington Post (6/12, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "One of the biggest benefit programs planned for federal employees and retirees in years -- enhanced dental and vision benefits -- is having trouble getting off the drawing boards. Last month, the Office of Personnel Management announced it had selected 10 vendors for the new Federal Employee Dental and Vision Program, scheduled to start Dec. 31. Last week, the OPM quietly informed congressional committees that it had decided to take a fresh look at the bids. … The reassessment of the bids was triggered by a protest filed by Blue Cross and Blue Shield at the Government Accountability Office, a congressional auditing agency that often handles contractor complaints. … In a statement, the OPM said it reopened the vendor selection process 'to reaffirm the integrity of the procurement process' and to put OPM in the best possible position to negotiate for reasonably priced dental benefits."

Bush Personal Aide Profiled. Time (6/19, Allen) profiles Blake Gottesman, personal aide to President Bush. Gottesman "has blossomed into a systems analyst, gatekeeper and diplomat who serves as the membrane between the President and the rest of the staff." Time adds, "White House Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett calls Gottesman 'a walking mood ring,' the unquestioned authority on whom the President wants in his limo, what member of Congress he may accept in his office on Air Force One and whether it is wise for a top aide to bring up a particular topic at a particular time."

Administration Seeks To Take Focus Off Bush Poll Numbers. U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Walsh) reports that in the wake of terrorist leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi's death and Republican Rep.-elect Brian Bilbray's victory in the CA50 special election, "things are looking brighter for President Bush." Aides "hope Bush's Camp David summit this week to plan the next phase of the Iraqi occupation will generate more positive momentum." US News adds that Bush "is building on his upward bounce by showing a new receptivity to fresh ideas and a willingness to change the way he does business. Critics say it's long overdue, but the president and his inner circle have begun a concerted effort to 'change the conversation,' according to one senior official, and take the focus off his job-approval ratings, which have lingered in the low to mid-30s."

DOJ_NMG_0032869

Conservative Intellectuals Said To Be Rejecting Bush. In the New Republic (6/19), Jonathan Chait says, "Not long ago, conservatives hailed" George W. Bush "as a fearless leader in the war on terrorism, a great man of history, Reagan's son. Long after the patriotic upsurge following September 11 had crested, the conservative base held him in awe." But now, "his former acolytes are furiously denouncing him." Conservative "intellectuals and activists, the right's ideological vanguard, have decided that Bush is not Reagan's son after all. Indeed, they have discovered that he is not, and never has been, a conservative, but rather that he is a fraud masquerading as one."

Marcus Calls DeLay's Farewell Speech "Sneering, Belligerent." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (6/12, A21, 744K) that Rep. Tom DeLay's farewell address on the House floor last week was "stunning for its sneering, belligerent partisans hip. … DeLay made clear that he wanted to leave the way he behaved throughout his 22 years in Washington -- contemptuous of the opposition and unrepentant about his cutthroat tactics." Marcus adds, "There is a place for partisanship, and an honor in hewing to principles that divide the parties. But DeLay's zero-sum politics diminishes the capacity of government to solve difficult problems."

NYTimes Says State Department Should Cover Programs To Train Foreign Militaries. The New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "The Senate plans to begin consideration today of the defense authorization bill for the coming year. One particularly distressing section of the package would reauthorize the Pentagon to arm and train foreign militaries, something it was first authorized to do for 2006. … Congress should return these programs to State Department supervision. If it cannot summon the will to do that, it should at least mandate that the programs financed by the Pentagon conform to the same democratic and human rights standards that apply when they are run by the State Department."

WSJournal Praises FAA Handling Of NATCA Contract. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) offers congratulations to Federal Aviation Administrator Marion Blakey for her winning battle "over the latest contract for federal air traffic controllers. The National Air Traffic Controllers Association is one of the few federal labor unions accorded the right to negotiate its contract terms, with the caveat that should discussions reach an impasse -- and Congress not act -- the FAA could impose a contract." The Journal adds, "No word yet from Natca if it intends to strike, but it may have learned its lesson in 1981 when President Reagan fired controllers for walking off the job. With an air traffic control system in need of costly upgrades to reduce delays and cancelled flights, it's especially good to see a majority of Republicans defy union intimidation."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Keeping Close Eye On Inflation Expectations. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Conkey, 2.11M) reports that the Federal Reserve is closely watching the inflation expectations of consumers and markets. Inflation expectations "have become increasingly important to monetary policy in recent years. When people anticipate a rising inflation rate, the prevailing theory goes, they are likely to behave in ways that will bring about higher prices. … Preventing this kind of inflationary spiral is what Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke had in mind last week when he said the central bank will be 'vigilant' in combating the recent upward trend in prices."

USA Today (6/12, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports that the two inflation reports this week from the government "could determine whether the Federal Reserve keeps raising interest rates or stands aside. Traders and economists are anxiously awaiting Tuesday's wholesale price report and Wednesday's consumer price index, as they try to regroup from last week's stock market dive. The question for the markets is whether the inflation measures will jump, inducing the Fed at its June 28-29 meeting to boost its target for short-term rates above the current 5% level to tamp down price pressures."

Gasoline Prices Expected To Decline Further. The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Scherer, 61K) reports that relief from rising gas prices may be on the way. After the price of oil hit a high of $75.17 a barrel last month, "demand in the United States dipped a few percentage points. Demand by other big developed economies has also eased in recent months, reaching a level that's actually lower than a year ago. Oil markets started to factor in some of these supply-and-demand dynamics last week: The price of crude oil fell below $70 a barrel on Thursday." The lower prices "are a good sign for consumers -- and the price of the hydrocarbon could stabilize or drop more if, as widely expected, both the US and global economies grow at a slower pace for the rest of the year."

DOJ_NMG_0032870

Energy Firms Betting East Coast Gasoline Terminals Won't Be Built. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Gold, 2.11M) reports, "Several energy companies are making big bets that new tanker terminals for importing natural gas along the East Coast won't be built, a turn of events that could put upward pressure on consumer heating and electricity bills there." Several companies "plan to build natural-gas pipelines to bring gas to the region over land from other parts of the country. … Earlier this year, Kinder Morgan Energy Partners LP and Sempra Energy said they were teaming up to build a $4 billion, 1,300-mile gas pipeline from the Rockies to Ohio. Combined, the new pipelines should deliver as much as 3.5 billion cubic feet a day into the East Coast market by 2009. Neither pipeline project would be moving ahead unless the companies felt confident the less-expensive, brand-new LNG terminals wouldn't be there to compete, said Bernard J. Picchi, energy research director at Foresight Research Solutions LLC."

States Move To Transform Medicaid. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/12, A1, Goldstein, 744K) reports that "states are moving aggressively to transform the nation's largest public health insurance program, adding fees, restricting benefits and creating incentives for patients to take responsibility for their health. … Starting July 1, West Virginia will phase in a redesigned form of Medicaid that requires patients to sign a 'member agreement,' promising that they will keep doctors' appointments, take prescribed medicine and not overuse hospital emergency rooms. Patients who refuse to sign or to follow the rules will be eligible for less care. Kentucky is dividing its Medicaid patients into four categories, depending on their health and their age, with different benefits for each group. … Florida, meanwhile, will privatize part of its Medicaid system in September, directing patients in Jacksonville and Broward County to pick from 19 health plans, each offering different services."

NYTimes Calls New York Effort To Combat Medicaid Fraud "A Disgrace." An editorial in the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) says New York state's "efforts to weed out Medicaid fraud have been a disgrace. … New York needs more staff members to investigate Medicaid fraud. The state must have a chief Medicaid inspector who is not a political hack, and a workable whistle-blower or false-claims law. The biggest Medicaid program in the country should also strive to be the cleanest."

Democrats Lose Ground In Gubernatorial Races. USA Today (6/12, Page, 2.31M) reports the "political landscape has gotten friendlier for congressional Democrats over the past six months, but the party's prospects for scoring big gains in governors' races now look more difficult." In Michigan, "Gov. Jennifer Granholm — the darling of Democrats when she was elected in 2002 — is now in a dead heat with Republican challenger Dick DeVos. A statewide poll last month by EPIC-MRA put him at 46%, her at 45%. Last fall, she had held a 23-point lead." In Wisconsin, "Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle is increasingly vulnerable, in part because of ethics controversies in his administration. In a statewide Strategic Vision poll in April, Doyle was at 45%; U.S. Rep. Mark Green, a Republican hopeful, was at 43%." Among the nation's "10 biggest states, Democratic prospects since the beginning of the year have gotten tougher in four — California, Georgia, Michigan and Pennsylvania — and better in one, New York." The GOP "has more governorships at risk this year. Among 36 races on the ballot, 22 are for Republican-held seats, 14 for Democratic-held ones." Since 1994, Republicans "have held a majority of governorships — now 28 states to Democrats' 22. Democrats hope to turn that around this year by picking up at least four of them." USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) also runs a table listing information on the races in six of the most populous 10 races, and a brief caption for the table.

Reynolds Says CA50 Result Shows Corruption Won't Be Issue In November. Roll Call (6/12, Kurtz) reports, "Fresh off a special election in which the corruption issue did not carry the Democratic candidate to victory, National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) predicted Friday that corruption would not be a factor in the race to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), and he reiterated his belief that the Democrats will not be able to use the issue to their advantage in the midterm elections." Reynolds said "last week's special election to succeed incarcerated ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) was a perfect opportunity to test the 'culture of corruption' message that Democrats have pounded throughout the election cycle."

DOJ_NMG_0032871

Emanuel Says GOP Avoided "Disaster" With Bilbray Win. Appearing on ABC's This Week (6/11, Stephanopoulos), Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that with Republican Brian Bilbray's victory in the special election to fill the seat of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, what Republicans "really did was avoid a disaster." Emanuel said, "The Republican Party spent $5 million, the most they've ever spent, in an overwhelming Republican district and eked out a victory with less than 50 percent of the vote. And the only way Congressman Bilbray did that was by attacking the president of the United States, of his own party." Emanuel's Republican counterpart, also appearing on This Week, said it appeared that Bilbray's Democratic opponent, Francine Busby, "got no more than what Kerry got in that district."

Republicans' Good News May Not Affect Long-Term Political Environment. In his Roll Call column (6/12), Stuart Rothenberg says, "California's 50th district special election. The death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq. The foiling of a major terrorist plot in Canada. A cooling of tensions over Iran. The unemployment rate down to 4.6 percent. After a 17-month string of virtually unbroken bad news, Republicans suddenly find themselves confronting something they could not have expected, and may now no longer recognize: good news. How will they handle it?" Republican partisans "should not kid themselves about the political environment," as "more bad news from" the Middle East is "probably around the corner (if it hasn't already happened)." Second, "the public's mood already is sour, so many Americans may discount good news, just the way they have ignored the strength of the economy." Third, Republicans "need to understand that while they dodged a bullet in California's 50th district, that result guarantees nothing about November." Democrat Francine Busby "has been described as a 'mediocre' candidate so often that it might as well be her middle name. But Democratic nominees in Connecticut's 2nd and 4th districts, Indiana's 8th and 9th districts and Florida's 22nd district— just to mention a handful of contests — are much stronger than Busby and much more likely to have appeal to general election voters."

Several Clinton Administration Alumni Seeking Elective Office. The AP (6/12, Johnson) reports Clinton administration alumni "are taking their turn in the political spotlight while their former leader cheers from the sidelines." Former President Clinton said, "I am pleased and proud that so many of them have run or are running for office." The AP adds, "Nowhere is the Clinton class more evident than in New York, where the ex-president and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton now live. Four of five Democrats hoping to succeed Eliot Spitzer as New York's attorney general served in the Clinton administration." One Clinton alumnus "is Charlie King, a candidate for state attorney general." The Clinton class "also includes: Kirsten Gillibrand, a former HUD lawyer under Andrew Cuomo. She is running for Congress in the New York's 20th District, which stretches north from Albany's suburbs. Sheldon Whitehouse, a former U.S. attorney. He is running for the U.S. Senate in Rhode Island. Tom Perez, a former deputy U.S. attorney. He is running for attorney general in Maryland. Bill Halter, Clinton's deputy Social Security commissioner. He advanced last month to Tuesday's Democratic runoff for the nomination for lieutenant governor in Arkansas." The "crowded field for New York attorney general also features Sean Patrick Maloney, an aide in the Clinton White House aide. In addition, Denise O'Donnell, the former U.S. attorney in Buffalo, dropped out of the race on June 3."

Byrd, In Tough Race, Faces Scrutiny For Votes On Social Issues. Roll Call (6/12, Whittington) reports when Sen. Robert Byrd (W.Va.) "was one of two Democrats last week to vote to invoke cloture and force an up-or-down vote on a federal amendment banning gay marriage — a position that plays well with the socially conservative voters back home — Republicans wasted little time in blasting the move." Byrd has said "he is against gay marriage, but he opposes a constitutional measure banning it because he believes the matter should be left up to each state and he would have voted no on the underlying bill." But the "most recent vote illustrates the potentially perilous line that Byrd, who today becomes the chamber's longest-serving Senator, must walk as he seeks re-election to an unprecedented 9th term this November." Byrd "faces millionaire businessman John Raese (R) in what is expected to be his toughest race yet." But Democratic strategists "scoff at the notion that Byrd's recent actions — including supporting President Bush's Supreme Court nominees and proposing a constitutional amendment to allow voluntary prayer in public schools — amount to any sort of election-year conversion or pandering to conservatives."

DOJ_NMG_0032872

Edwards Leads Clinton In Iowa Caucus Poll. The Des Moines Register (6/11, 166K) ran the results of an Iowa Poll on the 2008 Democratic caucuses taken May 29 to June 1. John Edwards leads with 30%, with Sen. Hillary Clinton next at 26%. However, the poll has a 4.9% margin of error. Sen. John Kerry was a distant third at 12%, followed by Gov. Tom Vilsack 10%, Tom Daschle 3%, Sen. Russ Feingold 3%, Mark Warner 3%, Sen. Evan Bayh 2%, and Wesley Clark 2%.

Herbert Says Ohio Was "Hijacked" From Kerry In 2004. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M), "Republicans, and even a surprising number of Democrats, have been anxious to leave the 2004 Ohio election debacle behind. But [Robert F. Kennedy, Jr.], in his long, heavily footnoted article ('Was the 2004 Election Stolen?'), leaves no doubt that the democratic process was trampled and left for dead in the Buckeye State. [Sen. John] Kerry almost certainly would have won Ohio if all of his votes had been counted, and if all of the eligible voters who tried to vote for him had been allowed to cast their ballots." Herbert adds, "No one has been able to prove that the election in Ohio was hijacked. But whenever it is closely scrutinized, the range of problems and dirty tricks that come to light is shocking."

Local TV Stations Losing, Viewers, Revenue To Internet. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, A1, Barnes, 2.11M) reports that the internet is drawing viewers and revenue away from local TV stations, which for decades have been "a fount of cash for some of the industry's biggest players such as Viacom Inc., News Corp. and General Electric Co.'s NBC. Newspaper publishers such as Tribune Co. and Gannett Co., also diversified into television. For many of these companies, steady profits from their stations funded expansion into other businesses." The Journal adds, "The picture has changed. Total local broadcast revenue fell 9% in 2005 to $16.8 billion, according to the Television Bureau of Advertising. The chief culprit: Big advertisers cutting back budgets or moving to the Web."

Growing Number Of Students Finish College Over $100,000 In Debt. USA Today (6/12, A1m Block, 2.31M) reports, "After years of rising college costs and shrinking financial aid, it's come to this: Some graduates are now leaving college with student-loan debt in the six figures. Graduates with more than $100,000 in debt still account for a small subset of borrowers. But their numbers are rising. And the proportion who are leaving college with some level of unmanageable debt -- debt they can't repay without significant hardship -- is swelling. … The rise in unmanageable debt has raised concerns that many graduates won't be able to pursue careers in fields that have traditionally paid modest salaries."

NYTimes Says American Workers Are Downbeat. The New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "It comes as little surprise to anyone nowadays that the deep bonds between company and company town are only as strong as the former's share price, measured by fiscal quarters rather than generations. Still, there is something sad about the spurned affection of a community for its company, the way residents of Newton, Iowa, feel about Maytag. … Shoppers probably won't notice, but Newton and the laid-off Maytag workers everywhere will feel a void. The economy is growing fast, but American workers are downbeat, and Maytag helps explain why. Jobs can be replaced, but the sense of safety and security cannot. The brand lives on, but the identity is gone."

Iran Wants Talks, But Balks At Immediate Enrichment Freeze. The New York Times (6/12, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "Iran has begun a public campaign that appears to be aimed at nudging the six nations that have offered a package of incentives into negotiations over its nuclear program without first freezing its efforts to make nuclear fuel." During "a hastily planned trip to Cairo, apparently to drum up international support for Iran's stand, Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator rejected any preconditions for opening negotiations over the fate of its nuclear program. In the clearest response from Iranian officials to the incentives package, Ali Larijani, the chief negotiator, told reporters on Sunday, 'We have already said that we would not accept any preconditions and that we are supporting negotiations without prior conditions.'"

The Financial Times (6/12, Smyth) adds, "Hamid-Reza Asefi, the foreign ministry spokesman, said on Sunday that Iran would take 'as long as is necessary' before replying, and echoed Saturday's announcement from Manouchehr Mottaki, the foreign minister, that it might submit counter-proposals. Mr. Mottaki spoke of 'shuttle diplomacy' in which Iran would send 'a genuine proposal...or counter-package' to the Europeans. He did not elaborate on what might be contained in the proposals." USA Today/AP (6/12, Dareini) and Washington Post (6/12, A17, Dareini, 744K) also report the story.

DOJ_NMG_0032873

US, Europe Push IAEA Members On Draft Ahead Of Monday Meeting. The AP (6/12, Dareini) reports, "In two position papers shown to the AP, the United States and Europe were lobbying hard for support of the package from members of the" IAEA Board "before a Monday meeting of the body. 'We are...encouraging all board members to make firm statements to call on Iran' to negotiate on the six-power offer, the US position paper said. If Tehran declines, the text warned that the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany 'have agreed to pursue measures…(to) pressure the Iranian regime to change course.'"

US Will Seek UN Sanctions If Iran Refuses To Suspend Uranium Enrichment. Time (6/19, Shannon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Iran's resumption of uranium enrichment last week could not have come at a better time for the Bush Administration. The US sees Iran's defiance…as new ammunition in its battle to persuade the European powers, Russia and China that only harsh sanctions can impede Iran's quest for the Bomb. If, as US officials anticipate, Iran refuses to suspend enrichment and return to the negotiating table, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will demand sanctions from the UN Security Council. Russia and China have pledged not to veto if Iran refuses to cooperate."

Conservatives Said To Be Upset About Iran Proposal. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Richter, 958K) reports, "Last month, as Rice rolled out the Iran proposal, her senior staff contacted influential conservative editors and pundits in hopes that a full explanation of the deal would head off criticism from the right." The effort "helped mute reactions, commentators said." But "the new initiative has drawn criticism, if not wholesale condemnation, from conservative opinion leaders such as the Wall Street Journal editorial page and the National Review magazine, and conservative stalwarts such as American Enterprise Institute scholar Michael Rubin and former Reagan administration official Frank J. Gaffney Jr., among others. So far, only a few conservative members of Congress have joined the conservative foreign policy experts' complaints — in public, at least. This is partly because they believe Bush has a weak hand and few options, said Wittmann, now with the centrist Progressive Policy Institute. " Nevertheless, "the discontent marks a challenge for Bush at a time when he is trying to rebuild conservative support."

Iranian Official Says US Should Rebuke MEK. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M), M.A. Mohammadi, press secretary for Mission of Iran to the UN, writes, "The US Congress shouldn't support a terrorist organization that has committed atrocities in Iran, including the assassination of a president, a prime minister and more than 70 lawmakers ('Iranian Exile Group Aims to Build Bridges; Some in Congress See a Role for an Organization Formally Listed as a Terrorist Group,' May 22). How do such actions correspond to the values defended by Congress? The European Union has recognized the Mujahedeen-e Khalq, or People's Mujahedeen of Iran, as a terrorist organization, and even a recent report by the U.S. government has acknowledged that the MEK 'has been launching attacks on Western and Iranian targets since the 1970s.' Instead of condoning acts of terrorism against Iran, US lawmakers should respect Iran's sovereignty and international law and prove their goodwill toward the Iranian nation by rebuking the MEK."

Latest Gaza Violence Could Derail Both Leaders' Plans. In wrap-up coverage of a weekend of violence in Israel and the Palestinian territories, the Wall Street Journal (6/12, Leggett, 2.11M) reports, "Escalating Israel-Palestinian tension soon may imperil political initiatives being pushed by their leaders and possibly spark a new phase of armed confrontation." Following shelling on Friday that killed eight civilians on a Gaza beach, Hamas ended what had been a longstanding ceasefire, and "left unchecked, the violence could return to the pitched levels of 2002, with implications for both sides and the broader region. Already, Hamas's armed wing has suggested it may resume dispatching suicide bombers into Israel. Senior Israeli military officials said they aren't ruling out a major ground offensive in Gaza, which would be the first since Israel withdrew from that area last summer, and said Israel could target Hamas political officials if Hamas rocket fire continues."

The New York Times (6/12, Azar, 1.19M) also runs a story titled "Errant Shell Turns Girl Into Palestinian Icon," which reports on Huda Ghaliya, "the sixth-grade student whose horrified screams on Friday as she knelt by her dead family on a Gaza beach were televised around the world."

DOJ_NMG_0032874

She "has quickly become an icon of the Palestinian struggle against Israeli might."

Hamas Vows To Block Abbas's Referendum. Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/12, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The militant faction Hamas announced its intent on Sunday to block" the July 26 referendum "after failing to reach an agreement in talks with him." According to the Times, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "urged Mr. Abbas in a letter on Friday and in a three-hour meeting in Gaza late Saturday night, to abandon the referendum as a divisive mechanism at a time of crisis, when Palestinians must remain united, and to continue dialogue instead to reach agreement. … A planned meeting between Mr. Abbas and the exiled Hamas political leader Khaled Mashal in Yemen, which has been trying, like Egypt, to find common ground between Fatah and Hamas, was also scrapped."

The Washington Post (6/12, A14, Wilson, 744K) reports, "In a statement released Sunday, the imprisoned Hamas leader who signed the document, Abdel Khaleq al-Natsheh, said he no longer supported it. He asked Abbas...to cancel the public vote on the document, which was meant to serve as a basis for negotiation between the two leading Palestinian political movements." The Washington Times (6/12, Mitnick, 90K) also runs a story about the Palestinian split and the violence it is engendering.

Olmert May Find Himself In Hot Seat On European Trip. The Financial Times (6/12, Morris) adds Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "begins a European tour today in which he will likely be obliged to justify his country's military tactics in the territories before he is allowed to turn the focus towards promoting his controversial and potentially unilateral plans for the West Bank. The UK and France, his hosts this week, both condemned Friday's incident in which seven Palestinians were killed during a beach picnic, apparently victims of stray Israeli shelling," and "the deteriorating situation posed a further threat to efforts by the international quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – to get its moribund 'road map' peace plan back on track via renewed negotiations between the antagonists."

Major North Korean Missile Test Could Be Imminent. The Financial Times (6/12, Sevastopulo, Fidler, Fifield) reports, "North Korea is preparing for a possible test of an intercontinental ballistic missile with the potential to hit the US, according to Washington officials. A senior official said there were 'enough indications' to suggest that Pyongyang was getting ready to fire a Taepodong-2 missile from a launch pad in eastern North Korea." The Times calls current planning "far more advanced than on previous occasions," and says U.S. intelligence is "monitoring the launch site" for signs of missile assembly. The Times notes, "Pyongyang…could be bluffing. Kim Jong-Il…has a history of performing eye-catching stunts when he feels he is being ignored, which has happened recently as Washington focuses on resolving nuclear tensions with Iran." North Korea has not conducted a significant missile test since it test-fired its intermediate-range Taepodong-1 in 1998.

Domenici Makes Case For India Nuclear Agreement. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M), Sen. Pete Domenici writes, "Former Sen. Nunn and I have worked closely together to promote our shared nonproliferation goals, but he is wrong when he argues that Congress should impose additional conditions to the U.S.-India agreement. … I consider that partnership vital to the future of our nonproliferation regime. … I believe this agreement can serve as a catalyst to strengthening an eroding nonproliferation regime, a regime that has brighter prospects with India than without her."

Turkish EU Accession Talks In Jeopardy. The Financial Times (6/12, Dombey, Parker, Boland) reports EU foreign ministers "will seek" today "to prevent a huge setback to Turkey's entry bid that could leave Ankara empty-handed eight months after it agreed to begin" accession talks. The discussions in Luxembourg and the participation of Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul "are in doubt because Cyprus has objects to the EU's plans. On Sunday Mr Gul said he would not go unless ministers rejected Greek Cypriot demands over accession negotiations." Nicosia "insists the EU should make clear reference throughout negotiations to the need for Turkey to recognize" the Greek Cypriot government and establish diplomatic relations. The Times notes, "If the opening of the negotiations is delayed, Turkey's membership bid could be left in limbo," but also adds that similar difficulties preceded last fall's agreement to begin accession discussions. More ominously, the Times notes, "EU officials and governments also have misgivings about the progress of reform in Turkey and the prospects for enlargement of the EU in general. Concerns have been heightened by political and economic instability in Turkey."

DOJ_NMG_0032875

Iraq War Casts Pall In Lebanon, Other Middle Eastern Countries. The Washington Post (6/12, A1, Shadid, 744K) reports former Iraqi Insurgent Abu Haritha sits in the northern city of Tripoli, "Lebanon's second-largest," waiting "for what he believes will be a more expansive war beyond Iraq, a struggle he casts in the most cataclysmic of terms." The war in Iraq "has generated some of the most startling images in the Middle East today: a dictator's fall, elections in defiance of insurgent threats and carnage on a scale rarely witnessed. Less visibly, though, the war is building a profound legacy across the Arab world: fear and suspicion over Iraq's repercussions, a generation that casts the Bush administration's policy as an unquestioned war on Islam, and a subterranean reserve of men who, like Abu Haritha, declare that the fight against the United States in Iraq is a model for the future." Tripoli "is one of the most visible manifestations of the war, a rough-and-tumble city being transformed by growing radicalism and religious fervor that may long outlast the death of Zarqawi and the U.S. presence in Iraq, now in its fourth year. Here, and elsewhere, that militancy may prove to be the inheritance of both the war and the Bush administration's professed aim of bringing democratic reform to the region."

Somali Warlord Vows To Contest Islamic Militia's Control Of Mogadishu. The AP (6/12, Hassan) reports Muse Sudi Yalahow, "one of the secular warlords who lost control of Somalia's capital to an Islamic militia, vowed Sunday that the battle for Mogadishu was not over — an ominous warning for a city devastated by years of bloodshed and anarchy." But it was "unclear how many fighters and weapons the defeated alliance had, and many of the U.S.-backed warlords remain in hiding." The "threat came a day after Islamic fighters stopped showings of the World Cup soccer tournament, one of the first signs that the fundamentalist force now controlling nearly all of southern Somalia could install strict Islamic rule." Yalahow said "his group of secular warlords is regrouping to fight the Islamic militia, whom he accused of having ties to al-Qaida."

Annan Says US Use Of Financial Leverage Could Hurt Reform. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/12), UN Secretary General Kofi Annan says, "A minor storm broke out last week when Mark Malloch Brown, my deputy, made a speech suggesting that the US should engage more fully and wholeheartedly with other members of the UN to bring about reform. That is absolutely right, but he and I believe the same message needs to be heard in many other countries besides the US." The US "is trying to use the power of the purse to force through badly needed management reforms and these tactics have provoked a reaction among developing countries. Most of these are well aware of the need to reform – not least because it is in those countries that the UN provides vital services from peacekeeping and peace-building through emergency relief to strengthening human rights, helping organise elections and fighting infectious disease. That means they are the ones who have most to gain from a well-managed UN that really gives value for money. Their quarrel is much less with the detail of proposed reforms than with what they see as the overwhelming influence of a few rich countries."

The Financial Times (6/12, Turner) reports that while Annan says "the US use of 'the power of the purse' to force through reforms at the United Nations is lessening the chance of those reforms succeeding," he "calls on all countries, including the developing world, to 'turn down their rhetoric' and take a constructive attitude towards this month's UN budget negotiations, which threaten to pit rich against poor in a battle with potentially damaging consequences." Anan's comments "follow last week's high-profile dispute between John Bolton, the US ambassador, and Mark Malloch Brown, the UN deputy secretary-general, after the British official called for better US engagement with the world body."

Bolton Criticized For Blocking UN Management Reforms. In his Washington Post (6/12, A21, 744K), Sebastian Mallaby says US Ambassador to the UN, John R. Bolton, "has a rich history of losing friends and failing to influence people." Bolton has "blundered into U.N. management reform, an issue that may soon precipitate a crisis. The top U.N. officials, led by Secretary General Kofi Annan, had laid out a menu of radical changes, designed to eliminate useless conferences and reports and to move staff to departments that most needed them. Bolton added his own brand of bluster to this plan: If poor countries carried on resisting management reforms, rich countries would stop paying for the organization. The deadline for agreeing on reform is the end of this month, but no breakthrough is in sight. Officials are wondering what to do if U.N. checks start bouncing."

G-8 Ministers Say China, Emerging Economic Powers Overloading Poor

DOJ_NMG_0032876

Countries With Debt. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Phillips, 2.11M) reports the US "and its allies are worried that China and other up-and-coming economic powers may be overloading the world's poorest nations with high-priced debt." At their St. Petersburg meeting, "finance ministers from the Group of Eight leading nations warned China, India, Brazil and South Korea not to promote their exports to poor countries by pushing trade credits the borrowers can ill-afford." The G-8 ministers "find the situation especially troubling because just last year they engineered a write-off of as much as $60 billion in World Bank, International Monetary Fund and other loans for as many as 42 of the world's poorest nations. Now, G-8 officials fear some of those same countries may be slipping back into debt trouble."

Chinese Ambassador Makes Goodwill Tour Of Midwest. USA Today (6/12, Lynch, 2.31M) reports it is "somewhat out of the ordinary, however, for a foreign diplomat to ditch Embassy Row for the flyover states. Yet, there was Chinese Ambassador Zhou Wenzhong earlier this month venerating the 'heartland' and happily pressing the flesh in appearances here and in Kansas City, Mo." Zhou's "two-day Midwestern swing, which included speeches to business groups, local media interviews and even an incongruous stroll amid a flock of penguins, was all part of China's emerging campaign to overhaul a remote and sometimes threatening image. The ambassador's affable style also reflects the growing sophistication of Chinese diplomacy as a once-insular nation adjusts to a newly prominent role in global affairs."

Blogger's Stand Against Chinese Real Estate Market Makes Waves. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Browne, 2.11M) reports Zou Tao "has become an unlikely hero in this profit-driven city of half-built apartment complexes and luxury villas: He is calling for a boycott of the real-estate market." It is "a daring grass-roots campaign, designed to tamp down overheated property prices" in Shenzhen, China, that "he says has gotten him in trouble with police and attracted threats -- but also the backing of people across the country." Zou "has evidently tapped into a deep resentment against powerful real-estate developers and their local-government backers. They have helped push prices so high that many city residents can't afford to buy, even while numerous units held by speculators remain empty."

Disarming Janjaweed Seen As Key To Reaching Peace In Darfur. The New York Times (6/12, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports Musa Hilal, "the sheik who the State Department and human rights organizations say is an architect and perhaps the key leader of the fearsome Arab militias that have unleashed a torrent of misery in Darfur, laughed softly at the question of who these armed men" were who file around the town of Mistariha, Sudan. Hilal says, "They are soldiers. Just regular soldiers." The Times adds the "commander of the African Union peacekeeping base two dozen miles away, Col. John Bosco Mulisa, said there was little doubt who these men really were." Col. Mulisa says, "They are janjaweed. This town is their headquarters." The Times adds "whoever their commander is and whatever they are called, these men and the weapons they carry will determine whether, after three years of conflict that has left at least 200,000 dead, the fragile efforts to bring peace to this shattered region will succeed or fail." The "first and most critical step of that agreement, signed in May between the government in Khartoum and the largest rebel faction, is the disarmament of the janjaweed. The government pledged to submit a plan to disarm the militias of their heavy weaponry one month after signing the agreement and to finish the job before the end of October. But how do you disarm a phantom army whose sponsors and leaders deny its existence?"

Negotiators Debate Russian Investment In US, European Energy Infrastructure. The New York Times (6/12, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "Russian, American, European and Japanese officials are negotiating over whether Russia should be allowed greater latitude to invest in utilities, pipelines, natural gas facilities and other infrastructure in the United States and Europe." In a "draft declaration for endorsement at a Group of 8 summit meeting next month in St. Petersburg, Russia, broadened Russian access is paired with something the West wants: endorsement of market principles and greater access for foreign investment in the energy industry of Russia, one of the biggest oil and natural gas producers in the world."

Slovakian Neo-Liberal Government Seen As Likely To Lose Elections. In a Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) op-ed, Robin Shepherd of the German Marshall Fund of the United States says, "Imagine you're the leader of a country where economic growth is running at 6.3%, your government has been praised by the World Bank as the best market reformer in the world, unemployment has fallen to a record low of 10.6% from around 20% in just four years and your flat 19% corporate, value added and income tax rate led Steve Forbes to call your country an 'investors' paradise.' Imagine, also, that your country has seen foreign investment sky-rocket to the point at which it will shortly become the world's biggest per capita car maker, and where your people's feelings about their sense of national worth have gone from shame to something approaching pride. Oh, and as icing on the cake, imagine too that you got your country into the European Union and NATO." With this "record in mind, now consider that you face parliamentary elections this Saturday at which, unless the opinion polls change dramatically, you risk annihilation by a leftist opposition party with no experience of government and a policy agenda filled with populist rhetoric. Welcome to the world of Mikulas Dzurinda, prime minister of Slovakia, who for the past eight years has led what can reasonably claim to have been the most successful neo-liberal government of the 21st century so far."

DOJ_NMG_0032877

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Lawyers Defend Marines In Raid."
"Disney's Low-Key Superhero."
"A Force Of Nature In Chile."
"Details On Detainee Suicides Emerging."
"Old-Style Taint Shadows Election In Mexico."
"Fido Party Of Four, Your Table Is Ready."

USA Today:
"Dems Slipping In State Races."
"In Debt Before You Start."
"'06 Storm Season Off To Early Start."

New York Times:
"Prisoners' Ruse Is Inquiry Focus At Guantánamo."
"U.A.W. Facing Tough Choices, Leader Warns."
"Over Tea, Sheik Denies Stirring Darfur's Torment."
"A Ring Tone Meant To Fall On Deaf Ears."
"Russia Bargains For Bigger Stake In West's Energy."
"In Diabetes, One More Burden For The Mentally Ill."

Washington Post:
"States' Changes Reshape Medicaid."
"Annapolis Publisher Remains Missing."
"Smoke Of Iraq War 'Drifting Over Lebanon.'"
"Ft. Belvoir Job Shift To Alter Commutes."
"For Wal-Mart, Fair Trade May Be More Than A Hill Of Beans."
"Breathing New Rhythm Into Tired Streets."

Washington Times:
"U.S. General Sees Troops Leaving Iraq."
"Deadly Anbar Harbors 'Rat Lines.'"
"Wuerl A 'Teaching Bishop.'"
"Newspaper Publisher Merrill Missing."
"Homeland Security Accepts Fake ID."
"Palestinians Ready To Enjoy Gaza Shoreline."
"These Hacks Won't Leave You Up In The Air."

Detroit Free Press:
"UAW Boss: The Worst Is Upon Us."
"Kids Reach For Own Phones."
"Gettelfinger's Bind: Do More With Less."
"Battle Over Wiretaps To Begin Today."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fernbank Hopes To Uncover Lost Spanish Mission."
"NSA Case In Court Today."
"Atlanta's Mexicans Revel In Cup Win."
"Shoe Leather, Little Else Fuel Campaign."

Houston Chronicle:
"Three Dead Detainees Identified."
"National Congress Looks For Respect."
"Mexico And Its Fans Having A Soccer Ball."
"Alberto No Big Deal In Florida."
"Round Rock Teens' Protests Head To Court."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Preempted By Golf.
CBS: Al Qaeda Statement; Iraq Troop Levels; Taliban Resurgence; Early American Flags; Tropical Storm Alberto; Hollywood Private Eye; Baseball HGH Scandal; China-European-Style Architecture.
NBC: Al Qaeda Statement; Iraq Troop Levels; Haditha Killings-Marine's Attorney; Gitmo Suicides; Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto-Florida; Military Recruiting-Immigrants; Afghanistan Violence; Taiwan-Heavy Rain; Florida-Aging Levee; US World Cup Soccer Team.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Tropical Storm Alberto; AZ-Wildfire; National Guard On NM border; Zarqawi Autopsy.

DOJ_NMG_0032878

CBS: Bush-Camp David Meeting; Iraq Bombing; Tropical Storm Alberto; Warrantless Wiretapping; Gitmo Suicides; Gas Prices; Tony Awards; Wall Street.
NPR: Tropical Storm Alberto; China-Amnesty International Report; Afghanistan-Bombing; Kashmir-Bus Station Grenade Attack; Infant Mortality; Iraq-Bombings; Bush-Camp David Meeting; World Cup-Sex Trafficking; Tony Awards.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a meeting with the Interagency Team on Iraq, Camp David.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH —Speaks at the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation 2006 Mission Conference. Crystal Gateway Marriott, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington. Speaks and hosts entertainment provided by the Jersey Boys at the Senate Spouses luncheon. East Room.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 3 p.m. Meets to debate the defense authorization bill. No votes scheduled.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on implementation of the Energy Policy Act of 2005. Assistant Energy Secretary Dennis Spurgeon; Douglas Chapin MPR Associates; Tom Christopher, Chief Executive Officer, Areva, Inc. Lynchburg, Va.; Lawrence Burns, General Motors; Regis Matzie, Westinghouse Electric Company; Jeff Serfass, National Hydrogen Association; Dan Keuter, Entergy Nuclear, Jackson, Miss. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

3 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the investment treaty with Uruguay. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. The House meets for morning hour debate, and at 2 p.m. will turn to legislative business. Votes will be postponed until 6:30 p.m. Highlights: Conference Report on H.R. 4939 - Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, the Global War on Terror, and Hurricane Recovery, 2006. Suspensions (12 bills): 1) H.R. 4013 - To amend the Reclamation Projects Authorization and Adjustment Act of 1992 to provide for conjunctive use of surface and groundwater in Juab County, Utah. 2) H.R. 4162 - Los Padres National Forest Land Exchange Act of 2005. 3) H.R. 3967 - Pactola Reservoir Reallocation Authorization Act of 2005. 4) H.Con.Res. 368 - Expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to honoring the goals and ideals of Alex`s Lemonade Stand Days, June 9 through 11, 2006. 5) H.Con.Res. 338 - Expressing the sense of Congress regarding the activities of Islamist terrorist organizations in the Western Hemisphere. 6) H.Res. 794 - Recognizing the 17th anniversary of the massacre in Tiananmen Square, Beijing, in the People`s Republic of China, and for other purposes. 7) H.Res. 804 - Condemning the unauthorized, inappropriate, and coerced ordination of Catholic bishops by the People`s Republic of China. 8) H.Con.Res. 408 - Commending the Government of Canada for its renewed commitment to the Global War on Terror. 9) H.Res. 608 - Condemning the escalating levels of religious persecution in the People`s Republic of China. 10) H.Res. 792 - Recognizing the 40th anniversary of the independence of Guyana and extending best wishes to Guyana for peace and further progress, development, and prosperity. 11) H.R. 5169 - Wilfred Edward `Cousin Willie` Sieg, Sr. Post Office Designation Act . 12) S. 1445 - William H. Emery Post Office Designation Act.

5:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Hearing on On H.Res. ___ - Declaring that the United States will complete the mission in Iraq and prevail in the Global War on Terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary; H.R. ____ - Transportation, Treasury, HUD, Judiciary, DC, Appropriations Act for 2007. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: LATIN AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT _ The Inter-American Development Bank holds a conference on a new initiative to deal with Latin American development. Highlights: 6 p.m. Session on ``Redefining the Possible," with former President Bill Clinton. Location: IADB, 1330 New York Ave. NW.

SPARK CONFERENCE _ The Society of Professional Administrators and Recordkeepers holds its 2006 National Conference. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. Former Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., speaks on ``Washington Perspectives." 1 p.m. - 2 p.m. Ask the CEOs session with Phil Lussier of CitiStreet and Joe Ready of Wachovia. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ACCOUNTING OVERSIGHT _ 9 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board has scheduled a Standing Advisory Group meeting. The advisory group will discuss topics related to audits of internal control over financial reporting as well as other standards-setting topics. Location: Army and Navy Club, 901 17th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0032879

ENERGY POLICY _ 10 a.m. The National Commission on Energy Policy holds a briefing to release a White Paper on energy needs and challenges. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

JOHANNS _ 10:45 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaksa to the Financial Women's Association. Location: Morgan Lewis Bockius law firm, 1111 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

KURDS-IRAQ _ 11:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds an event with Qubad Talabany, Representative of the Patriot Union of Kurdistan, discussing Iraq's new government. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

BANKRUPTCY-PENSIONS _ 12 p.m. American Bankruptcy Institute holds a briefing on pension issues in bankruptcy with Bankruptcy Judge Eugene Wedoff, Chief Judge of the Northern District of Illinois and presiding judge over the United Airlines bankruptcy case. Location: Room 2226, Rayburn.

FUTURE ENERGY SOURCES _ 12 p.m. The Foundation for Nuclear Studies and the Congress and Science Program of the American Chemical Society host a Senate Nuclear Caucus a luncheon discussion, ``Climate Change: What Is The Role of Next Generation Nuclear Energy and Hydrogen? Participants are: Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho; Vice Admiral John J. Grossenbacher (Ret.), Laboratory Director, Idaho National Laboratory; Joseph Romm, author of ``The Hype About Hydrogen: Fact and Fiction in the Race to Save the Climate; and former Acting Assistant Secretary of Energy Ambassador John Ritch, Director General, World Nuclear Association, former U.S. Ambassador to UN Organizations in Vienna. Location: Room 418, Russell Senate Office Building.

PORT SECURITY _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Senator Chafee sponsors a congressional brieifng focusing on port security and cargo screening technologies. Panel members include: Elainec Dezenski, former assistant secretary for policy, Department of Homeland Security; David Schanzer, director of the Center for Homeland Security Studies, Duke University; and Peter Kant, vice president of government affairs, Rapiscan Systems. Location: Room 188, Russell Senate Office Building.

MEDICARE SAVINGS _ 12:15 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform hold a briefing Medicare savings programs, with Jack Ebeler, who chaired the National Academy of Social Insurance panel that made the program recommendations, others. Location: Room 325, Russell.

REID-ENERGY INDEPENDENCE _ 12:30 p.m. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid will keynote the opening lunch of the Campaign for Americas Futures Take Back America 2006 conference. The lunch session, “Apollo: New Energy, New Jobs, New Independence for America, will focus on new initiatives to make America energy independent." From high gas prices to the rising costs of middle-class life, Americans face serious challenges. Location: Washington Hilton, International Ballroom, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

POLITICS-DISASTER POLL _ 1 p.m. There will be a teleconference on release of a new poll (to be released on Monday) that will show a significant differences among Democratic, Republican and Independent voters with regard to how unprepared the nation is to deal with a flu pandemic, a major terrorist attack, global warming or collision with an asteroid. The poll was conducted for SCI FI Channel and NBC News Productions by Bill McInturff with Public Opinion Strategies and Anna Greenberg with Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research. Contacts: Ed Rothschild, 202-879-9317. Notes: Call-in number is: 800 216-1258. Passcode - 202 879-9339.

BIES _ 3 p.m. Federal Reserve Board Governor Susan Schmidt Bies speaks to the Financial Women's Association Washington Briefing Conference. Location: Room 121, Cannon.

IMMIGRATION-WILSON _ 4 p.m. The Hudson Institute holds an event with former California Gov. Pete Wilson discussing immigration policy. Location: 6th floor, 1015 15th St. NW.

BERNANKE _ 7:30 p.m. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke speaks to the American Bankers Association Stonier Graduate School of Banking speakers program on bank supervision. Location: Gaston Hall, Healy Building, Georgetown University.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General’s News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning or called at (703) 749-0040.

Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com,

DOJ_NMG_0032881

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JUNE 12, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Guantanamo Under Scrutiny After Three Detainees Commit Suicide ... 3
Specter Says He Could Force Phone Companies To Testify About NSA Surveillance ... 4
Defense Attorneys Shut Out As Courtroom Secrecy In Terror Cases Grows ... 5
Media Said To Be Downplaying Links Between Canadian Suspects, Networks ... 5

Patriot Act:
SEC, Treasury Mull How To Apply Patriot Act To Hedge Funds ... 6

Homeland Response:
Fake ID Used To Enter DHS Headquarters ... 6
Study Finds Arab-Americans Mistrust Police Since 9/11 ... 6
"Technicalities" Leaving New Orleans Homeowners Without Enough To Rebuild ... 6

War News:
White House Convenes War Cabinet Summit On Iraq ... 7
Zarqawi Autopsy Results Withheld ... 9
Defense Lawyers Defend Haditha Marines' Actions ... 11
House Will Debate Iraq ... 12
Reid Seeks More Intelligence Oversight On Iran Policy ... 12
Iraqi Government Releases Second Batch Of Prisoners From Abu Ghraib ... 12
Krugman Defends Democrats Who Opposed Iraq War ... 12
Karzai Says Tribesmen Will Be Recruited To Fight Taliban ... 12
Humvee Armor Linked to Rollovers ... 12
Author Decries Demonstrators Outside Military Hospitals, Funerals ... 13
Critics Say Military Incentives For Immigrant Enlistment Are Exploitative ... 13

DOJ:
DOJ Attorney Returns To Hunton & Williams ... 13

Corporate Scandals:
Democrats Defend Indicted Law Firm ... 13

Criminal Law:
Top Lewis Aide Received $2 Million Buyout From Former Lobbying Firm ... 13
Novak Says Hastert's Reaction To FBI Raid Upset Many GOP Constituents ... 14
Prosecutor's Silence In Duke Rape Case Raises Questions ... 14
Suspect In Clemson Rape-Murder Confesses To More Sex Crimes ... 14
Two Elderly California Women Suspected In Insurance Fraud Scheme ... 15
Former Fumo Aide Resigns From Charity Under FBI, IRS Scrutiny ... 15
29 Indicted In FBI Probe Of Connecticut Garbage Hauling Industry ... 15
Pellicano Assails FBI Probe, Vows Never To "Rat Out" Clients ... 15
Arizona AG To Seek Federal Task Force In Jeffs Case ... 16
USAT Warns That Rising Prison Problems Affect Society ... 16
Prison Rehab Program Ruling Raises Questions About Faith-Based Programs ... 17

Civil Law:
Firms Seek Dismissal Of Thousands Of Asbestos Cases ... 17
Allen Vows To Filibuster Attempt To Crack Down On 527s ... 17

Civil Rights:
WSJournal Says Voting Rights Act Provision Likely Will Be Renewed ... 18

Antitrust:
Arcelor Rejects Hostile Bid By Mittal Steel ... 18
European Shareholder Activists Making Moves On US Firms ... 18
AXA In Talks To Purchase Credit Suisse Unit ... 18
Forbes Criticizes Net Neutrality Legislation ... 18
WSJournal Says Spectrum Auctions Should Proceed Without Interference ... 19

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Western Governors Say States Need To Take Lead On Global Warming ... 19
Mercury Fears Add To Tribe's Woes ... 19
NYTimes Says Washington Should Encourage Green Investments By Business ... 19

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
NJ Man Sentenced To 15 Years For Violent Hijacking Of FBI Employee's Vehicle ... 20

In New Orleans, Doctor Pleads Guilty In Prescription Scheme... 20
Man Facing Meth Charges Also Accused In Hawaii Jewelry Heist ... 20
Accused Gang Members Arrested In Illinois On Drug Charges .. 20
Interim Haitian Prime Minister Claims "Unequaled" Cooperation With DEA ... 20
MLB Considering Suspending Grimsley For Admission Of Drug Use ... 20
California Wrestling Coach Charged With Steroid Possession ... 21

Immigration:

EU-Style Passport-Free Zone Seen Alternative For US-Canadian Border ... 21
Immigration Is Key Issue In Competitive AZ5 Race ... 22
Schwarzenegger Faces Difficult Balance On Immigration ... 22

Tax:

Democrats Said To Be Laying Ground Work For Tax Hike... 23

Congress-Administration:

Administration Launches Effort To Enroll Medicare Drug Beneficiaries ... 23
Business Lobby Pushes GOP On Competitiveness Agenda ... 23
Budget Panels To Take Up Line-Item Veto Proposals ... 23
Hoyer, Murtha To Seek Leadership Posts If Democrats Win House ... 23
Poll Finds Reid Approval Rating At 48% ... 24
House Makes Emailing Offices More Difficult ... 24
OPM To Reexamine Bids To Provide Dental, Vision Benefits ... 24
Bush Personal Aide Profiled ... 24
Administration Seeks To Take Focus Off Bush Poll Numbers ... 24
Conservative Intellectuals Said To Be Rejecting Bush ... 25
Marcus Calls DeLay's Farewell Speech "Sneering, Belligerent." 25
NYTimes Says State Department Should Cover Programs To Train Foreign Militaries ... 25
WSJournal Praises FAA Handling Of NATCA Contract ... 25

Other News:

Fed Keeping Close Eye On Inflation Expectations ... 25
Gasoline Prices Expected To Decline Further ... 25
States Move To Transform Medicaid ... 26
Democrats Lose Ground In Gubernatorial Races ... 26
Reynolds Says CA50 Result Shows Corruption Won't Be Issue In November ... 26
Several Clinton Administration Alumni Seeking Elective Office .. 27
Byrd, In Tough Race, Faces Scrutiny For Votes On Social Issues ... 27
Edwards Leads Clinton In Iowa Caucus Poll ... 27
Herbert Says Ohio Was "Hijacked" From Kerry In 2004 ... 27
Local TV Stations Losing, Viewers, Revenue To Internet ... 27
Growing Number Of Students Finish College Over $100,000 In Debt ... 28
NYTimes Says American Workers Are Downbeat ... 28
Iran Wants Talks, But Balks At Immediate Enrichment Freeze... 28
Latest Gaza Violence Could Derail Both Leaders' Plans ... 29
Major North Korean Missile Test Could Be Imminent ... 29
Domenici Makes Case For India Nuclear Agreement ... 29
Turkish EU Accession Talks In Jeopardy ... 30
Iraq War Casts Pall In Lebanon, Other Middle Eastern Countries30
Somali Warlord Vows To Contest Islamic Militia's Control Of Mogadishu ... 30
Annan Says US Use Of Financial Leverage Could Hurt Reform 30
G-8 Ministers Say China, Emerging Economic Powers Overloading Poor Countries With Debt ... 31
Chinese Ambassador Makes Goodwill Tour Of Midwest ... 31
Disarming Janjaweed Seen As Key To Reaching Peace In Darfur ... 31
Negotiators Debate Russian Investment In US, European Energy Infrastructure ... 31
Slovakian Neo-Liberal Government Seen As Likely To Lose Elections ... 31

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 32

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 33

DOJ_NMG_0032883

TERRORISM NEWS:

Guantanamo Under Scrutiny After Three Detainees Commit Suicide. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 4, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba is coming under more scrutiny tonight after three suicides there on Saturday. The US military says the bodies of two Saudis and a man from Yemen were found in their cells hanging from nooses made from bed sheets and clothing. The military says all three left suicide notes. But an attorney for the victims' relatives says he believes there was a crime committed and says he plans to sue the US Government."

The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Yesterday we reported on the suicides of terror suspects at Guantanamo Bay. Is that issue expected to be on the table at all at" President Bush's war cabinet summit? CBS (Chen) added, "This summit is supposed to be fairly focused on the way forward as White House calls it for Iraq, but clearly there's going to be a lot of pressure on the President to resolve the Guantanamo situation as well."

The New York Times (6/12, Cloud, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Though the Bush administration has been under pressure -- from the United Nations, European countries and the International Committee of the Red Cross -- about the Guantánamo detention center, White House officials did not indicate that they viewed the suicides as a major political problem." The State Department "alerted American embassies in Europe and the Middle East, and asked them to contact government officials. But White House officials said Mr. Bush did not make calls to world leaders. 'We haven't heard much response,' one senior official said." The United Nations was "also notified of the suicides, the White House said."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Richey, Feldmann, 61K) says "the deaths point up a growing dilemma for the Bush administration as it seeks to maintain an array of options in fighting the war on terror in the face of rising domestic and international criticism." Critics of Guantánamo "say the Bush administration appears to have miscalculated. America's tough policies have generated intense criticism among human rights activists both at home and abroad. US allies in Europe as well as the United Nations Committee Against Torture are calling on the US to close the detention camp." The US Supreme Court "is expected this month to rule on whether the administration's plan for military trials at Guantánamo comports with constitutional safeguards and international treaty obligations." The suicides "inject a sense of urgency into questions about US antiterror tactics."

Knight Ridder (6/12, Clark) reports "a key ally of the Bush administration and staunch supporter of the war in Iraq said Sunday that failing to close the Guantanamo Bay prison would compromise the administration's efforts to fight a global war on terror. The assessment from Anders Fogh Rasmussen, the Prime Minister of Denmark, came the day after the first reported suicides of detainees at the post-Sept. 11 prison camp and followed Rasmussen's trip to Camp David with President Bush." In an interview with CNN, Rasmussen "said keeping prisoners behind bars 'without legal proceedings' contradicts US principles."

The AP (6/12, Selsky) reports the Department of Defense "identified the three as Saudi Arabians Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi Al-Utaybi and Yassar Talal Al-Zahrani and Yemeni Ali Abdullah Ahmed. The two Saudis were also identified earlier by Saudi officials. … None of the three had been formally charged. … Only 10 detainees have been charged with crimes and face military tribunals ordered by President Bush." The Washington Post (6/12, Ricks, 744K) runs a similar report.

Knight Ridder (6/12, Rosenberg) says "the quality of the evidence that the government has on the three has never been tested in court." Rather, "the Pentagon's brief descriptions are what has qualified them for indefinite detention as so-called 'enemy combatants,' a war-on-terror category created by the Bush administration. It is not a designation covered by the Geneva Conventions, international agreements on the treatment of prisoners of war."

USA Today (6/12, Walton, 2.31M) notes "the three prisoners found dead at the Guantanamo prison camp Saturday were the first to succeed at suicide, but about two dozen others have tried to kill themselves at the remote US naval base in southeast Cuba. Before Saturday, there had been 41 suicide attempts by 25 prisoners and no deaths since the United States began using the base to house enemy combatants in January 2002, according to Navy Cmdr. J.D. Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman." The prison camp's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, "said the suicides were acts of 'asymmetrical warfare' linked to a 'mystical' belief that the deaths of three detainees would bring the release of the rest."

However, the AP (6/11, Dodds) reports, "Dispirited and desperate prisoners at Guantanamo Bay look to suicide as a way out of a hopeless situation, and not because they seek martyrdom, say three British Muslims once held there. 'There is no hope in Guantanamo. The only thing that goes through your mind day after day is how to get justice or how to kill yourself,' said Shafiq Rasul, 29, who waged a hunger strike while at the camp to protest alleged beatings. 'It is the despair -- not the thought of martyrdom -- that consumes you there.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032884

Cheney's Office Blocked Efforts To Close Guantanamo. Newsweek (6/19) reports in its "Periscope" column that a plan to shut down the Guantanamo prison "had quietly picked up support last year from Pentagon officials, including Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England, but was blocked by Dick Cheney's office. Cheney and others in the White House feared closing Gitmo would be seen as a capitulation to critics. But even before the suicide hangings of the two Saudis and one Yemeni last week, there were signs that Bush himself was having second thoughts."

Time (6/19, Corliss, Zagorin) reports that President Bush "says he wants to 'empty' the Gitmo facility but can't do so until another country agrees to take the inmates without torturing or freeing them. Yet authorities are currently constructing a new, $30 million prison at Gitmo, where they plan to consolidate many of the camp's maximum- and medium-security inmates"

Reed Says Prison Should Be Closed. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, A1, Williams, 958K) also reports on the "the international clamor against the prison continued," and notesone US senator said "it should be closed as soon as possible." Democratic Sen. Jack Reed "said the facility should be closed 'as quickly as possible,' noting that 'as long as Guantanamo exists, it's a source of international attention and concern.'" Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, meanwhile, "said detainees were 'just out there in limbo, and that creates a very difficult situation.' He concluded, 'Where we have evidence, they ought to be tried, and if convicted, they ought to be sentenced.'"

Saudis Allege Dead Detainees Were Tortured. The AP (6/12, Shihri) reports, "The reported suicides of two Saudi detainees at Guantanamo Bay intensified Saudi anger at the camp, drawing questions Sunday about whether the men really killed themselves or were driven to it by torture. The detention of more than 130 Saudis at the U.S. jail has long grated on people in the kingdom, and there was marked skepticism that the prisoners committed suicide. … The kingdom's semiofficial human rights organization called for an independent investigation into the deaths of the two Saudis, who were identified Sunday by Saudi officials as Mani bin Shaman bin Turki al Habradi and Yasser Talal Abdullah Yahya al Zahrani. … Many Saudis denounced the suicide claim as a fabrication, and some accused US authorities of complicity in the inmates' deaths." Saleh al-Khathlan, "director of monitoring at the rights group, explicitly accused Guantanamo officials of torturing detainees."

NYTimes Says Guantanamo Prison "Beyond The Laws Of Civilized Nations." The New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "The news that three inmates at Guantánamo Bay hanged themselves should not have surprised anyone who has paid the slightest attention to the twisted history of the camp that President Bush built for selected prisoners from Afghanistan and antiterrorist operations." It was "the inevitable result of creating a netherworld of despair beyond the laws of civilized nations, where men were to be held without any hope of decent treatment, impartial justice or, in so many cases, even eventual release."

Specter Says He Could Force Phone Companies To Testify About NSA Surveillance.

USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) reports, "Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Sunday that he's ready to force telephone company officials to testify about the National Security Agency warrantless-surveillance program if the Bush administration doesn't cooperate in drafting rules on what's allowable. 'If we don't get some results, I'm prepared to go back to demand hearings and issue subpoenas, if necessary,' Specter said on CNN's Late Edition." Specter "had threatened to subpoena phone company executives to testify about their cooperation with the NSA." But "he said that after talking with Vice President Cheney last week, he's hopeful that hearings and subpoenas can be avoided. Cheney indicated he was willing to work with Congress on new rules governing eavesdropping." The AP (6/12) says Cheney "indicated he was willing to work with Congress on new rules governing eavesdropping." But "he stopped short of promising any action and said a final decision on the bill would be up to President Bush."

Meanwhile, in an editorial titled "NSA Train Wreck," the Washington Post (6/12, A20, 744K) says that "many key lawmakers, including Mr. Specter, have not been briefed fully on what the NSA is doing, so it is way too early to be legislating -- and all the more dangerous not just to tinker but to fundamentally alter the rules."

Specter Says Cheney Phone Call About Wire Taps Was "Step Forward." Appearing on CNN's Late Edition (6/11, Blitzer), Specter said, "Let's make one thing plain. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act provides the exclusive remedy for domestic wiretapping. There's no doubt that law has been violated. Whether the president has inherent Article Two power, constitutionally, which supersedes or trumps the statute, remains to be seen." Asked about his exchange of letters with Vice President Cheney over warrantless wiretapping, Specter said that he is "searching for a way of bringing this matter to a head." He said the Vice President's Thursday phone call to him was "a step forward." Specter said, "[W]e're talking. But if the talks aren't productive, I'm prepared to go back to the hearings and I'm prepared to go back to the subpoenas if necessary."

Specter Won't Give "Amnesty" Over Wiretaps. Specter, asked on CNN's Late Edition (6/11, Blitzer) about a Friday Washington Post (6/9, Pincus, 744K) report that he is ready to give a "blanket amnesty" to anyone who authorized warrantless surveillance, replied, "Absolutely not. That was an erroneous report. If anybody has violated the law, they'll be held accountable, both as to criminal conduct and as to civil conduct. … Take a look at my bill, Wolf. It just doesn't say that."

DOJ_NMG_0032885

Judge To Hear ACLU Challenge To NSA Program. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Weinstein, 958K) reports, "The National Security Agency's controversial domestic surveillance program faces its first major court test today before a veteran federal judge in Detroit. In January, groups including the American Civil Liberties Union and the Michigan branch of the Council on American-Islamic Relations as well as several individuals, who said they feared the government was spying on them, filed a 60-page lawsuit seeking to have the warrantless wiretapping program declared unconstitutional. Among the individuals is James Bamford, author of two books on the NSA." The suit in Detroit, "like one filed in New York by the Center for Constitutional Rights, asserts that the NSA's eavesdropping program has violated free-speech and privacy rights and has had a chilling effect on the communications of potential surveillance targets." The Times adds, "None of the plaintiffs have offered proof they were spied on. Rather, they maintain that the simple existence of the program has impeded their ability to perform their jobs as journalists and lawyers."

NSA Case Centers On Security-Privacy Debate. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/12, Deans) reports, "The Bush administration's domestic surveillance program will be challenged in federal court in Detroit Monday when lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union argue that wiretapping without warrants violates the U.S. Constitution." The AJC continues, "It will be the first time a federal court has reviewed the legality of National Security Agency eavesdropping on phone calls between people in the United States and others overseas with suspected links to terrorist groups." The AJC adds, "The case pits constitutional protection of personal freedoms against tactics employed by President Bush to protect the country against terrorist attack. Whatever decision the district court reaches probably will be appealed and the case is expected to reach the U.S. Supreme Court. … The Justice Department sought to have the case dismissed on the grounds that the legal proceedings have the potential to expose national security secrets. But U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, who will preside over today's oral argument, dismissed the government's contention."

Defense Attorneys Shut Out As Courtroom Secrecy In Terror Cases Grows. The AP (6/12, Robinson) reports, "Witnesses used bogus names, the public was barred from the courtroom and part of the hearing was behind closed doors in the judge's chambers -- with defense lawyers shut out. … 'I don't know what took place back there,' grumbled Michael E. Deutsch, chief defense lawyer for Muhammad Salah, a Chicago man charged with laundering hundreds of thousands of dollars to pay for murders, bombings and other acts of terrorism by the Palestinian militant group Hamas." The AP continues, "Court secrecy is getting tighter across the nation as the government wages war on terrorism, and the recent hearings in Salah's case, set for trial Oct. 12, are just one example, attorneys say. … In Maryland, a federal judge last month dismissed a lawsuit filed by a German man, Khaled al-Masri, who claimed to have been illegally detained and tortured in overseas prisons run by the CIA. After receiving a secret written CIA briefing, the judge ruled that going ahead with a civil trial in the al-Masri case would have exposed state secrets." The AP adds, "The New York Civil Liberties Union is asking an appeals court to order a federal judge in Albany to unseal his decision refusing to toss out charges against alleged money launderers Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain. They say they may have been targets of a warrantless wiretap. The judge's decision came two hours after the government submitted a secret court document. … In Chicago, attorneys for Sami Latchin, a man accused of serving as a 'sleeper agent' in the United States for the Saddam Hussein regime, have asked U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer whether the National Security Agency eavesdropped on his telephone conversations. … Prosecutors say a representative of the Justice Department in Washington will answer the question -- but only in the judge's chambers with defense attorneys not allowed. … Such secret procedures, once rare in American courts, have become more common since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Prosecutors say they need secrecy to protect undercover agents, informants and witnesses from terrorist reprisals and keep critical information pipelines from being shut down. … But defense attorneys say the right of defendants to confront their accusers, guaranteed by the 6th Amendment to the Constitution, is being worn away under the guise of national security."

Media Said To Be Downplaying Links Between Canadian Suspects, Networks. In the Weekly Standard (6/19), Dan Darling says despite "all the uncertainties, a number of media outlets and terrorism analysts, taking a cue from Canadian police, rushed to declare the entire affair the work of homegrown terrorists operating independently of any broader network or organization." Yet "there are good reasons to doubt this view." The "nature of the relationship among the Canadian suspects, their Atlanta counterparts, and any additional accomplices requires further elucidation, as does the nature of any relationship between the younger Abdelhaleen and Mahjoub." With "so many questions unanswered, it is far too soon to rule out connections between the Canadian conspiracy and terrorists abroad. Certainly, much evidence has come to light challenging the view that homegrown terrorism is an entirely insular phenomenon."

DOJ_NMG_0032886

PATRIOT ACT:

SEC, Treasury Mull How To Apply Patriot Act To Hedge Funds. Business Week (6/19, Der Hovanesian) reports when "drug runners and terrorists want to park illicit cash, there may be no better haven than hedge funds. Despite tough new anti-money laundering standards put out by U.S. regulators for banks, mutual fund companies, insurers, and money transmitters, the highly secretive hedge fund industry has no restrictions whatsoever." For "more than three years, the Securities & Exchange Commission and the Treasury Dept. have been discussing how to include hedge funds in the USA Patriot Act, the 2001 legislation designed to protect against terrorism. Yet during that time, the $1.3 trillion hedge fund industry has collected record amounts of cash, some of which could well be from questionable sources."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Fake ID Used To Enter DHS Headquarters. The Washington Times (6/12, Dinan, 90K) reports Bruce DeCell, a member of 9/11 Families for a Secure America, used "a fake Matricula Consular card as identification" to enter DHS headquarters for a meeting with officials Wednesday. The card, which "federal rules…say…is not valid ID at government buildings," lists DeCell's "address as '123 Fraud Blvd.' on an incorrectly spelled 'Staton Island, NY.'" DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen "said the department shouldn't have allowed the ID to be used for entry to its headquarters," but that "DeCell's group went through metal detectors and other routine security screening and had an escort at all times while in the building."

Study Finds Arab-Americans Mistrust Police Since 9/11. The New York Times (6/12, Elliott, 1.19M) reports, "In the aftermath of Sept. 11, Arab-Americans have a greater fear of racial profiling and immigration enforcement than of falling victim to hate crimes, according to a national study financed by the Justice Department." The study also "concluded that local police officers and federal agents were straining under the pressure to fight terrorism, and that new federal policies in this effort were poorly defined and inconsistently applied." The Times adds, "The two-year study, released today by the Vera Institute of Justice, explored the changed relationship between Arab-Americans and law enforcement in the years since the 2001 terrorist attacks. The Vera Institute is a nonprofit policy research center based in New York. … Both Arab-American community leaders and law enforcement officials interviewed in the study said that cooperation between both groups had suffered from a lack of trust."

"Technicalities" Leaving New Orleans Homeowners Without Enough To Rebuild. The AP (6/12, Callimachi) reports that in an "all-too-common" situation for New Orleans homeowners whose houses were "disemboweled nine months ago by Hurricane Katrina," some "are finding that technicalities are keeping them from securing enough from their insurers to rebuild." Consumer advocates say the industry has used "numerous exclusions to reduce payouts," leaving homeowners with "two choices: Give up and leave, or else rebuild by hand, using their savings to pay for labor and materials." And while politicians had blamed New Orleans residents for not purchasing "federal flood insurance on top of their homeowners policies," Gulf Coast recovery czar Donald Powell's office has "found few communities were better insured against flooding."

Tropical Storm Alberto "Could Indicate A Repeat Of Last Year's Pattern." USA Today (6/12, Kasindorf, 2.31M) reports Tropical Storm Alberto, the first "since the devastating 2005 hurricane season," has placed much of Florida's Gulf Coast under a tropical storm watch, with the National Hurricane Center forecasting "up to 10 inches of rain…over the area through Tuesday. Alberto could make landfall over western Florida on Tuesday or could weaken and dissipate at sea, hurricane center forecaster Richard Pasch said." USA Today adds that the storm, "which occurred early, could indicate a repeat of last year's pattern, when Tropical Storm Arlene formed June 9 and Bret on June 28."

Storm Unlikely To Strengthen. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 5, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The fringes of tropical storm Alberto are beginning to sweep across south Florida. Top winds at 45 miles per hour and Alberto is not expected to strengthen into a hurricane."

New Model To Help Scientists Predict Storm Intensity. The Washington Post (6/12, A19, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Scientists at the National Hurricane Center" in Miami are hoping to improve "their record in predicting storm intensity" with what has been "described as 'next generation' in tropical storm forecasting." The Hurricane Weather Research and Forecast Model "will envision the full three-dimensional hurricane, the circulation at its core and the varying winds from its bottom to its top, several miles up." The Post adds, "Predicting storm intensity is considered a critical challenge among forecasters because so many people depend upon forecasts of intensity to determine whether to flee an oncoming storm."

DOJ_NMG_0032887

WAR NEWS:

White House Convenes War Cabinet Summit On Iraq. President Bush meets at Camp David today and on Tuesday with members of the war cabinet and other Administration officials to reexamine the US strategy in Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight the White House is moving quickly to make the most of last week's good news out of Iraq. With Zarqawi's death the Bush Administration is gearing up to talk strategy hosting a two-day summit that gets underway tomorrow." CBS (Chen) added, "The President made a quick stop at White House before heading back to Camp David where he spent most weekend prepping for a low-profile high-stakes summit on Iraq capped off by a joint US-Iraqi cabinet meeting through video hookup with Baghdad." The President is "walking a fine line capitalizing on the latest successes in Iraq while trying to persuade Americans US forces are still needed there." This is "a critical moment for both Baghdad and Washington. One official here is quoted as saying today this is a last best chance to get things right but clearly, Russ, that's not an easy job."

NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The question is whether the President is considering a plan that would reduce the number of US troops there." NBC (Corke) added, "US troop levels among the many topics to be discussed this week as the President looks to his closest advisors for a progress report on the war. With al-Zarqawi dead and the new Iraqi government in place, the President this week is calling together his war advisors to chart the course in Iraq. On the table, troop reductions."

Knight Ridder (6/12, Hutcheson) reports on President Bush and his team's upcoming two-day session at Camp David "to plan their next moves in Iraq." The article says that the conference "is not expected to produce any policy shifts or major new initiatives. The issue of troop withdrawals isn't even on the agenda." Gen. George Casey says that he might ask, though he is not planning to do so, for additional troops if "he concludes they are needed to get control of" Baghdad.

Congress Keeping Watch On President's Iraq Summit. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Corke, 9.87M) reported, "And as the President and his advisors map out a military plan, some wonder whether there's another way." Rep. Jane Harman, California: "My bottom line is this is a political problem now, it's not a military problem. The US military presence is part of the problem. It's not part of the solution." Corke: "And as we head into this very important meeting, Democrats and Republicans on the Hill will be watching very closely to see which direction the Administration takes to address the problems on the ground in Iraq. And keep in mind this week the Senate will decide whether to authorize more war spending, and of course the House will also debate this issue."

DNSA O'Sullivan Called Central To Bush's Thinking. The New York Times (6/12, Bumiller, 1.19M) profiles Deputy National Security Adviser Meghan O'Sullivan, "who is largely unknown outside the administration, but who colleagues say is instrumental in shaping" President Bush's "views" on stabilization efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan. With NSA Hadley, O'Sullivan "briefs the president in person on Iraq up to several times a week. … She coordinates the political, security and reconstruction efforts for Iraq throughout the agencies of the government. Not least, she briefs the president before all of his phone calls and meetings with Iraqi leaders. Although Ms. O'Sullivan does not make major decisions — the administration's policy is run by" Ambassador Khalilzad and Secretary Rice — "she is important because of her closeness to the president and her role in helping to form his thinking." The Times continues, "Colleagues say that Ms. O'Sullivan holds to the view, reflected in the president's public statements, that rebuilding Iraq's civic institutions and persuading Iraqis to accommodate one another politically is a way out of the sectarian violence. She is more optimistic about the political process than others in the administration. … The question that even her supporters raise is whether she is too close to see the landscape of problems."

Top General In Iraq Predicts Coalition Will Be Able To Reduce Troop Level In Iraq. On CBS's Face the Nation, Gen. George Casey predicted that the US and its coalition partners would gradually be able to reduce troop levels in Iraq, notwithstanding Administration efforts to lower expectations for bringing the troops home. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Chen, 7.66M) reported, "Ahead of the summit the White House has firmly slapped down suggestions it could lead to troop drawdown even as top military officials signal growing confidence in Iraqi forces." Gen. George Casey: "We think by summer 57% of the Iraqi brigades will be in the lead and we think by the end of the year almost all the Iraqi divisions will be capable of leading."

NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Corke, 9.87M) quoted Gen. Casey: "I think that as long as the Iraqi security forces continue to progress and as long as this national unity government continues to operate that way and move the country forward, I think we're going to be able to see continued gradual reductions of Coalition forces over the coming months and into next year." Corke: "But the President appeared to be trying to lower expectations when it comes to bringing troops home."

The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Barnes, Stack, 958K) reports "Casey's comments on televised public-affairs shows underscored an inherent tension in the military's position." The United States "suddenly finds itself with a chance to build on its military blow against al-Qaida in Iraq at the same time it could take advantage of the political stability offered by Iraq's new government to reduce the US presence. … For months, the Pentagon has suggested that Casey would be in a position this spring to recommend further cuts in the U.S. troop deployment, reductions that began last December when orders for two brigades were canceled." But "the long wrangling over who would become Iraq's prime minister and who would fill the posts of defense and interior minister, along with continued violence in Iraq, forced Casey and Pentagon officials to put off decisions about whether to hold back additional brigades." The AP (6/11, Pickler) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0032888

Iraqi National Security Adviser Says Most Foreign Troops Will Be Gone By 2009. The Washington Times (6/12, Pfeiffer, 90K) notes "Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak Rubaie went further, giving both a number and a prediction of how soon most US troops will have left his country." Appearing on CNN's Late Edition (6/11, Blitzer), Mowaffak al-Rubaie said that by the end of this year, "I believe that the number of the multinational forces will be probably less than 100,000 in this country." He also predicted, "by the middle of 2008, we will not see a lot of visibility" of the multinational forces in the cities or towns." He said "the overwhelming majority of the multinational forces will leave, probably before the before the middle of 2008." Asked about al-Rubaie's prediction of troop reductions before the end of the year, Army Brigadier General Mark Kimmitt, the deputy director for plans and policy of the US military's Central Command, said, "If we continue to make progress militarily, if this new unity government comes together and is able to bring in more and more of the disinfected Iraqis that have not felt part of this process, I can see a plausible scenario where the numbers could go down, perhaps as much as Mowaffak has said."

McCaffrey Says Current Pace Of Iraq Deployment Risks "Breaking The Force." Appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (6/11, Russert), NBC News analyst and retired General Barry McCaffrey said the US does not have "an adequate military to sustain this operational pace" in Iraq. McCaffrey said, "the Army is 80,000 soldiers short; the Marines are 25,000 people short. SOCOM is under huge stress, and we aren't resourced to continue this effort. And we've got to make up our mind: Do we want to pay for the kind of strategy that we're prosecuting or not?" McCaffrey said "we've got to draw down and pretty soon, maybe 50,000 to 100,000 troops by next summer" and that "otherwise we risk breaking the force."

Harman Calls For Rumsfeld's Ouster, Redeployment Of Forces Out Of Iraq. Rep. Jane Harman, on Fox News Sunday (6/11, Wallace), said that Bush should fire Rumsfeld and announce "that he is going to start now asking the generals to redeploy our troops because going forward the U.S. objectives -- and we have at least three of them -- can best be achieved politically, not militarily." Harman said the US should start to move its forces out of Iraq and put "some into Kuwait and Jordan." She said "while we're part of the political solution, we're also part of the military problem." Harman called Zarqawi's death "a great achievement, wonderful police work." However, she said, "It won't reduce the insurgency, I don't believe."

Batiste Assails Rumsfeld. In a Knight Ridder op-ed (6/11), retired Gen. John Batiste criticizes Secretary Rumsfeld for "poor decisions and bad judgment in 2003 and 2004." Specifically, he faults Rumsfeld for using too few troops to secure the country and defeat the insurgency, an error compounded by shutting down the Iraqi military, which "gave the insurgency" manpower, weapons, and ammunition. Batiste argues, "The secretary of defense does not understand the human dimension of warfare ... Based upon all the above, the secretary of defense is not a competent wartime leader. He knows everything, except how to win. He surrounds himself with like-minded and compliant subordinates who do not grasp the importance of the principles of war, the complexities of Iraq or the human dimension of warfare."

Kristol Calls For Bush To Challenge Casey, Abizaid. On Fox News Sunday (6/11, Wallace), the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "if General Abizaid and General Casey say we've got it under control, steady as usual, I think the president needs to say I want you to rethink that. He needs to get other generals to second- guess them, because that's what all successful presidents have done in war. I have nothing against Abizaid and Casey, but it cannot be steady as it goes." Kristol said he hopes that at Camp David Bush "really rethinks the war, rethinks troop levels, and challenges Abizaid and Casey to really give him a strategy for victory."

Administration Strikes Tone Of "Tempered Optimism" In Wake Of Zarqawi's Death. Newsweek (6/19, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi's is "the first good news about the insurgency in months, and the President and his advisers know they risk squandering it if they were to gloat. … Announcing Zarqawi's death at the White House, Bush was solemn." Newsweek adds, "The new cautious, low-key approach is part of a larger White House strategy to win back voters' trust in Bush's Iraq plan -- and in Bush himself, whose public-approval ratings are languishing in the basement."

As part of its cover package, Time (6/19, Carney, Allen) reports "as White House speechwriters went to work on the remarks the President would deliver from the Rose Garden" following Abu Musab al Zarqawi's death, "they tried to strike a tone of 'tempered optimism,' according to an aide who worked on the speech. When Bush appeared before the cameras, he sounded muted, speaking of his hope that the death of Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi would allow Iraq's infant government to 'turn the tide' of a war that could still mar Bush's presidency." Bush "wisely shunned any predictions about how much good would come from al-Zarqawi's elimination. But the sense of elation in the US command was impossible to contain."

DOJ_NMG_0032889

Zarqawi's Death Exposes "Messy Breech" Among Bush Aides. As part of its cover package, Time (6/19, Carney, Allen) reports that Zarqawi's death "has forced the Administration to confront a messy breach emerging among top aides. While some officials believe the US should maintain its troop strength for the foreseeable future, others have argued that the Administration should capitalize on any improvements in the situation to accelerate the handover to Iraqis. Administration aides tell TIME that West Wing officials had hoped to reduce the number of troops in Iraq from today's 129,000 to about 100,000 by the end of the year, and possibly before the midterm congressional elections. But the country's slide toward an all-out civil war in recent months had begun to convince them that a drawdown anytime soon would not be feasible."

Officials Note Dissension Among Zarqawi Followers. Time (6/19, MacLeod, Powell) reports in its cover package that a Jordanian security official says that in the wake of the attack, "members of al-Zarqawi's organization in Iraq launched a series of interrogations in search of those who sold out their leader, leading Jordanian officials to hope that the hit is already causing dissension in jihadist ranks."

Zarqawi Death Unlikely To Stop Flow Of Jihadists Into Iraq. In a separate story, U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Kaplan) reports, "Zarqawi's lasting legacy may be his role as lightning rod to the global jihad movement. … Although Zarqawi is history, few experts believe the flow of jihadists into Iraq will cease. Worse, they warn, these new foreign legionnaires are gaining skills in urban war fighting and terrorism -- skills they will take with them when they return home."

Khalilzad Suggests US May Negotiate With Some Insurgent Leaders. Newsweek (6/19, Nordland, Hirsh) reports that Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador in Iraq, "sees a 'big opportunity'" in Zarqawi's death. Khalilzad's "implicit message to Iraq's Sunni insurgents and sympathizers is this: it's safe to come out now, and maybe even act civilly toward your fellow Iraqis among the Shiites. … In an interview with NEWSWEEK, Khalilzad went further than he has before in suggesting that the US administration and new Iraqi government are willing to negotiate directly with some insurgent leaders. 'The elements of reconciliation are there,' Khalilzad said."

Lawmakers See Domestic Political Opportunity In Zarqawi's Death. Newsweek (6/19, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that lawmakers "saw a domestic political opening in Zarqawi's death, and unlike Bush they didn't waste much time trying to find just the right words to express their feelings." Democrats were sure to lace their comments about Zarqawi with praise for the soldiers who killed him -- and reluctant credit for Bush. But Republicans don't intend to let the triumphant moment pass without using it to their advantage."

Extent Of Benefit From Zarqawi's Death Questioned. U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Whitelaw) reports that the airstrike that killed Zarqawi was "the culmination of one of the longest, most intense manhunts ever conducted by the US military. … Working under U.S. Special Forces Command, hundreds of operatives and analysts from the nation's most elite military and intelligence units…worked around the clock to find Zarqawi." However, US News notes that the "level of effort that went into tracking down Zarqawi… belies the extent of the benefit that may result from his death." Zarqawi "was responsible for some of the most horrific attacks in Iraq since the US invasion," but "his followers were only a small part of the predominantly indigenous insurgency that has been impeding the US effort to rebuild Iraq."

Newsweek (6/19, Thomas, Nordland) reports in its cover story that Zarqawi's death "may turn out to be a turning point in the long, frustrating war on terror. … But no one expects the Iraqi insurgency to miraculously vanish, or even significantly abate, in the weeks ahead. If anything, Zarqawi's martyrdom may cause a new surge of killing."

Zarqawi Briefly Survived Bombing. Newsweek (6/19, Thomas, Nordland) reports in its cover story that when US and Iraqi troops located Zarqawi after the safe house in which he was hiding was bombed, "Zarqawi was still alive." He "was still breathing, barely, and muttering prayers."

Time (6/19, MacLeod, Powell) reports in its cover package, "A special-ops exploitation team trained to glean intelligence from raids arrived with photos, fingerprint smudges and descriptions of the scars and tattoos on his body, much of which had been supplied by Jordanian intelligence. As the team began examining him, according to Caldwell, al-Zarqawi muttered something and tried to 'turn away off the stretcher.' He was quickly 'resecured' and died of his wounds shortly thereafter."

Zarqawi Said To Have Created "New Type Of Terrorist." As part of its cover package, Time (6/19, Ghosh) reports that Zarqawi "had not only rewritten the history of the insurgency in Iraq but also bequeathed to the world a deadly new type of terrorist. While Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri issued impotent threats from their hideouts, al-Zarqawi got his hands bloody in Iraq, turning it into the holy war's primary battlefield. … As the insurgency unfolded, al-Zarqawi articulated and then acted upon an ideology more forbidding and toxic than even bin Laden may have imagined."

Zarqawi Autopsy Results Withheld. The AP (6/11, Quinn) reports the completion of the autopsy on Zarqawi; however, it notes that "officials were awaiting the results of a DNA test" before releasing the autopsy results. The article notes the initial confusion about how long Zarqawi lived after the airstrike and the uncorroborated claim by a local named "Mohammad" that "he saw U.S. soldiers after the airstrike beating an injured man who resembled the dead terrorist leader until blood flowed from his nose." It quotes Gen. George Casey as calling the allegation "ludicrous." The New York Times (6/12, Oppel, 1.19M) quotes Gen. Casey, this time calling it "baloney." It also cites a second Arab witness who spoke to Al Jazeera and "suggested that American soldiers tore open [Zarqawi's] clothing in what appeared an effort to revive him."

DOJ_NMG_0032890

Asked on Fox News Sunday (6/11, Wallace) about an Iraqi man's claim that he saw Zarqawi being beaten before he died, Casey said, "That's baloney, and we've already gone back, looked at it. Our soldiers who came on the scene found him being put in an ambulance by Iraqi police. They took him off, rendered first aid, and he expired. And so he died while American soldiers were attempting to save his life."

Iran Says It Welcomes Zarqawi's Death. Another AP article (6/12, Quinn) reports, "Iran denied it had helped American forces to find Zarqawi. The Islamic republic welcomed his death, though, because it has close ties to the Shi'ite parties now dominating Iraq's government, which Zarqawi had sought to topple." It quotes Maj. Gen. William Caldwell as saying that the US government though the questions about Zarqawi's death urgent enough that "that we grabbed two people in the last 48 hours and told them pack up and move to Iraq."

Iraqi Official Describes Breakthrough Leading To Airstrike. USA Today (6/12, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "The airstrike that killed al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was made possible by a breakthrough in penetrating his secretive group, Iraq's national security adviser said Sunday. A shakedown of the organization continues, he said." Mouwafak al-Rubaie called killing Zarqawi a "paradigm shift" in the Iraq war and "said credit for the operation goes to Iraq's intelligence service and information-sharing between U.S. and Iraqi forces."

Antiterror Forces Will Tackle Zarqawi's Global Web Next. The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Peterson, 61K) reports in a positively toned piece that the "treasure trove" found in the ruins of Zarqawi's safe house will enable authorities to reach as far as Europe: "the information could potentially be in league with that gleaned from the fall of Kabul in 2001 or the capture of Al Qaeda operational mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed in Pakistan in 2003, experts say." It quotes a Singaporean expert as saying, "Zarqawi had penetrated at least 20 European countries, Canada, ... and even established cells in Southeast Asia."

Bremer Says US Should Use "Whatever Force Necessary" To Capitalize On Zarqawi's Death. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 2, 2:10, Chen, 7.66M) reported, "With the momentum created by Zarqawi's death some question whether the time is right to stamp out Iraqi insurgency with more US troops. The former top US diplomat in Baghdad today said US military commanders should have whatever force is necessary to get the job done." Paul Bremer, former Coalition Administrator in Iraq: "Whether that means more or fewer troops or where we deploy the troops, I don't know, but I do believe it's important that that be the outcome."

Administration Strategy Of Personalizing Insurgency Seen As Masking Its Scope. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 2, 2:50, Corke, 9.87M) reported the Iraqi insurgency was "dealt a severe, though far from lethal, blow with the death of al Qaeda's al-Zarqawi." Roger Cressey, NBC News terrorism analyst: "The Administration tried to personalize the issues in Iraq and with al Qaeda in terms of individuals, making bin Laden, Saddam and Zarqawi the symbol of what we are dealing with, when in fact the real challenge is a movement in terms of al Qaeda and a broader insurgency well beyond what Zarqawi's capability is."

Al Qaeda In Iraq Vows To Continue. The CBS Evening News (6/11, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Four days after US forces killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi there are new threats this evening from those loyal to the terrorist leader. While those threats include more violence, US military officials insist the insurgency is 'hurting.'" CBS (Palmer) added, "Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's organization promised 'more earth-shattering operations that would convulse the enemy and rob him of his sleep.'"

NBC Nightly News (6/11, lead story, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "A new warning from al Qaeda in Iraq tonight: The terror group released a statement on the Internet declaring its allegiance to Osama bin Laden and threatening more attacks. Despite the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al Qaeda claimed his death would not stop their operations." NBC (Maceda) added, "Four days after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death, more drive-by shootings, roadside and car bombs, the violence perhaps lacking Zarqawi's hallmark brutality, but at least another 30 Iraqis were killed today. Meanwhile, two US military forensic specialists in lethal blast wounds completed an autopsy on Zarqawi. Results are expected to be made public here tomorrow. This evening, an alleged member of the al Qaeda network called into to Al-Jazeera TV to confirm that so far a successor to Zarqawi has yet to be named. But there was a vow of more major attacks."

The Washington Post (6/12, Partlow, 744K) reports, "Al-Qaeda in Iraq reiterated its faith in Osama bin Laden on Sunday and vowed to carry out attacks that would "shake the earth underneath the enemy.'" The article notes Gen. George Casey's view that the Zarqawi group was "hurt badly" by its leader's death, but it reports, "Four car bombs exploded in Baghdad over a four-hour period in a fiery reminder of the insurgents' capabilities." It also states, "Some terrorism experts had predicted an upsurge in retaliatory killing by members of al-Qaeda in Iraq after Zarqawi's assassination."

DOJ_NMG_0032891

Kristol Says Retreat From Iraq Would Give Zarqawi Posthumous Victory. In his Weekly Standard column (6/19), William Kristol asks, "what are the implications for the war in Iraq" of the killing of Abu Musab al Zarqawi? That "depends on some factors that we can't yet know with any confidence -- the resilience of al Qaeda's leadership in Iraq, for one thing, and the true sentiment among the Sunnis of Iraq. But it also depends on what we do. Do we take advantage of this opportunity politically and militarily? Do we pursue the enemy aggressively now when it may be rattled and divided? Or do we do look on this as an excuse to begin to get out--as John Kerry and many others are already advocating? If we do the latter, we will give Zarqawi a victory in death that he could not achieve in life." What "needs to be done now seems clear: a renewed offensive to wipe out what remains of Zarqawi's organization and to defeat the insurgency."

Media Said To Largely Ignore Zarqawi's Pre-2003 Operations In Baathist Iraq. In the Weekly Standard (6/19), Stephen Hayes says, "Many news stories" about Zarqawi's death "simply left out the fact that Zarqawi and his associates were operating openly in Baathist Iraq for months before the U.S. invasion in March 2003. Others went further. Associated Press writer Patrick Quinn suggested that Bush administration claims that Zarqawi was a link between Iraq and al Qaeda were deceptive. 'The myth-building around al Zarqawi began even before the war started in March 2003,' he wrote. 'A month earlier, then-Secretary of State Colin Powell told the U.N. Security Council that al Zarqawi's presence in Iraq was proof of Saddam Hussein's links to al Qaeda. That claim was later debunked by U.S. intelligence officials.'" Hayes adds, "That's wrong. Not only was the claim never 'debunked,' it was confirmed by the Senate Intelligence Committee's July 2004 review of pre-Iraq war intelligence."

Defense Lawyers Defend Haditha Marines' Actions. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 3, 1:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "For the first time, a sergeant in charge on the ground in Haditha that day is revealing his version of the events. Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich's attorney, in an interview with the Washington Post, said Marines did follow the rules of engagement and he says the civilian deaths were the result of a house-to-house hunt that went tragically wrong and not a vengeful massacre." Attorney Neal A. Puckett,: "I can tell you that the method by which they cleared the houses, the first two houses that they went inside, were according to their training. Basically, the houses had been declared a hostile environment, and in a hostile environment, you assume that the bad guys are inside, and you're allowed to protect yourself by any means necessary. They felt that bad guys were on the other side of the door. They bust the door down, throw a grenade inside, and then go in shooting. And that's what happened in two rooms, one in each of two houses, and unfortunately, it resulted in civilian deaths."

The Los Angeles Times (6/11, Perry, 958K) reports that the Haditha suspects' attorneys "said Sunday their clients did nothing wrong and were only following the military's rules on how to combat armed insurgents hiding inside of homes." The attorneys say both that their clients upheld rules of engagement and that perhaps the rules are questionable for the intense situation the Marines encountered: "'I believe the real question is not whether the conduct of these young guys was appropriate,' said Gary Myers ..., 'but rather if those who established the rules of engagement acted appropriately in defining those rules.'" The article, though quotes locals who dispute that version: "Iraqis in Haditha insist the Marines were screaming in anger when they stormed the houses and that they gunned down children, women and an elderly man in a wheelchair, knowing that they posed no threat." It also reports, "Pictures of the dead bodies taken by a Marine intelligence unit have convinced investigators that the Iraqis were shot at close-range, some 'execution style.'"

Anbar, Haditha Challenges To Marines Described. The Washington Times (6/12, Scarborough, 90K) reports on the difficulties and dangers of patrolling Anbar province. In a piece favoring the Marines' perspective, it states, "Anbar's Sunni Muslim residents mostly have been hospitable to these bands of jihadis led by Abu Musab Zarqawi, who was killed Wednesday in a U.S. air strike in Diyala province. The locals provided the terrorists with a garage or spare bedroom to hide and make their bombs, and to lay in wait for patrolling Marines." It also contends that Marines in Anbar have to fight an enemy willing to kill its own children in order to kill Americans. The Times reports "strict rules of engagement" controlling the Marines and quotes an officer who says, "Marines today have to fill out more paperwork and statements after they use force than cops on the streets of Philadelphia."

In Wake Of Haditha Killings, Military Implements Ethics, Values Training. U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Mulrine) reports that "any allegations of US military misconduct -- most notably the reported execution-style killing of 24 civilians at Haditha by several marines -- set back efforts to win the confidence of ordinary Iraqis." US News adds that the US military, which is implementing "a remedial program of ethics and values training" is trying to turn Haditha "into a teachable moment." American trainers at the Iraqi Center for Military Values, Principles, and Leadership "are preparing to launch a new academy to instruct Iraqi officers in leadership. A list of principles, posted for the benefit of the Iraqi officers who will be attending the institute starting next month, hangs on the wall."

DOJ_NMG_0032892

House Will Debate Iraq. Roll Call (6/12, Pershing) reports, "The House will gear up this week for what could be one of its most significant debates in several years, as the chamber spends much of Thursday considering a Republican-crafted resolution on Iraq." Observers say that the resolution will seek to tie Iraq and the war on terror: "The resolution's language linking the two issues makes it likely that many Democrats will vote against it, though some may be hesitant to vote against any measure that calls for supporting the troops."

Reid Seeks More Intelligence Oversight On Iran Policy. The AP (6/11, Ritter) reports, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid made a pitch Saturday to enlist bloggers as a Democratic force in upcoming elections, and said he'll ask Congress for stiffer reporting requirements for the president and the intelligence community." It describes his planned bill: "Reid's proposed bill, called the Iran Intelligence Oversight Act, would require an updated national intelligence estimate on Iran, with an unclassified summary made public. It also would require the president to report to Congress his objectives and strategies for Iran. The administration's national intelligence director would have to show Congress that he has a process in place for reviewing administration officials' statements and ensuring they are consistent with the work of professional intelligence analysts."

Iraqi Government Releases Second Batch Of Prisoners From Abu Ghraib. The CBS Evening News (6/11, lead story, 2:50, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "The second batch of prisoners to be released in a week boarded buses at infamous Abu Ghraib jail bound for home. For many this is their first taste of freedom in months. For some years. Most of these men are Sunnis, arrested on suspicion of involvement in the insurgency but never charged. Their release is a peace offering by Iraq's government anxious to win the support of hard-line Sunnis." USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) and the AP (6/11, Gamel) also report the story.

Krugman Defends Democrats Who Opposed Iraq War. In the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M), Paul Krugman disputes the existence of much-derided "Some Democrats," who he argues are unjustly attacked by Republicans and pundits as "anti-American" and "weak on national security." Krugman argues that actual Democrats who made allegedly inflammatory statements cannot be found and that in any case the critics of the Iraq war were right: "They're ... misrepresenting the views and motives of those who had the good sense and courage to oppose this war."

Karzai Says Tribesmen Will Be Recruited To Fight Taliban. USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) reports, "Afghan President Hamid Karzai said Sunday that his government will recruit local tribesmen to fight the biggest increase in Taliban violence in years. 'We just want to strengthen the districts to safeguard them from terrorist attack,' Karzai said." Karim Rahimi, Karzai's spokesman, "said the plan will not fuel factional fighting because the recruits will be 'community police' loyal to the government."

The Washington Post (6/12, A15, Shah, 744K) reports Karzai said, "We just want to strengthen the districts to safeguard them from terrorist attack." The Post adds, "Western diplomats briefed on the plan expressed concern that the effort could fuel factional fighting by arming forces loyal to warlords with long histories of factional disputes. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic."

UK Soldier Killed In Afghanistan As Taliban Resurgence Continues. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 3, 1:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "In Afghanistan a British soldier was killed today as a Taliban offense in the south refocuses attention on that war. More than 500 people, mostly militants, died over three weeks since mid-May in the worst fighting since the Taliban's fall in 2001. US forces launched 750 air strikes last month. That's a big jump since last year. Not long ago the US thought it had the Taliban on the ropes, what's going on?" CBS (van Dyke) added, "What happened is the United States started to focus on Iraq instead of Afghanistan. We went in with 30,000 soldiers after 9/11 and went primarily to hunt for al-Qaeda, to a lesser degree the Taliban. After that the US and its allies and Japan began to put billions of dollars into Afghanistan. The trouble is there's a lot of corruption, security became an issue and the Taliban watched from the side. They never changed their ideology and have started to come back." NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 8, 0:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) also reported on the violence in Afghanistan.

Humvee Armor Linked to Rollovers. The AP (6/12) reports, "Thousands of pounds of armor added to military Humvees in Iraq have made the vehicles more likely to roll over and kill or injure soldiers, a newspaper reported. 'I believe the up-armoring has caused more deaths than it has saved,' Scott Badenoch, a former Delphi Corp. vehicle dynamics expert, told the Dayton Daily News for its Sunday editions." The Dayton Daily News stated that the M1114 was the most dangerous Humvee: "An analysis of the Army's ground-accident database, which includes records from March 2003 through November 2005, found that 60 of the 85 soldiers who died in Humvee accidents in Iraq -- or about 70 percent -- were killed when the vehicle rolled, the newspaper said."

DOJ_NMG_0032893

Author Decries Demonstrators Outside Military Hospitals, Funerals. In a New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) op-ed, author Karen Spears Zacharias asks antiwar demonstrators to show mourners "some respect." She pleads, "March to the steps of Congress and the White House. Shout your protests at the president who drummed up this war. But grant some peace to the men and women trying to heal in our military hospitals, and the families grieving at funerals and memorials. Haven't we earned a moment of silence?"

Critics Say Military Incentives For Immigrant Enlistment Are Exploitative. NBC Nightly News (6/11, story 7, 2:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "'How far is too far when it comes to military recruiting? With US forces stretched thin around the globe, critics say immigrants are being exploited by tempting offers of citizenship." NBC (Mullen) added, "Fernandos Juarez Del Salar never supported the war in Iraq, but he was proud when his son, Jesus, joined the Marines. After all, the recruiters promised money for college, a bright future for his son, and citizenship for family." But when Corporal Suarez "was killed in Iraq in 2003, his father became active against recruiting in the Latino community." Juarez Del Salar: "I believe the recruiting system in United States is very strong against the immigrant community." Mullen: "Of the more than 2400 US casualties in Iraq since 2003, 270 have been Latino. Staff Sergeant Rodrigo Lopez, a US Army recruiter, works the schools in South Central Los Angeles, armed with new benefits." Staff Sergeant Rodrigo Lopez, US Army recruiter: "A lot of non-citizen, green card-holding applicants have actually asked about the expedited citizenship process." Mullen: "An executive order issued by the White House allows non-citizens serving in the US military to apply for citizenship after only one day of active duty. Hispanics make up 13% of all new recruits. In the last four years, nearly 24,000 active duty soldiers were made US citizens."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Returns To Hunton & Williams. The Washington Post (6/12, D04) reports, "Hunton & Williams LLP said Wendell L. Taylor rejoined the firm's D.C. office as a partner in the global competition practice group after a stint at the Justice Department." The Post continues, "Since leaving the firm in 2004, Taylor had served as counsel to the deputy attorney general -- with responsibilities including the antitrust division, the tax division and the civil division -- and then handled criminal trials as special assistant U.S. attorney in the District, the firm said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Democrats Defend Indicted Law Firm. Four House Democrats last week released a statement condemning last month's indictment of the securities class action law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman. The New York Times (6/12, Creswell, 1.19M) reports that the statement, signed by Reps. Charles Rangel, Carolyn McCarthy, Gary Ackerman and Robert Wexler, says, "The Justice Department's crusade against trial lawyers, the first line in the average citizen's protection against corporate greed, has taken a new low in the indictment of an entire leading law firm in the plaintiffs' bar."

Former Milberg Weiss Partners Seek Capital, Unpaid Fees. The New York Law Journal (6/12, Lin) reports, "As the legal community ponders whether the criminal indictment of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman will eventually lead to that firm's dissolution, two of its former partners are arguing that the firm actually dissolved two years ago at the time of its bi-coastal split. They claim they are now owed millions of dollars in returned capital and unpaid fees as a result." The Journal continues, "If the timing of the claims is awkward, the identity of the ex-partners making them is more so. They are Alan Schulman and Robert P. Sugarman, both of whom have been widely reported to be key cooperating witnesses in the prosecution's case against the firm over the alleged payment of kickbacks to class action plaintiffs." The Journal adds, "It is unclear if and how the two matters will proceed together. The lawyers representing the two sides in the monetary dispute both said Friday they were not aware of their clients' strategies in the criminal case. But one source close to the investigation said the ex-partners' claims showed they had a strong financial interest in 'bringing the whole firm down.' … The survival of the firm has indeed been called into question by the indictment last month of the firm and individual partners David J. Bershad and Steven G. Schulman, who is not related to Alan Schulman. Several lawyers and clients have left the firm since the announcement of criminal charges, increasing parallels with accounting firm Arthur Andersen, which was obliterated by defections months before its trial on criminal charges relating to work it performed for Enron Corp. .. Both Alan Schulman and Sugarman have been cooperating with federal prosecutors in Los Angeles for some time, said the source close to the investigation. The two partners first raised the money issue with the firm in February 2005."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Top Lewis Aide Received $2 Million Buyout From Former Lobbying Firm. Roll Call (6/12, Kane, Bresnahan) reports Jeff Shockey, a top aide to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), "received almost $2 million last year in a buyout package from his old lobbying firm, which specializes in placing earmarks in annual spending bills and is now under federal investigation." Shockey's attorneys "said his buyout from the firm, now known as Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White, met all ethical and legal guidelines applicable to House staffers. They added that Shockey's current position on the Appropriations Committee staff does not directly involve him in the approval of earmarks for any Members, or for his former clients." The attorneys "revealed the new buyout figures — more than triple the total previously disclosed to the media — in a conference call with reporters Friday morning, releasing the 2005 personal financial disclosure form for Shockey several days before it was required."

DOJ_NMG_0032894

Novak Says Hastert's Reaction To FBI Raid Upset Many GOP Constituents. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (6/12) writes that FL5 Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R) "last Thursday introduced a resolution repudiating the stand of her leader, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. It avows that a 'Congressional office may be subject to searches and seizures' in an 'ongoing criminal investigation' of a House member." Over the Memorial Day recess, voters in Brown-Waite's district, "she told me, 'were irate' over Hastert's criticism of the FBI raiding" LA2 Rep. William Jefferson's (D) offices. Brown-Waite "found fellow Republican House members also had been 'read the riot act' by constituents. … Nobody escapes from this episode untarnished, including" President Bush's "decision to seal for 45 days the evidence obtained from Jefferson's office under court approval." Heading "into the weekend, Brown-Waite had collected 20 Republican co-sponsors…and had not yet circulated it among Democrats." Novak notes, "When I asked for the Speaker's view of the Brown-Waite amendment…a spokesman said: 'We agree with it, and believe it should be done in a constitutional way. We are working on that process.' If Hastert had said that a week earlier, he would have saved himself and his party from more embarrassment in a difficult period."

Prosecutor's Silence In Duke Rape Case Raises Questions. The New York Times (6/12, Wilson, Glater) reports, "When a woman hired to dance at a Duke University lacrosse team party claimed that members of the team raped her, Michael B. Nifong, the district attorney for Durham County, responded with an aggressive, unflinching and very public investigation. … 'There's no doubt in my mind that she was raped and assaulted at this location,' Mr. Nifong said on national television after the case surfaced in March. Mr. Nifong called other lacrosse players 'hooligans' who had aided, abetted or covered up for the rapists. Local police officers seemed equally certain that they had a horrific crime to solve. … But in the intervening months, the case has come to appear far less robust. Three players have been indicted, but evidence that has surfaced, much of it turned over to defense lawyers by prosecutors and then filed in court with defense motions, has thrown the woman's claims into doubt. Mr. Nifong, so vocal at first, has refused to speak publicly about the case since the beginning of April." The Times adds, "The result is a growing perception of a case in trouble. Increasingly, the onus is on the district attorney. People in Durham are asking what Mr. Nifong is up to, whether his prosecution was influenced by politics — he was in the midst of a campaign when the case began — and what other evidence he might have. … Mr. Nifong's silence makes it impossible to evaluate the case as a whole. Certainly some evidence has not been revealed — the next hearing is set for June 22 — and the defense has released evidence selectively, presumably showing only those parts that strengthen its public position."

Suspect In Clemson Rape-Murder Confesses To More Sex Crimes. The Washington Times (6/12, Price) reports, "The suspect charged in the May 26 kidnapping, rape and murder of a 20-year-old Clemson University student has also confessed to committing two other sex crimes at about that time, and like most sex offenders, he has a long criminal history involving sex abuse." The Times continues, "DNA has linked Jerry Buck Inman, 35 -- described as a 'serial sexual predator' by South Carolina authorities -- to the abduction, rape and strangling of Tiffany Souers, a junior at Clemson." The Times adds, "Based on confessions Inman reportedly made after his arrest, the district attorney of Sevier County, Tenn., is also seeking charges of aggravated rape and aggravated burglary against him in a May 22 assault there. Inman also has been charged with burglary and attempted rape in a May 23 incident in Rainsville, Ala. … More than 5 percent of convicted sex offenders are rearrested for another sex crime within three years of their release from prison, according to a comprehensive study by the U.S. Department of Justice's Bureau of Justice Statistics. That makes them four times more likely than people who are not sex offenders to be arrested for sex crimes after their prison discharge. … What's more, the federal research showed that of the released sex offenders who commit another sex crime, 40 percent perpetrate the new offense within a year of their release. … The Justice Department (DOJ) study found that sex offenders with the highest rate of committing another sex crime were those who had a history of prior arrests for various offenses. Inman also meets that qualification."

DOJ_NMG_0032895

Two Elderly California Women Suspected In Insurance Fraud Scheme. The New York Times (6/12, Chang) reports, "Dwight Emile says his neighbor Olga Rutterschmidt always had a thing for get-rich-quick schemes. … 'She'd say, "Dwight, do you want to make some extra money?"' said Mr. Emile, a music producer and songwriter who lives in Hollywood. 'I'd say, "No, if it's not legal."' … Mr. Emile said he would invite Ms. Rutterschmidt into his apartment to play Debussy and Mozart on his keyboards, but he said he had nagging suspicions about her. … 'I always used to say to her that one day I'd see her on the 11 o'clock news,' Mr. Emile said. … Now he has." The Times adds, "Ms. Rutterschmidt, 73, and another woman, Helen Golay, 75, pleaded not guilty last week to federal charges of mail fraud and submitting false insurance applications. According to the authorities, the two women extended helping hands to two homeless men, getting them off the streets and putting them up in apartments, while at the same time plotting their deaths. … Posing as aunts, fiancées or cousins, they took out numerous life insurance policies on the men, Paul Vados and Kenneth McDavid, with themselves as the beneficiaries, collecting over $2.2 million after the men died in separate hit-and-run traffic cases, the authorities said. … The women have not been charged in the deaths, but the police said they were the main suspects. Ms. Rutterschmidt, who is from Hungary, met Mr. Vados, also born in Hungary, at a local Hungarian church, the authorities said."

Former Fumo Aide Resigns From Charity Under FBI, IRS Scrutiny. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/10, Shiffman, 423K) reported, "The executive director of the charity at the center of the FBI and IRS investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo…has stepped down from her post. Ruth Arnao, who also worked for Fumo's Senate staff from 1984 to 2004, helped the senator form Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods…in 1991." The Inquirer notes, "The new, interim executive director is Christian A. DiCicco, a Philadelphia lawyer who serves on the SEPTA board and is a longtime Citizens Alliance board member. Christian DiCicco's father is Philadelphia City Councilman Frank DiCicco." The Philadelphia Daily News (6/11, Davies) added, "Arnao is being investigated for possible obstruction of justice in connection with the deletion of e-mails from Citizens Alliance computers which were sought by the FBI. State Senate aides Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister were charged 10 days ago with destroying e-mails and other electronic evidence in order to hide them from the FBI." The AP (6/11) also reported on Arnao's resignation.

29 Indicted In FBI Probe Of Connecticut Garbage Hauling Industry. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/10, Apuzzo) reported, "A reputed mob boss, a former mayor and the owner of a trash-hauling business were among 29 people charged Friday in a federal investigation into the mob's influence over the region's trash-hauling industry. The indictment alleges that companies owned by James Galante paid a 'mob tax' to Matthew Ianniello, the reputed boss of the Genovese crime family. The payments were part of a scheme in which trash haulers carved out routes and agreed not to steal each other's customers, according to the indictment. … 'Organized crime's stranglehold on the citizens of Connecticut through its control of the trash industry has been broken,' said Kimberly Mertz, the state's top FBI agent." The AP noted, "Ianniello, known as 'Matty the Horse,' was released on $1 million bond and sent home, where he was under house arrest in an unrelated case." Joseph Santopietro "was released on $200,000 bond," and "Galante was held without bond." The Connecticut Post (6/10, Mayko) added, "The federal investigation also ensnared law enforcement officers, including a federal drug agent and a state trooper who once ran Danny's Drive-In in Stratford and was recently selected to star in a TV pilot. … The probe also uncovered fraud in the operation of the Danbury Trashers, the team that nearly captured the United Hockey League title this year."

The New York Daily News (6/11, Connor, 729K) reported, "He might be 85 years old, but the mob apparently hasn't put Matty the Horse out to pasture yet." On Friday, Ianello "was indicted in Connecticut…for collecting half a million dollars in 'tributes' from a corrupt trash hauler, prosecutors said. … But if the old-time wiseguy is feeling the heat, he didn't show it as he was sent home on $1 million bond following a hearing in New Haven. 'What can I say, right? Nothing,' Ianniello said, smiling broadly and shaking hands with marshals and FBI agents at the courthouse." The Danbury News-Times (6/10, Gold) noted, "The federal government now runs Automated Waste Disposal. As the government froze the bank records and assets of James Galante's Danbury garbage company, U.S. Marshals spent Friday figuring out how many companies they need to hire to run different parts of AWD and several of Galante's other trash firms." The Danbury Times (6/10) also lists all 29 defendants and the charges against them.

Pellicano Assails FBI Probe, Vows Never To "Rat Out" Clients. The Los Angeles Times (6/11, Philips, 958K) reported, "In his first interview in three years, jailed private eye Anthony Pellicano accused federal authorities of exaggerating the strength of their case against him, which he predicted would soon fizzle out like a box-office flop. Speaking by telephone from the federal Metropolitan Detention Center in Los Angeles one morning last week, a defiant Pellicano insisted that he would never cooperate with authorities or testify against a bevy of A-list lawyers, Hollywood executives, business moguls and celebrities who have hired him over the years to dig up dirt on their adversaries." Pellicano declared, "You're not going to see me take the stand against the clients and employees and other people that are going to be testifying against me. I didn't rat them out. … I am never going to besmirch a client or any other person that I gave my trust to or who gave their trust to me." Pellicano added, "The federal government has purposely tried to make this thing larger than life — like a Hollywood movie. To me, these are the acts of overzealous FBI agents and prosecutors who have never really accomplished anything in their careers. They are trying to use my name and reputation to build something better for themselves."

DOJ_NMG_0032896

The AP (6/11) reported, "He also said it was ironic that the federal government is accusing him of wiretapping at a time when it is under fire for authorizing the National Security Agency to monitor Americans' telephone calls without court warrants in search of terrorist connections. 'If the American public had any idea of all the surveillance, wiretapping and illegal things that our own government actually does, they would be shocked,' Pellicano said. 'Chasing terrorists is what the FBI is supposed to be doing. I've got to tell you, if instead of keeping me behind bars here, they gave me the job of finding Osama bin Laden, I guarantee you I would find him.'"

Arizona AG To Seek Federal Task Force In Jeffs Case. The Salt Lake Tribune (6/12, Adams) reports, "Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard will make a pitch today to FBI officials for a federal task force to oversee the hunt for fugitive polygamous leader Warren S. Jeffs, saying the effort so far has 'not been optimal.' Goddard specifically criticized 'local law enforcement' for a lack of coordination and failure to pass along information in a timely manner to federal authorities. … But Goddard is getting no backing from Utah officials in his call for a federal task force. Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff has said coordination with FBI here is 'excellent.'" In DC "to discuss with the Department of Justice gas prices and possible antitrust violations by oil companies," Goddard is "scheduled the stop at the FBI, where he'll meet with a deputy director and an investigations chief." He "said a 'spotty' relationship with FBI staff in Arizona has impeded progress, though that may improve since a new person has assumed the special agent-in-charge post." The Tribune notes, "FBI Director Robert Mueller discussed his agency's ramped up effort to find Jeffs during a visit to Utah last week. 'Always in a situation like this, it takes time,' Mueller said. 'My expectation is, we will catch him.'"

The Deseret Morning News (6/10, Winslow) reported that in an interview with the paper on Friday, "Goddard criticized the FBI for not using state and local investigators enough in the manhunt for the polygamist leader. … 'They're not being taken sufficient advantage of.' … 'I've seen too many examples where the lack of coordination has been a benefit to Mr. Jeffs and his efforts to stay on the lam,' he said." However, "The Utah Attorney General's Office said it has had 'tremendous' communication with the FBI's Salt Lake City office," and "others say it appears the FBI has taken a heightened interest in Jeffs since the polygamist leader was added to the agency's Ten Most Wanted list last month. FBI Director Robert Mueller was in Salt Lake City Wednesday and was briefed on the manhunt efforts."

Utah, Arizona Authorities Belief Jeffs Recently Performed More Child Marriages. The Deseret Morning News (6/10, Winslow) also reported, "Authorities believe…Jeffs has recently been in the polygamous border town of Colorado City, Ariz., performing more child-bride marriages. 'I've heard from a number of different sources who said he's been here,' Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard told the Deseret Morning News Friday. 'They said he's performed marriages, and (they) pointed out a mobile home they said was the wedding chapel.' Some living in the polygamous border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City said they have also heard that Jeffs has been there within the past 1 1/2 months. The Utah Attorney General's Office said it has heard from credible sources that Jeffs continues to exercise his religious authority."

USAT Warns That Rising Prison Problems Affect Society. USA Today (6/12) editorializes, "It's difficult for most people to muster any sympathy for the 2.2 million people serving time in the nation's overcrowded prisons and jails, half of them for violent crimes. … Sexual assaults, gang violence, lack of rehabilitation and shoddy medical care are shrugged off as givens, or even deserved. Comedians joke about what'll happen to former Enron CEO Ken Lay once he's behind bars. Most people feel that what goes on in prisons doesn't affect them. … That attitude couldn't be more wrong." USA continues, "What happens in prisons returns to the community with a vengeance. Over the course of a year, 13.5 million people spend time in jails or prisons, and 95% of them are eventually released back into society. Many return as more hardened felons eager to commit new crimes and responsible for spreading infectious diseases — such as HIV, hepatitis and tuberculosis — that went untreated while they were incarcerated." USA notes, "A report released Thursday by the independent blue ribbon Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons, established by the non-profit Vera Institute of Justice in New York, is a scathing indictment of the nation's correctional system. … Congress and states passed get-tough-on-crime laws without providing funding and resources to allow prisons to cope with new inmates, the report says. As a result, too many prisons and jails are unsafe, unhealthy or inhumane, and their failures spill over into the community."

DOJ_NMG_0032897

Corrections Official Responds. In an op-ed in USA Today (6/12), James A. Gondles Jr., the executive director of the American Correctional Association, writes, "USA TODAY ought to be thanking the 750,000 dedicated professional men and women who work in our correctional systems for maintaining public safety. It is big news when a riot, an escape, an injury or death occurs within a facility — because it rarely happens." Gondles continues, "Inmates are the only group of Americans with the constitutional right to adequate health care, while more than 45 million Americans have no health insurance. … Correctional facilities have more oversight than nearly any other governmental agency. Our 'watchers' include the U.S. Department of Justice Civil Rights Division, federal and state courts, the American Civil Liberties Union, fire marshals, health inspectors, ombudsmen, inspector generals, and thousands of U.S. citizens serving as volunteers. There is little doubt we are the most transparent system in the world. Many nations never open their correctional systems to any visitor." Gondles adds, "For more than 40 years, the American Correctional Association has maintained standards and accreditation of our jails and prisons. The Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons even urged all facilities to become ACA-accredited. Countries worldwide look to our standards as a benchmark of professionally administered systems. … Can we do more? Of course we can, but we need county, state and federal governments to step up to the plate and fund treatment, education, job skills training for inmates and adequate pay for our workers. Public health has let this nation down. The 350,000-plus inmates with serious mental illness were that way when they entered our systems. Corrections cannot be blamed for a lack of treatment. Inmates are our brothers and sisters and our sons and daughters, and nearly every one of them will return to our communities. We need to treat their diseases, mental and physical, to help them turn the corner on living a productive, positive life."

Prison Rehab Program Ruling Raises Questions About Faith-Based Programs. A federal judge in Iowa ruled on June 2 that an evangelical Christian prison rehabilitation program paid for by tax dollars is unconstitutional. The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Paulson, 61K) calls the decision "a major victory for those who believe America has gone too far in supporting religious or semireligious activities using public money. But given the broad spectrum of faith-based organizations that offer programs tackling social ills from substance dependency to illiteracy, the decision also raises questions over where to draw the line of demarcation when it comes to mixing religion and social services, and whether there's a right way and a wrong way for the government to encourage the involvement of faith-based groups."

CIVIL LAW:

Firms Seek Dismissal Of Thousands Of Asbestos Cases. The Legal Intelligencer (6/12, Duffy) reports, "In a bold and unprecedented move that could drastically alter the nature of asbestos litigation, a coalition of 47 companies last week asked a federal judge to dismiss tens of thousands of pending cases, alleging that the vast majority of them are premised on flawed or fraudulent medical diagnoses." The LI continues, "In the motion, defense lawyers say they are targeting claims that stem from "mass medical screening enterprises' which, they say, have clogged the courts with thousands of bogus asbestos claims." The LI adds, "The motion was filed before U.S. District Judge James T. Giles, who is presiding over a case known as MDL 875, the name for the multidistrict litigation in which all pending federal asbestos claims were consolidated. In the motion, the asbestos defendants are asking Giles to do two things. … First, they want the judge to exclude all expert testimony from six doctors who the companies say either have taken the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination when asked to testify about their methods or have disavowed diagnoses attributed to them. … According to court papers, a federal grand jury in the Southern District of New York is currently looking into asbestos doctors and screening companies. Since the probe began, some of the doctors have begun invoking the Fifth Amendment when asked to testify. The brief says that since 2002, the six doctors have authored more than 140,000 medical reports for asbestos claimants." The LI notes, "The second request is that Giles 'dismiss without prejudice all nonmalignant cases' in MDL 875 "subject to reinstatement upon production by plaintiffs ... of diagnosing documents by a doctor other than the six doctors."

Allen Vows To Filibuster Attempt To Crack Down On 527s. Roll Call (6/12, Newmyer, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) faces a strong challenge on his right if he brings to the floor a lobbying reform package that cracks down on the independent political groups known as 527s. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) plans to send a letter to Frist this week threatening to filibuster the bill if it includes the provision, which was approved by the House but is absent from the Senate version of the lobbying rules overhaul. The letter is so far co-signed by GOP Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.), Tom Coburn (Okla.), Jim DeMint (S.C.), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), John Sununu (N.H.) and David Vitter (La.)."

DOJ_NMG_0032898

Contribution Caps Said To Benefit Challengers. Deborah Goldberg, who directs the Democracy Program at the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law, writes in Roll Call (6/12) that three new studies on campaign contribution limits, "one published in Public Choice, a second forthcoming in Political Research Quarterly, and the third to be published by the Brookings Institution in The Marketplace of Democracy," offer "empirical evidence to quell that familiar but flawed argument" that caps on political contributions are an incumbent-protection device." In their Public Choice article, economists Thomas Stratmann and Francisco Aparicio-Castillo "found that contribution limits appear to help challengers in state Assembly elections. … Two forthcoming studies focusing on gubernatorial elections reached similar conclusions. … These recent statistical analyses of the empirical data comport with common sense."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

WSJournal Says Voting Rights Act Provision Likely Will Be Renewed. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) says "you can be fairly certain that the coming debate over updating the Voting Rights Act will sidestep what's really at stake, which isn't the right to vote but rather the power of politicians to pick their voters through gerrymandering. Unless Republican backbones miraculously stiffen, expect the expiring penalty provisions of the Voting Rights Act to be renewed this year for another quarter-century." Congress "could reassure Americans that the most important provisions of the Voting Rights Act -- the bans on poll taxes and literacy tests and grandfather clauses -- are permanently enshrined in law and thus not in need of renewal. But the political reality is that an embattled GOP Congress has no interest in allowing Democrats to use opposition to something called the Voting Rights Act against Republican candidates in November."

ANTITRUST:

Arcelor Rejects Hostile Bid By Mittal Steel. The Financial Times (6/12, Marsh) reports Luxembourg steelmaker Arcelor has formally rejected a bid for the company made last month by Mittal Steel. Arcelor "reiterated that it planned to go ahead with an agreed merger with Severstal of Russia to form the world's biggest steel producer." The FT says Arcelor's "rejection of the hostile offer from Mittal, controlled by Lakshmi Mittal, will disappoint the Indian steel magnate but is expected to put fierce pressure on him to increase his bid within the next few weeks."

European Shareholder Activists Making Moves On US Firms. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, B1, Lublin) writes, "Here's some bad news for U.S. executives frustrated by American shareholder activists: The Europeans are invading, with plans to stir up more trouble. Big European institutional investors with sizable U.S. portfolios are pursuing quiet diplomacy, lobbying regulators and breaking with home-country tradition by filing shareholder lawsuits," as well as "backing efforts to give shareholders a voice in executive-pay decisions, akin to practices in the United Kingdom and Australia." Wal-Mart is one of the "biggest U.S. companies to feel the foreign heat. Five European institutions were among seven big investors who faulted Wal-Mart directors last month for not appointing a special committee to investigate possible weaknesses in legal and regulatory controls. A core group of four U.S. and British funds first sought creation of the panel in May 2005."

AXA In Talks To Purchase Credit Suisse Unit. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Singer, Taylor) reports, "French insurance giant AXA SA is in exclusive talks to buy Credit Suisse Group's Winterthur insurance unit, a person familiar with the matter said. A potential sale could be valued in excess of 10 billion Swiss francs, or about $8 billion." The Journal continues, "The development comes amid preparations by Credit Suisse to float Winterthur this year and as the Swiss banking giant focuses on its core businesses of corporate and investment banking, retail and private banking, and asset management." The Journal adds, "Last week AXA gained exclusive negotiating rights to purchase Winterthur, a person familiar with the matter said. AXA is unlikely to buy all of Winterthur's operations, as Credit Suisse will likely retain some parts, the person said. … Credit Suisse in 2004 began putting out feelers to U.S. and European banks for potential bids, but there was no serious interest in the 130-year-old business, say people familiar with the matter. Finding buyers for Winterthur was tough because of its size and because insurers were recovering from a patch of poor performance and credit-ratings concerns. Credit Suisse forged ahead with plans for an initial public offering of shares set to take place this year, but didn't rule out a sale."

Forbes Criticizes Net Neutrality Legislation. Steve Forbes, president and CEO of Forbes, Inc., writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) that in Congress right now, "well-financed lobbyists are pushing for Net Neutrality legislation. According to their benign-sounding definition of Net Neutrality, it simply means that Internet network operators like the phone and cable companies would have to give equal treatment to all traffic on their networks, without giving anybody's content preference in handling. But scratch the surface of what the Net Neutrality crowd is really asking for and Net Neutrality shifts from benign to ominous." Forbes adds, "Passing Network Neutrality legislation would be a re-run of the disastrous Telecom Act of 1996 which forced telecom companies to provide network access to competitors at below market prices. That certainly put a chill on network innovation."

DOJ_NMG_0032899

WPost Warns Against Preemptive Government Regulation Of Internet. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/12, A20, 744K) says, "The advocates of neutrality suggest, absurdly, that a non-neutral Internet would resemble cable TV: a medium through which only corporate content is delivered. This analogy misses the fact that the market for Internet connections, unlike that for cable television, is competitive." The Post adds, "It seems unlikely that broadband providers will degrade Web services that people want and far more likely that they will use non-neutrality to charge for upgrading services that depend on fast and reliable delivery, such as streaming high-definition video or relaying data from heart monitors. If this proves wrong, the government should step in. But it should not burden the Internet with preemptive regulation."

WSJournal Says Spectrum Auctions Should Proceed Without Interference. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) says, "The Justice Department settled its spat with money manager Mario Gabelli over cellphone licenses last week, but that's not all, folks. The story behind this story is a government process of auctioning telecom spectrum that invites the kind of political gamesmanship that tripped up Mr. Gabelli. … This policy introduces all manner of inefficiencies." The Journal adds that "policy makers would be better off simply allowing these auctions to proceed without interference. And so would consumers."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Western Governors Say States Need To Take Lead On Global Warming. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Wilson, Nicholas, 958K) reports a "bipartisan group of western governors on Sunday formally acknowledged that greenhouse gases are on the rise and said their states need to take action to reduce global warming while meeting growing energy demand." The Western Governors' Assn. unanimously passed a resolution calling on states and cities to reduce human-caused greenhouse gases, but it contained no specifics on what action should be taken." Though the resolution "was a major step, especially for governors of states with power plants or major coal and oil reserves, its language was carefully nuanced. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had urged his fellow governors just before the vote to take an even stronger stand."

Mercury Fears Add To Tribe's Woes. The Washington Post (6/12, Lydersen) reports, "Tina and Rick Van Zile are members of the Mole Lake Ojibwe tribe here (in Mole Lake) in northern Wisconsin. Each spring for more than 15 years, they have gone spearfishing together, engaging in a tradition for their tribe and gathering food that is vital to their diet. … But in recent years they have added something new to the old ways -- they consult a color-coded map that tells them which of the more than 50 lakes in the region have the highest mercury levels." The Post continues, "According to the Environmental Protection Agency, 22 states including Wisconsin have statewide mercury advisories, and 23 more have advisories for specific bodies of water. Typical advisories warn children and women of childbearing age against eating more than one game fish per month. The mercury in the fish can cause neurological damage in children and fetuses as well as health problems in adults. … Because fishing is so central to the traditions, social life and economic sustenance of many Indian tribes, the warnings have special significance for them. … 'Fishing is a big part of what we eat and how we eat; it ties back to the culture and traditions of who we are as a people,' said Mole Lake tribal leader Wayne LaBine. … He describes mercury as an organ of 'Mother Earth's body' that has been turned into a toxin through exploitation of natural resources such as coal. Mercury is emitted from coal-burning power plants, paper mills and older chlorine plants. … 'Fossil fuels were not intended to be burned like this, so the balance of the Earth is thrown off and mercury is misplaced,' LaBine said."

NYTimes Says Washington Should Encourage Green Investments By Business. An editorial in the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) notes that Goldman Sachs is among "a growing number of investment and manufacturing enterprises chasing emerging technologies that could help provide the alternative energy sources that politicians from President Bush on down say they want and that the country will certainly need in years to come. Meanwhile, more and more companies — including heavyweights like DuPont, Johnson & Johnson and United Technologies — have been busily cleaning up their own acts, using less energy by making themselves more efficient. Over time, these efforts could place the United States in the forefront of an emerging global market for cleaner technologies. … If Washington is smart, it will throw its weight behind these efforts by providing the necessary incentives, whether as loans, direct grants or targeted tax breaks."

DOJ_NMG_0032900

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

NJ Man Sentenced To 15 Years For Violent Hijacking Of FBI Employee's Vehicle. The Newark Star-Ledger (6/10, Martin, 420K) reported Jimmy K. White of Elizabeth, N.J., was sentenced on Friday to 188 months "in prison…for carjacking and badly injuring a Good Samaritan who tried to stop him during a mugging in Jersey City last year." White "bit the victim's hand and face as she struggled for control of her sport utility vehicle, then ran over her during his getaway. He was arrested after the FBI lab matched his DNA to samples from bite marks he left on the woman, an employee for the FBI in Newark." The Star-Ledger noted, "The victim drove her Jeep into the parking lot of a Jersey City bagel store on May 15, 2005, and saw White trying to rob a man of his wallet, according to documents filed in the case." The Jersey Journal (6/10, Herman, 27K) added, "As the victim was hospitalized for her injuries, the FBI extracted DNA samples from the wounds on her face and hand and flew them by helicopter to its lab in Quantico, Va. Within four days, they found a match from a database of offenders and arrested White. The victim spent three days in the hospital and then missed four months of work. Because of White's criminal history -- which includes a 1995 sexual assault, a 1997 violent robbery and a number of disorderly persons offenses -- he qualified as a career offender eligible for the stiff prison sentence of 188 months." The AP (6/10) also reported on the sentencing.

In New Orleans, Doctor Pleads Guilty In Prescription Scheme. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/9, Perlstein) reports Dr. Joseph Guenther "pleaded guilty Wednesday to four felony counts of prescribing narcotics without a legitimate medical reason and one count of conspiracy. In his plea…Guenther admitted that he issued hundreds of preprinted prescriptions for an addictive drug cocktail consisting of hydrocodone, Xanax and Soma. … The DEA, aided by the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. attorney's office and local police agencies, confiscated more than $10 million in assets in the case."

Man Facing Meth Charges Also Accused In Hawaii Jewelry Heist. The Honolulu Advertiser (6/11, Boylan) reports the recent armed robbery of a salesman "carrying $2 million in jewelry in the parking lot of a Waipahu restaurant is highly unusual for Hawaii, state and federal law enforcement officials said. … Two men have been charged in connection with the jewelry heist in the parking lot of the Golden Coin restaurant in Waipahu. Bryan T. Higa, 25, was arrested June 1, and Marvin Quemado Jr., 31, was arrested June 5. … Higa was charged in federal court for his alleged role in a methamphetamine smuggling ring. … He is accused of working as a middleman for a narcotics distributor arrested by agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Accused Gang Members Arrested In Illinois On Drug Charges. The Rockford (IL) Register Star (6/11) reports police "arrested two known gang members on multiple drug charges Friday, ending a month-long criminal investigation. Jamie Spates, 30, and Michael Jones, 22, both of Rockford, are each charged with two felony counts of unlawful delivery of crack cocaine and two felony counts of criminal drug conspiracy." The Register Star notes the DEA's involvement in the investigation.

Interim Haitian Prime Minister Claims "Unequaled" Cooperation With DEA. The New York Daily News (6/11, Meek) writes, "Unlike most former Haitian leaders, [Gerard] Latortue left Port-au-Prince last month on two feet and without an armed gang in hot pursuit. The New York Daily News joined Latortue, 71, on Friday as his turbulent, 26-month term as Haiti's leader ended quietly. … Among the accomplishments Latortue cites were firing corrupt customs officers and police and taking steps to help free the civil service of political cronyism. He claimed unequaled cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration on counternarcotics efforts."

MLB Considering Suspending Grimsley For Admission Of Drug Use. According to the Los Angeles Times (6/9, Brown), Major League Baseball "is strongly considering suspending former Arizona pitcher Jason Grimsley for admitting to federal authorities he used performance-enhancing drugs, which would set a precedent for future cases. Grimsley's agent said Thursday the pitcher will retire. MLB would pursue the penalty, however, if only to ensure Grimsley is penalized if he reconsiders retirement."

Grimsley's Amphetamines Claim Not Backed By Players. The Los Angeles Times (6/10, Shaikin) reports, "Although Jason Grimsley told federal agents an equipment salesman distributed amphetamines within the Angels' clubhouse in 1996, three players on that team said Friday they had no recollection of such an individual." An affidavit "included this sentence: 'Grimsley stated that while he was with the California Angels, an individual who sold bats and gloves would come around the clubhouse with a supply of two-toned green amphetamines, or 'greenies.'"

Grimsley Seeks Remainder Of Salary. The Los Angeles Times (6/11, Reports) reports Jason Grimsley "plans to fight the Arizona Diamondbacks' decision to withhold the remainder of his $825,000 salary. … The reliever was given his release Wednesday, a day after federal agents searched

DOJ_NMG_0032901

Grimsley's home in an investigation into performance-enhancing drugs."

Bonds To Cooperate With Investigator, Drops Lawsuit Against Reporters. The AP (6/11) reports Barry Bonds "wants to cooperate with special investigator George Mitchell, but will only talk to him if he is assured the information won't be given to federal prosecutors. Bonds also dropped his lawsuit against two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who published a book claiming the Giants slugger used steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. … A federal grand jury in San Francisco is now investigating whether Bonds lied under oath about using the performance-enhancing drug known as "the clear" during that grand jury testimony."

In its "NL Notebook," the Washington Post (6/11) reports Bonds "sued…Penguin Group Inc.'s Gotham Books and others, claiming the authors illegally obtained his secret grand jury testimony from a U.S. criminal case against Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or Balco."

Ex-Girlfriend Said To Be Potential Trouble For Bonds In Investigation. The AP (6/10) reports FBI agents "asked Barry Bonds' ex-girlfriend not to cooperate in Major League Baseball's steroid probe while a federal grand jury investigates whether the Giants slugger lied under oath about drug use."

In a separate column for the AP (6/10), Tim Dahlberg writes, "There are few things in life worse than a scorned mistress who talks too much. Barry Bonds knows that better than most. A woman named Kimberly Bell is a big part of the reason he may soon find himself in some serious trouble with the law. … By various accounts, Bell has spilled the beans about both alleged steroid use by Bonds and a reported $80,000 in allegedly undeclared income the slugger gave her to buy a house in Arizona."

Mitchell Seen As Facing Roadblocks In MLB Investigation. In the Arizona Republic (6/10), Joseph A. Reaves writes, "While the federal government ramps up its investigation of baseball's ugly drug mess by playing hardball with the likes of Jason Grimsley, a separate, independent probe led by former Sen. George J. Mitchell is running into serious roadblocks that threaten to undermine any chance of uncovering the scope of the scandal this year. Reluctant witnesses and a hard-line stand by the players' union are seriously hampering Mitchell, who was hired in March by Commissioner Bud Selig to conduct a comprehensive investigation for Major League Baseball."

Current HGH Test Considered Impractical, Unreliable. In USA Today (6/9), Dick Patrick and Bob Nightengale write that Major League Baseball doesn't test for human growth hormone. The International Olympic Committee "brags it has had an HGH test since before the 2004 Olympics, but that is semantics. Yes, there is a blood test for HGH. But because antibodies necessary for the process are in such short supply, virtually no HGH testing is conducted. In addition, the test only detects HGH right after injection so it's impractical for in-competition testing."

The Washington Post (6/10) reports the NFL does not intend to "implement blood testing of its players for human growth hormone. Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, said that he and other league leaders doubt the reliability of a blood test for growth hormone first used at the 2004 Athens Olympics."

In the New York Times "Week in Review" section (6/11) Ian Austen writes, "The hormone can be uncovered in a blood test, which was introduced on a limited basis by the World Anti-Doping Agency at the 2004 Olympics. But amid concerns about the invasiveness of blood testing, Major League Baseball is financing research at the University of California at Los Angeles to create a urine test."

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (6/11, story 7, 3:10, Mitchell) reported, "Barry Bonds is willing to cooperate with the steroids investigation if the terms are right. Bonds' attorney told the New York Daily News he will talk but only if he is assured his information won't be passed onto Federal prosecutors. You can add human growth hormone to the list of suspect drugs in baseball. Following revelations this week following Arizona Diamondback Jason Grimsley and that's tonight's 'Sunday Cover,' the investigation into HGH and the race to find a foolproof test." HGH is "produced by the pitutary gland to stimulate normal development. Athletes looking for an edge inject HGH to shed fat and increase muscle regeneration." Since it's "undetectable in urine none of the four major American sports leagues test for it." The International Olympic Committee "used a blood test for HGH. But it's not definitive. It also requires frequent testing and few believe American pro players will ever agree to it."

California Wrestling Coach Charged With Steroid Possession. The Los Angeles Times (6/10, Lin) reports, "A Tustin High School wrestling coach has been charged with possession of steroids and counterfeit money, prosecutors said Friday. Tustin Unified School District officials said there were no indications that Ramon Hernandez Serrano distributed the muscle-building drugs to students. He has been placed on administrative leave."

IMMIGRATION:

EU-Style Passport-Free Zone Seen Alternative For US-Canadian Border. In a New York Times op-ed (6/12), Stephen Handelman says "the most high-profile solution" to the security problem on the US-Canadian border "would complicate the lives of millions of Canadians and Americans, and perhaps seriously damage their closely linked economies. That solution comes out of laws passed by Congress in response to 9/11 mandating that next year Americans and Canadians crossing the border by airplane will need passports or other federal government-approved identification to get through United States customs. In 2008 similar requirements will be imposed at the 140 land-border crossings between the United States and Canada." Business owners "in both countries say the added security provided by the jumped-up ID requirements won't compensate for the loss of tourism and consumer revenue." There are "smarter options. Europeans have created a passport-free zone of 13 member states of the European Union along with Norway and Iceland, called the Schengen system. They agreed in 1985 to draw a 'virtual' border around countries that had agreed to harmonize visa rules. The Schengen frontier is policed by the customs authorities of each participating country, but everyone plugs into a shared intelligence database that stays alert to outside threats and tracks suspected felons, drug smugglers and terrorists inside the zone."

DOJ_NMG_0032902

Latino Assimilation More Prevalent Than Assumed. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/12, A21), Tyler Cowen, professor of economics at George Mason University and general director of its Mercatus Center, and Daniel M. Rothschild, associate director of the Global Prosperity Initiative at the Mercatus Center, say, "Beneath the surface of the immigration debate is a debate about shared values. If we look at just three of those values -- the English language, family and hard work -- we see a higher level of Latino assimilation than is often presumed."

Border Patrol Group Wants Parole Denied For Killer Of Two Agents. The Washington Times (6/12, Seper, 90K) reports the National Border Patrol Council, "which represents all 10,500 of the U.S. Border Patrol's nonsupervisory agents, has asked the U.S. Parole Board Commission to deny parole to a man convicted in the killing of two Border Patrol agents." Florencio Lopes Mationg, "who was convicted with three other men in the June 1967 murder of agents Theodore L. Newton Jr., 25, and George F. Azrak, 21, is scheduled for a parole hearing this week." Border Patrol Agent Ronald Zermeno, "who has coordinated an effort to keep Mationg in prison, said that a petition with 4,000 signatures was presented to the commission and that several law-enforcement authorities and family members will attend the hearing tomorrow at the federal prison in Florence, Colo."

Immigration Policy Seen As Creating Quandary For Domestic Partners. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/12, A21), Susan Laurel Hodges explains the difficulties in arranging for an H-1B visa for her domestic partner, a German physician with skills highly sought after in her own country. A US employer "must be willing to jump through hoops to sponsor her, and until that happens, no visa can be issued. Among the hoops: extensive advertising to find an American citizen who can fill the job before it is given to an outsider, and retaining an attorney who can competently navigate and file the blizzard of forms that must be filled out by the potential employer and potential employee."

Public Opinion Said To Back Both Pro-Enforcement, Pro-Immigrant Bill. In the Weekly Standard (6/19), Jeffrey Bell says, "What voters do not like is an immigration system that increasingly relies on, and winks at, breaking the law. Voters never liked this, but they became especially unfavorable to it after 9/11. They want greater control of our borders, and more enforcement of immigration laws inside our borders." Political elites, "Republican and Democratic alike, often seem to operate on the assumption that voters are either pro-immigrant or pro-enforcement, but not both. In fact, most voters see no contradiction between the two. Nor is there a huge difference between rank-and-file Republicans and rank-and-file Democrats. Solid, but by no means unanimous, majorities in each party favor both immigration -- including a path to legalization for those already here -- and increased enforcement of immigration laws."

Immigration Is Key Issue In Competitive AZ5 Race. The Washington Post (6/12, A4, Slevin, 744K) reports that in Arizona's 5th CD, Republican Rep. J.D. Hayworth "is a firebrand by disposition and design." Democrat Harry Mitchell is "so low-key his advisers make a point of saying he really is energetic." Hayworth "is an immigration hawk who favors cracking down on illegal immigrants and wrote a book called 'Whatever It Takes.' The Democrat calls himself an immigration realist who would combine tighter border controls with a path toward legal status." Hayworth is "running hard for reelection, describing himself to GOP campaign workers as 'not real subtle, and you know exactly where I stand.' Mitchell is a local political legend who contends that Hayworth 'has a lot of explaining to do,' not least about his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The CD race is "considered competitive for the first time in a decade. Analysts point to troubles in the White House and Congress, as well as Hayworth's outsize profile on immigration. It all makes for an intriguing contest in an unpredictable state where pollsters see a shift to the center." Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report "believes Hayworth has the edge in a district that has eight registered Republicans for every five registered Democrats. But the district's substantial slice of independents complicates the picture, as does the image of local Republicans as more moderate and temperate than their congressman."

Schwarzenegger Faces Difficult Balance On Immigration. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Cooper, 2.11M) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's "frequent invocation of his achievements as a foreign national -- millionaire status, megacelebrity and a swift rise to a pinnacle of American politics -- is a major element of his strategy for navigating the issue of immigration in a tight re-election campaign in a state roiled more than any other by the different poles in the debate." On "specifics like border enforcement and benefits for the estimated three million illegal immigrants in his state, he tries to walk a middle ground. But often he tries to avoid the specifics altogether." California Republican Party Chairman Duf Sundheim "believes that the governor, in coupling a mix of personal anecdotes with a moderate policy stance, may be able to win support from moderates and the expanding Latino electorate on the issue without offending his deeply conservative base, which would like to see a tough crackdown on illegal immigrants."

DOJ_NMG_0032903

TAX:

Democrats Said To Be Laying Ground Work For Tax Hike. Stephen Moore writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) that many congressional Republicans "want to negotiate a blockbuster budget deal to tackle the stampeding cost of entitlements. Meanwhile, Democrats and left-leaning think tanks are already laying the groundwork to build a Washington tax-hike consensus." Moore adds, "Tax increases anywhere near 25% of GDP would cripple the rate of economic growth and slow the rate of capital accumulation and the build-up of national wealth -- leaving future generations worse off." Moore concludes, "For 25 years, virtually every bipartisan budget deal has meant higher taxes, higher spending and political carnage for the GOP. … Republicans forget this lesson of history at their own peril."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Administration Launches Effort To Enroll Medicare Drug Beneficiaries. The Bush Administration today will begin an effort to locate and sign up low income people on Medicare who are not receiving prescription drug coverage. USA Today (6/12, Wolf, 2.31M) reports, "The Social Security Administration will start by sending out 500,000 applications to a select group of seniors age 79 and up. The applications will also target seniors in low-income neighborhoods, people with disabilities, Hispanics and those who do not handle their own financial affairs." The effort is "the latest in a series of attempts by the government and private groups to lure those seniors who stand to benefit the most from Medicare's prescription-drug program -- but who are most likely to have missed out on the coverage."

Business Lobby Pushes GOP On Competitiveness Agenda. The business lobby is using the competitiveness agenda proposed by congressional Democrats as leverage against Republicans, who they feel are not pushing the issue hard enough. Roll Call (6/12, Rasmussen) reports, "Business groups want to see action on President Bush's American Competitiveness Initiative," but "the proposal -- unveiled in Bush's 2006 State of the Union address -- has languished in the GOP-controlled Congress. … Lobbyists have grown increasingly worried that Congress, riven by bitter partisan infighting, does not share their feelings of urgency on the issue, and that Congress might go to recess in August without passing major parts of the initiative."

Budget Panels To Take Up Line-Item Veto Proposals. Roll Call (6/12, Yachnin) reports that the House and Senate budget committees are preparing to move forward with legislation to establish a presidential line item veto. According to Roll Call, "both panels have indicated they intend to overhaul the measure proposed by the Bush Administration and produce a bill that provides significantly less license than the executive branch had sought." While Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg "did not expand on his plans to amend the bill, introduced by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in March, he previously had suggested that the measure should be tailored more narrowly to prevent abuse by the executive branch, as well as to give Congress more flexibility to respond to line-item veto activity." In the House, Rep. Paul Ryan "said he believes the legislation should include time limitations restricting the period in which the president may propose rescissions for specific legislation."

Hoyer, Murtha To Seek Leadership Posts If Democrats Win House. Roll Call (6/12, Kornacki) reports that House Minority Whip Steny and Rep. John Murtha have both indicated that they will seek the Majority Leader's post if Democrats take control of the House in November. Roll Call notes, "The unusually timed competition…was triggered on Friday when Murtha, the Pennsylvania appropriator whose change of heart on the Iraq war last year made him one of the most recognized faces in Congress, stunned his colleagues by circulating a letter announcing his bid." Hoyer "strongly affirmed Friday afternoon his plans to seek a promotion to Majority Leader, a job, he suggests, that he would have earned by virtue of Democratic successes at the polls this fall." Roll Call also notes, "Murtha's move immediately raised questions about [Minority Leader Nancy] Pelosi's role, since he is one of her closest allies in the House and Hoyer, as the No. 2 Democrat, is the most obvious threat to Pelosi's position among the current crop of Democratic leaders."

DOJ_NMG_0032904

Time (6/19, Tumulty) reports in its "Notebook" column that a "nasty fight" has broken out in the House Democratic caucus. Vocal Iraq war critic Rep. John Murtha, "sent a two-sentence letter last week to his Democratic colleagues notifying them that he plans to run for majority leader if his party wins back the House. That's a direct challenge to the man who would be in line for the job, Democratic whip Steny Hoyer, a moderate who supported the war." Murtha managed Rep. Nancy Pelosi's successful campaign against Hoyer for Minority Leader. She and Murtha "have stayed tight. But sources close to Pelosi say she had nothing to do with Murtha's surprising announcement; sources close to Hoyer suggest they don't believe that."

Poll Finds Reid Approval Rating At 48%. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid received what the Washington Times (6/12, Hurt, 90K) calls "raucous applause" from a gathering of liberal bloggers in Las Vegas. But, "outside the convention hall, the Nevadans who sent Mr. Reid to Washington aren't quite so thrilled with the job he's doing. A poll conducted last month for the Reno Gazette Journal found just 48 percent of Nevadans approving of the job he's doing, compared with 41 percent who disapprove. … What's more, the poll by Research 2000 found that Nevadans don't think much of the job Mr. Reid is doing for the national Democratic Party either. Asked whether 'Democrats under Harry Reid's leadership have a workable agenda,' 35 percent of state voters said 'yes,' while 43 percent said 'no.' And by a 46 percent to 36 percent margin, his constituents said Mr. Reid doesn't have the 'leadership qualities' to guide Democrats to control of the Senate this year. The survey polled 600 likely Nevada voters last month and has a margin of error of 4 percentage points."

House Makes Emailing Offices More Difficult. The Washington Post (6/12, D1, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "Congress to Lobby Groups: Drop Dead! That could be the headline on the latest development from the House of Representatives. Last month the House quietly began to make it harder for interest groups to send large numbers of e-mails to lawmakers." Increasingly, citizens "are being forced to demonstrate a basic knowledge of mathematics to have any chance of communicating electronically with their congressional offices." At the end of May, "the House started to offer congressmen the chance to add an extra obstacle -- the completion of a math problem -- to their already difficult-to-penetrate e-mail systems. The purpose, officials said, was to cut down on the deluge of messages they receive." Even with "many impediments, lawmakers still bellyache that the torrent of e-mails they get every day is more than their staffs can handle. According to a recent study, electronic messages to the House doubled to 99 million from 2000 to 2004. In the Senate, the number of e-mails more than tripled to 83 million during the same period." The math problem idea "is to ensure that only actual people -- and not mass-mailing computers of the kind often used by interest groups -- will send e-mails to the House from now on."

OPM To Reexamine Bids To Provide Dental, Vision Benefits. The Washington Post (6/12, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "One of the biggest benefit programs planned for federal employees and retirees in years -- enhanced dental and vision benefits -- is having trouble getting off the drawing boards. Last month, the Office of Personnel Management announced it had selected 10 vendors for the new Federal Employee Dental and Vision Program, scheduled to start Dec. 31. Last week, the OPM quietly informed congressional committees that it had decided to take a fresh look at the bids. … The reassessment of the bids was triggered by a protest filed by Blue Cross and Blue Shield at the Government Accountability Office, a congressional auditing agency that often handles contractor complaints. … In a statement, the OPM said it reopened the vendor selection process 'to reaffirm the integrity of the procurement process' and to put OPM in the best possible position to negotiate for reasonably priced dental benefits."

Bush Personal Aide Profiled. Time (6/19, Allen) profiles Blake Gottesman, personal aide to President Bush. Gottesman "has blossomed into a systems analyst, gatekeeper and diplomat who serves as the membrane between the President and the rest of the staff." Time adds, "White House Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett calls Gottesman 'a walking mood ring,' the unquestioned authority on whom the President wants in his limo, what member of Congress he may accept in his office on Air Force One and whether it is wise for a top aide to bring up a particular topic at a particular time."

Administration Seeks To Take Focus Off Bush Poll Numbers. U.S. News and World Report (6/19, Walsh) reports that in the wake of terrorist leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi's death and Republican Rep.-elect Brian Bilbray's victory in the CA50 special election, "things are looking brighter for President Bush." Aides "hope Bush's Camp David summit this week to plan the next phase of the Iraqi occupation will generate more positive momentum." US News adds that Bush "is building on his upward bounce by showing a new receptivity to fresh ideas and a willingness to change the way he does business. Critics say it's long overdue, but the president and his inner circle have begun a concerted effort to 'change the conversation,' according to one senior official, and take the focus off his job-approval ratings, which have lingered in the low to mid-30s."

DOJ_NMG_0032905

Conservative Intellectuals Said To Be Rejecting Bush. In the New Republic (6/19), Jonathan Chait says, "Not long ago, conservatives hailed" George W. Bush "as a fearless leader in the war on terrorism, a great man of history, Reagan's son. Long after the patriotic upsurge following September 11 had crested, the conservative base held him in awe." But now, "his former acolytes are furiously denouncing him." Conservative "intellectuals and activists, the right's ideological vanguard, have decided that Bush is not Reagan's son after all. Indeed, they have discovered that he is not, and never has been, a conservative, but rather that he is a fraud masquerading as one."

Marcus Calls DeLay's Farewell Speech "Sneering, Belligerent." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (6/12, A21, 744K) that Rep. Tom DeLay's farewell address on the House floor last week was "stunning for its sneering, belligerent partisans hip. … DeLay made clear that he wanted to leave the way he behaved throughout his 22 years in Washington -- contemptuous of the opposition and unrepentant about his cutthroat tactics." Marcus adds, "There is a place for partisanship, and an honor in hewing to principles that divide the parties. But DeLay's zero-sum politics diminishes the capacity of government to solve difficult problems."

NYTimes Says State Department Should Cover Programs To Train Foreign Militaries. The New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "The Senate plans to begin consideration today of the defense authorization bill for the coming year. One particularly distressing section of the package would reauthorize the Pentagon to arm and train foreign militaries, something it was first authorized to do for 2006. … Congress should return these programs to State Department supervision. If it cannot summon the will to do that, it should at least mandate that the programs financed by the Pentagon conform to the same democratic and human rights standards that apply when they are run by the State Department."

WSJournal Praises FAA Handling Of NATCA Contract. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) offers congratulations to Federal Aviation Administrator Marion Blakey for her winning battle "over the latest contract for federal air traffic controllers. The National Air Traffic Controllers Association is one of the few federal labor unions accorded the right to negotiate its contract terms, with the caveat that should discussions reach an impasse -- and Congress not act -- the FAA could impose a contract." The Journal adds, "No word yet from Natca if it intends to strike, but it may have learned its lesson in 1981 when President Reagan fired controllers for walking off the job. With an air traffic control system in need of costly upgrades to reduce delays and cancelled flights, it's especially good to see a majority of Republicans defy union intimidation."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Keeping Close Eye On Inflation Expectations. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Conkey, 2.11M) reports that the Federal Reserve is closely watching the inflation expectations of consumers and markets. Inflation expectations "have become increasingly important to monetary policy in recent years. When people anticipate a rising inflation rate, the prevailing theory goes, they are likely to behave in ways that will bring about higher prices. … Preventing this kind of inflationary spiral is what Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke had in mind last week when he said the central bank will be 'vigilant' in combating the recent upward trend in prices."

USA Today (6/12, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports that the two inflation reports this week from the government "could determine whether the Federal Reserve keeps raising interest rates or stands aside. Traders and economists are anxiously awaiting Tuesday's wholesale price report and Wednesday's consumer price index, as they try to regroup from last week's stock market dive. The question for the markets is whether the inflation measures will jump, inducing the Fed at its June 28-29 meeting to boost its target for short-term rates above the current 5% level to tamp down price pressures."

Gasoline Prices Expected To Decline Further. The Christian Science Monitor (6/12, Scherer, 61K) reports that relief from rising gas prices may be on the way. After the price of oil hit a high of $75.17 a barrel last month, "demand in the United States dipped a few percentage points. Demand by other big developed economies has also eased in recent months, reaching a level that's actually lower than a year ago. Oil markets started to factor in some of these supply-and-demand dynamics last week: The price of crude oil fell below $70 a barrel on Thursday." The lower prices "are a good sign for consumers -- and the price of the hydrocarbon could stabilize or drop more if, as widely expected, both the US and global economies grow at a slower pace for the rest of the year."

Energy Firms Betting East Coast Gasoline Terminals Won't Be Built. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Gold, 2.11M) reports, "Several energy companies are making big bets that new tanker terminals for importing natural gas along the East Coast won't be built, a turn of events that could put upward pressure on consumer heating and electricity bills there." Several companies "plan to build natural-gas pipelines to bring gas to the region over land from other parts of the country. … Earlier this year, Kinder Morgan Energy Partners LP and Sempra Energy said they were teaming up to build a $4 billion, 1,300-mile gas pipeline from the Rockies to Ohio. Combined, the new pipelines should deliver as much as 3.5 billion cubic feet a day into the East Coast market by 2009. Neither pipeline project would be moving ahead unless the companies felt confident the less-expensive, brand-new LNG terminals wouldn't be there to compete, said Bernard J. Picchi, energy research director at Foresight Research Solutions LLC."

DOJ_NMG_0032906

States Move To Transform Medicaid. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/12, A1, Goldstein, 744K) reports that "states are moving aggressively to transform the nation's largest public health insurance program, adding fees, restricting benefits and creating incentives for patients to take responsibility for their health. … Starting July 1, West Virginia will phase in a redesigned form of Medicaid that requires patients to sign a 'member agreement,' promising that they will keep doctors' appointments, take prescribed medicine and not overuse hospital emergency rooms. Patients who refuse to sign or to follow the rules will be eligible for less care. Kentucky is dividing its Medicaid patients into four categories, depending on their health and their age, with different benefits for each group. … Florida, meanwhile, will privatize part of its Medicaid system in September, directing patients in Jacksonville and Broward County to pick from 19 health plans, each offering different services."

NYTimes Calls New York Effort To Combat Medicaid Fraud "A Disgrace." An editorial in the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) says New York state's "efforts to weed out Medicaid fraud have been a disgrace. … New York needs more staff members to investigate Medicaid fraud. The state must have a chief Medicaid inspector who is not a political hack, and a workable whistle-blower or false-claims law. The biggest Medicaid program in the country should also strive to be the cleanest."

Democrats Lose Ground In Gubernatorial Races. USA Today (6/12, Page, 2.31M) reports the "political landscape has gotten friendlier for congressional Democrats over the past six months, but the party's prospects for scoring big gains in governors' races now look more difficult." In Michigan, "Gov. Jennifer Granholm — the darling of Democrats when she was elected in 2002 — is now in a dead heat with Republican challenger Dick DeVos. A statewide poll last month by EPIC-MRA put him at 46%, her at 45%. Last fall, she had held a 23-point lead." In Wisconsin, "Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle is increasingly vulnerable, in part because of ethics controversies in his administration. In a statewide Strategic Vision poll in April, Doyle was at 45%; U.S. Rep. Mark Green, a Republican hopeful, was at 43%." Among the nation's "10 biggest states, Democratic prospects since the beginning of the year have gotten tougher in four — California, Georgia, Michigan and Pennsylvania — and better in one, New York." The GOP "has more governorships at risk this year. Among 36 races on the ballot, 22 are for Republican-held seats, 14 for Democratic-held ones." Since 1994, Republicans "have held a majority of governorships — now 28 states to Democrats' 22. Democrats hope to turn that around this year by picking up at least four of them." USA Today (6/12, 2.31M) also runs a table listing information on the races in six of the most populous 10 races, and a brief caption for the table.

Reynolds Says CA50 Result Shows Corruption Won't Be Issue In November. Roll Call (6/12, Kurtz) reports, "Fresh off a special election in which the corruption issue did not carry the Democratic candidate to victory, National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) predicted Friday that corruption would not be a factor in the race to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), and he reiterated his belief that the Democrats will not be able to use the issue to their advantage in the midterm elections." Reynolds said "last week's special election to succeed incarcerated ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) was a perfect opportunity to test the 'culture of corruption' message that Democrats have pounded throughout the election cycle."

Emanuel Says GOP Avoided "Disaster" With Bilbray Win. Appearing on ABC's This Week (6/11, Stephanopoulos), Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that with Republican Brian Bilbray's victory in the special election to fill the seat of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, what Republicans "really did was avoid a disaster." Emanuel said, "The Republican Party spent $5 million, the most they've ever spent, in an overwhelming Republican district and eked out a victory with less than 50 percent of the vote. And the only way Congressman Bilbray did that was by attacking the president of the United States, of his own party." Emanuel's Republican counterpart, also appearing on This Week, said it appeared that Bilbray's Democratic opponent, Francine Busby, "got no more than what Kerry got in that district."

Republicans' Good News May Not Affect Long-Term Political Environment. In his Roll Call column (6/12), Stuart Rothenberg says, "California's 50th district special election. The death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq. The foiling of a major terrorist plot in Canada. A cooling of tensions over Iran. The unemployment rate down to 4.6 percent. After a 17-month string of virtually unbroken bad news, Republicans suddenly find themselves confronting something they could not have expected, and may now no longer recognize: good news. How will they handle it?" Republican partisans "should not kid themselves about the political environment," as "more bad news from" the Middle East is "probably around the corner (if it hasn't already happened)." Second, "the public's mood already is sour, so many Americans may discount good news, just the way they have ignored the strength of the economy." Third, Republicans "need to understand that while they dodged a bullet in California's 50th district, that result guarantees nothing about November." Democrat Francine Busby "has been described as a 'mediocre' candidate so often that it might as well be her middle name. But Democratic nominees in Connecticut's 2nd and 4th districts, Indiana's 8th and 9th districts and Florida's 22nd district— just to mention a handful of contests — are much stronger than Busby and much more likely to have appeal to general election voters."

DOJ_NMG_0032907

Several Clinton Administration Alumni Seeking Elective Office. The AP (6/12, Johnson) reports Clinton administration alumni "are taking their turn in the political spotlight while their former leader cheers from the sidelines." Former President Clinton said, "I am pleased and proud that so many of them have run or are running for office." The AP adds, "Nowhere is the Clinton class more evident than in New York, where the ex-president and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton now live. Four of five Democrats hoping to succeed Eliot Spitzer as New York's attorney general served in the Clinton administration." One Clinton alumnus "is Charlie King, a candidate for state attorney general." The Clinton class "also includes: Kirsten Gillibrand, a former HUD lawyer under Andrew Cuomo. She is running for Congress in the New York's 20th District, which stretches north from Albany's suburbs. Sheldon Whitehouse, a former U.S. attorney. He is running for the U.S. Senate in Rhode Island. Tom Perez, a former deputy U.S. attorney. He is running for attorney general in Maryland. Bill Halter, Clinton's deputy Social Security commissioner. He advanced last month to Tuesday's Democratic runoff for the nomination for lieutenant governor in Arkansas." The "crowded field for New York attorney general also features Sean Patrick Maloney, an aide in the Clinton White House aide. In addition, Denise O'Donnell, the former U.S. attorney in Buffalo, dropped out of the race on June 3."

Byrd, In Tough Race, Faces Scrutiny For Votes On Social Issues. Roll Call (6/12, Whittington) reports when Sen. Robert Byrd (W.Va.) "was one of two Democrats last week to vote to invoke cloture and force an up-or-down vote on a federal amendment banning gay marriage — a position that plays well with the socially conservative voters back home — Republicans wasted little time in blasting the move." Byrd has said "he is against gay marriage, but he opposes a constitutional measure banning it because he believes the matter should be left up to each state and he would have voted no on the underlying bill." But the "most recent vote illustrates the potentially perilous line that Byrd, who today becomes the chamber's longest-serving Senator, must walk as he seeks re-election to an unprecedented 9th term this November." Byrd "faces millionaire businessman John Raese (R) in what is expected to be his toughest race yet." But Democratic strategists "scoff at the notion that Byrd's recent actions — including supporting President Bush's Supreme Court nominees and proposing a constitutional amendment to allow voluntary prayer in public schools — amount to any sort of election-year conversion or pandering to conservatives."

Edwards Leads Clinton In Iowa Caucus Poll. The Des Moines Register (6/11, 166K) ran the results of an Iowa Poll on the 2008 Democratic caucuses taken May 29 to June 1. John Edwards leads with 30%, with Sen. Hillary Clinton next at 26%. However, the poll has a 4.9% margin of error. Sen. John Kerry was a distant third at 12%, followed by Gov. Tom Vilsack 10%, Tom Daschle 3%, Sen. Russ Feingold 3%, Mark Warner 3%, Sen. Evan Bayh 2%, and Wesley Clark 2%.

Herbert Says Ohio Was "Hijacked" From Kerry In 2004. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (6/12, 1.19M), "Republicans, and even a surprising number of Democrats, have been anxious to leave the 2004 Ohio election debacle behind. But [Robert F. Kennedy, Jr.], in his long, heavily footnoted article ('Was the 2004 Election Stolen?'), leaves no doubt that the democratic process was trampled and left for dead in the Buckeye State. [Sen. John] Kerry almost certainly would have won Ohio if all of his votes had been counted, and if all of the eligible voters who tried to vote for him had been allowed to cast their ballots." Herbert adds, "No one has been able to prove that the election in Ohio was hijacked. But whenever it is closely scrutinized, the range of problems and dirty tricks that come to light is shocking."

Local TV Stations Losing, Viewers, Revenue To Internet. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, A1, Barnes, 2.11M) reports that the internet is drawing viewers and revenue away from local TV stations, which for decades have been "a fount of cash for some of the industry's biggest players such as Viacom Inc., News Corp. and General Electric Co.'s NBC. Newspaper publishers such as Tribune Co. and Gannett Co., also diversified into television. For many of these companies, steady profits from their stations funded expansion into other businesses." The Journal adds, "The picture has changed. Total local broadcast revenue fell 9% in 2005 to $16.8 billion, according to the Television

DOJ_NMG_0032908

Bureau of Advertising. The chief culprit: Big advertisers cutting back budgets or moving to the Web."

Growing Number Of Students Finish College Over $100,000 In Debt. USA Today (6/12, A1m Block, 2.31M) reports, "After years of rising college costs and shrinking financial aid, it's come to this: Some graduates are now leaving college with student-loan debt in the six figures. Graduates with more than $100,000 in debt still account for a small subset of borrowers. But their numbers are rising. And the proportion who are leaving college with some level of unmanageable debt -- debt they can't repay without significant hardship -- is swelling. … The rise in unmanageable debt has raised concerns that many graduates won't be able to pursue careers in fields that have traditionally paid modest salaries."

NYTimes Says American Workers Are Downbeat. The New York Times (6/12, 1.19M) editorializes, "It comes as little surprise to anyone nowadays that the deep bonds between company and company town are only as strong as the former's share price, measured by fiscal quarters rather than generations. Still, there is something sad about the spurned affection of a community for its company, the way residents of Newton, Iowa, feel about Maytag. … Shoppers probably won't notice, but Newton and the laid-off Maytag workers everywhere will feel a void. The economy is growing fast, but American workers are downbeat, and Maytag helps explain why. Jobs can be replaced, but the sense of safety and security cannot. The brand lives on, but the identity is gone."

Iran Wants Talks, But Balks At Immediate Enrichment Freeze. The New York Times (6/12, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "Iran has begun a public campaign that appears to be aimed at nudging the six nations that have offered a package of incentives into negotiations over its nuclear program without first freezing its efforts to make nuclear fuel." During "a hastily planned trip to Cairo, apparently to drum up international support for Iran's stand, Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator rejected any preconditions for opening negotiations over the fate of its nuclear program. In the clearest response from Iranian officials to the incentives package, Ali Larijani, the chief negotiator, told reporters on Sunday, 'We have already said that we would not accept any preconditions and that we are supporting negotiations without prior conditions.'"

The Financial Times (6/12, Smyth) adds, "Hamid-Reza Asefi, the foreign ministry spokesman, said on Sunday that Iran would take 'as long as is necessary' before replying, and echoed Saturday's announcement from Manouchehr Mottaki, the foreign minister, that it might submit counter-proposals. Mr. Mottaki spoke of 'shuttle diplomacy' in which Iran would send 'a genuine proposal...or counter-package' to the Europeans. He did not elaborate on what might be contained in the proposals." USA Today/AP (6/12, Dareini) and Washington Post (6/12, A17, Dareini, 744K) also report the story.

US, Europe Push IAEA Members On Draft Ahead Of Monday Meeting. The AP (6/12, Dareini) reports, "In two position papers shown to the AP, the United States and Europe were lobbying hard for support of the package from members of the" IAEA Board "before a Monday meeting of the body. 'We are...encouraging all board members to make firm statements to call on Iran' to negotiate on the six-power offer, the US position paper said. If Tehran declines, the text warned that the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany 'have agreed to pursue measures…(to) pressure the Iranian regime to change course.'"

US Will Seek UN Sanctions If Iran Refuses To Suspend Uranium Enrichment. Time (6/19, Shannon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Iran's resumption of uranium enrichment last week could not have come at a better time for the Bush Administration. The US sees Iran's defiance…as new ammunition in its battle to persuade the European powers, Russia and China that only harsh sanctions can impede Iran's quest for the Bomb. If, as US officials anticipate, Iran refuses to suspend enrichment and return to the negotiating table, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will demand sanctions from the UN Security Council. Russia and China have pledged not to veto if Iran refuses to cooperate."

Conservatives Said To Be Upset About Iran Proposal. The Los Angeles Times (6/12, Richter, 958K) reports, "Last month, as Rice rolled out the Iran proposal, her senior staff contacted influential conservative editors and pundits in hopes that a full explanation of the deal would head off criticism from the right." The effort "helped mute reactions, commentators said." But "the new initiative has drawn criticism, if not wholesale condemnation, from conservative opinion leaders such as the Wall Street Journal editorial page and the National Review magazine, and conservative stalwarts such as American Enterprise Institute scholar Michael Rubin and former Reagan administration official Frank J. Gaffney Jr., among others. So far, only a few conservative members of Congress have joined the conservative foreign policy experts' complaints — in public, at least. This is partly because they believe Bush has a weak hand and few options, said Wittmann, now with the centrist Progressive Policy Institute. " Nevertheless, "the discontent marks a challenge for Bush at a time when he is trying to rebuild conservative support."

Iranian Official Says US Should Rebuke MEK. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M), M.A. Mohammadi, press secretary for Mission of Iran to the UN, writes, "The US Congress shouldn't support a terrorist organization that has committed atrocities in Iran, including the assassination of a president, a prime minister and more than 70 lawmakers ('Iranian Exile Group Aims to Build Bridges; Some in Congress See a Role for an Organization Formally Listed as a Terrorist Group,' May 22). How do such actions correspond to the values defended by Congress? The European Union has recognized the Mujahedeen-e Khalq, or People's Mujahedeen of Iran, as a terrorist organization, and even a recent report by the U.S. government has acknowledged that the MEK 'has been launching attacks on Western and Iranian targets since the 1970s.' Instead of condoning acts of terrorism against Iran, US lawmakers should respect Iran's sovereignty and international law and prove their goodwill toward the Iranian nation by rebuking the MEK."

DOJ_NMG_0032909

Latest Gaza Violence Could Derail Both Leaders' Plans. In wrap-up coverage of a weekend of violence in Israel and the Palestinian territories, the Wall Street Journal (6/12, Leggett, 2.11M) reports, "Escalating Israel-Palestinian tension soon may imperil political initiatives being pushed by their leaders and possibly spark a new phase of armed confrontation." Following shelling on Friday that killed eight civilians on a Gaza beach, Hamas ended what had been a longstanding ceasefire, and "left unchecked, the violence could return to the pitched levels of 2002, with implications for both sides and the broader region. Already, Hamas's armed wing has suggested it may resume dispatching suicide bombers into Israel. Senior Israeli military officials said they aren't ruling out a major ground offensive in Gaza, which would be the first since Israel withdrew from that area last summer, and said Israel could target Hamas political officials if Hamas rocket fire continues."

The New York Times (6/12, Azar, 1.19M) also runs a story titled "Errant Shell Turns Girl Into Palestinian Icon," which reports on Huda Ghaliya, "the sixth-grade student whose horrified screams on Friday as she knelt by her dead family on a Gaza beach were televised around the world." She "has quickly become an icon of the Palestinian struggle against Israeli might."

Hamas Vows To Block Abbas's Referendum. Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/12, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The militant faction Hamas announced its intent on Sunday to block" the July 26 referendum "after failing to reach an agreement in talks with him." According to the Times, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "urged Mr. Abbas in a letter on Friday and in a three-hour meeting in Gaza late Saturday night, to abandon the referendum as a divisive mechanism at a time of crisis, when Palestinians must remain united, and to continue dialogue instead to reach agreement. … A planned meeting between Mr. Abbas and the exiled Hamas political leader Khaled Mashal in Yemen, which has been trying, like Egypt, to find common ground between Fatah and Hamas, was also scrapped."

The Washington Post (6/12, A14, Wilson, 744K) reports, "In a statement released Sunday, the imprisoned Hamas leader who signed the document, Abdel Khaleq al-Natsheh, said he no longer supported it. He asked Abbas...to cancel the public vote on the document, which was meant to serve as a basis for negotiation between the two leading Palestinian political movements." The Washington Times (6/12, Mitnick, 90K) also runs a story about the Palestinian split and the violence it is engendering.

Olmert May Find Himself In Hot Seat On European Trip. The Financial Times (6/12, Morris) adds Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "begins a European tour today in which he will likely be obliged to justify his country's military tactics in the territories before he is allowed to turn the focus towards promoting his controversial and potentially unilateral plans for the West Bank. The UK and France, his hosts this week, both condemned Friday's incident in which seven Palestinians were killed during a beach picnic, apparently victims of stray Israeli shelling," and "the deteriorating situation posed a further threat to efforts by the international quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – to get its moribund 'road map' peace plan back on track via renewed negotiations between the antagonists."

Major North Korean Missile Test Could Be Imminent. The Financial Times (6/12, Sevastopulo, Fidler, Fifield) reports, "North Korea is preparing for a possible test of an intercontinental ballistic missile with the potential to hit the US, according to Washington officials. A senior official said there were 'enough indications' to suggest that Pyongyang was getting ready to fire a Taepodong-2 missile from a launch pad in eastern North Korea." The Times calls current planning "far more advanced than on previous occasions," and says U.S. intelligence is "monitoring the launch site" for signs of missile assembly. The Times notes, "Pyongyang…could be bluffing. Kim Jong-Il…has a history of performing eye-catching stunts when he feels he is being ignored, which has happened recently as Washington focuses on resolving nuclear tensions with Iran." North Korea has not conducted a significant missile test since it test-fired its intermediate-range Taepodong-1 in 1998.

Domenici Makes Case For India Nuclear Agreement. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M), Sen. Pete Domenici writes, "Former Sen. Nunn and I have worked closely together to promote our shared nonproliferation goals, but he is wrong when he argues that Congress should impose additional conditions to the U.S.-India agreement. … I consider that partnership vital to the future of our nonproliferation regime. … I believe this agreement can serve as a catalyst to strengthening an eroding nonproliferation regime, a regime that has brighter prospects with India than without her."

DOJ_NMG_0032910

Turkish EU Accession Talks In Jeopardy. The Financial Times (6/12, Dombey, Parker, Boland) reports EU foreign ministers "will seek" today "to prevent a huge setback to Turkey's entry bid that could leave Ankara empty-handed eight months after it agreed to begin" accession talks. The discussions in Luxembourg and the participation of Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul "are in doubt because Cyprus has objects to the EU's plans. On Sunday Mr Gul said he would not go unless ministers rejected Greek Cypriot demands over accession negotiations." Nicosia "insists the EU should make clear reference throughout negotiations to the need for Turkey to recognize" the Greek Cypriot government and establish diplomatic relations. The Times notes, "If the opening of the negotiations is delayed, Turkey's membership bid could be left in limbo," but also adds that similar difficulties preceded last fall's agreement to begin accession discussions. More ominously, the Times notes, "EU officials and governments also have misgivings about the progress of reform in Turkey and the prospects for enlargement of the EU in general. Concerns have been heightened by political and economic instability in Turkey."

Iraq War Casts Pall In Lebanon, Other Middle Eastern Countries. The Washington Post (6/12, A1, Shadid, 744K) reports former Iraqi Insurgent Abu Haritha sits in the northern city of Tripoli, "Lebanon's second-largest," waiting "for what he believes will be a more expansive war beyond Iraq, a struggle he casts in the most cataclysmic of terms." The war in Iraq "has generated some of the most startling images in the Middle East today: a dictator's fall, elections in defiance of insurgent threats and carnage on a scale rarely witnessed. Less visibly, though, the war is building a profound legacy across the Arab world: fear and suspicion over Iraq's repercussions, a generation that casts the Bush administration's policy as an unquestioned war on Islam, and a subterranean reserve of men who, like Abu Haritha, declare that the fight against the United States in Iraq is a model for the future." Tripoli "is one of the most visible manifestations of the war, a rough-and-tumble city being transformed by growing radicalism and religious fervor that may long outlast the death of Zarqawi and the U.S. presence in Iraq, now in its fourth year. Here, and elsewhere, that militancy may prove to be the inheritance of both the war and the Bush administration's professed aim of bringing democratic reform to the region."

Somali Warlord Vows To Contest Islamic Militia's Control Of Mogadishu. The AP (6/12, Hassan) reports Muse Sudi Yalahow, "one of the secular warlords who lost control of Somalia's capital to an Islamic militia, vowed Sunday that the battle for Mogadishu was not over — an ominous warning for a city devastated by years of bloodshed and anarchy." But it was "unclear how many fighters and weapons the defeated alliance had, and many of the U.S.-backed warlords remain in hiding." The "threat came a day after Islamic fighters stopped showings of the World Cup soccer tournament, one of the first signs that the fundamentalist force now controlling nearly all of southern Somalia could install strict Islamic rule." Yalahow said "his group of secular warlords is regrouping to fight the Islamic militia, whom he accused of having ties to al-Qaida."

Annan Says US Use Of Financial Leverage Could Hurt Reform. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/12), UN Secretary General Kofi Annan says, "A minor storm broke out last week when Mark Malloch Brown, my deputy, made a speech suggesting that the US should engage more fully and wholeheartedly with other members of the UN to bring about reform. That is absolutely right, but he and I believe the same message needs to be heard in many other countries besides the US." The US "is trying to use the power of the purse to force through badly needed management reforms and these tactics have provoked a reaction among developing countries. Most of these are well aware of the need to reform – not least because it is in those countries that the UN provides vital services from peacekeeping and peace-building through emergency relief to strengthening human rights, helping organise elections and fighting infectious disease. That means they are the ones who have most to gain from a well-managed UN that really gives value for money. Their quarrel is much less with the detail of proposed reforms than with what they see as the overwhelming influence of a few rich countries."

The Financial Times (6/12, Turner) reports that while Annan says "the US use of 'the power of the purse' to force through reforms at the United Nations is lessening the chance of those reforms succeeding," he "calls on all countries, including the developing world, to 'turn down their rhetoric' and take a constructive attitude towards this month's UN budget negotiations, which threaten to pit rich against poor in a battle with potentially damaging consequences." Anan's comments "follow last week's high-profile dispute between John Bolton, the US ambassador, and Mark Malloch Brown, the UN deputy secretary-general, after the British official called for better US engagement with the world body."

Bolton Criticized For Blocking UN Management Reforms. In his Washington Post (6/12, A21, 744K), Sebastian Mallaby says US Ambassador to the UN, John R. Bolton, "has a rich history of losing friends and failing to influence people." Bolton has "blundered into U.N.

DOJ_NMG_0032911

management reform, an issue that may soon precipitate a crisis. The top U.N. officials, led by Secretary General Kofi Annan, had laid out a menu of radical changes, designed to eliminate useless conferences and reports and to move staff to departments that most needed them. Bolton added his own brand of bluster to this plan: If poor countries carried on resisting management reforms, rich countries would stop paying for the organization. The deadline for agreeing on reform is the end of this month, but no breakthrough is in sight. Officials are wondering what to do if U.N. checks start bouncing."

G-8 Ministers Say China, Emerging Economic Powers Overloading Poor Countries With Debt. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Phillips, 2.11M) reports the US "and its allies are worried that China and other up-and-coming economic powers may be overloading the world's poorest nations with high-priced debt." At their St. Petersburg meeting, "finance ministers from the Group of Eight leading nations warned China, India, Brazil and South Korea not to promote their exports to poor countries by pushing trade credits the borrowers can ill-afford." The G-8 ministers "find the situation especially troubling because just last year they engineered a write-off of as much as $60 billion in World Bank, International Monetary Fund and other loans for as many as 42 of the world's poorest nations. Now, G-8 officials fear some of those same countries may be slipping back into debt trouble."

Chinese Ambassador Makes Goodwill Tour Of Midwest. USA Today (6/12, Lynch, 2.31M) reports it is "somewhat out of the ordinary, however, for a foreign diplomat to ditch Embassy Row for the flyover states. Yet, there was Chinese Ambassador Zhou Wenzhong earlier this month venerating the 'heartland' and happily pressing the flesh in appearances here and in Kansas City, Mo." Zhou's "two-day Midwestern swing, which included speeches to business groups, local media interviews and even an incongruous stroll amid a flock of penguins, was all part of China's emerging campaign to overhaul a remote and sometimes threatening image. The ambassador's affable style also reflects the growing sophistication of Chinese diplomacy as a once-insular nation adjusts to a newly prominent role in global affairs."

Blogger's Stand Against Chinese Real Estate Market Makes Waves. The Wall Street Journal (6/12, Browne, 2.11M) reports Zou Tao "has become an unlikely hero in this profit-driven city of half-built apartment complexes and luxury villas: He is calling for a boycott of the real-estate market." It is "a daring grass-roots campaign, designed to tamp down overheated property prices" in Shenzhen, China, that "he says has gotten him in trouble with police and attracted threats -- but also the backing of people across the country." Zou "has evidently tapped into a deep resentment against powerful real-estate developers and their local-government backers. They have helped push prices so high that many city residents can't afford to buy, even while numerous units held by speculators remain empty."

Disarming Janjaweed Seen As Key To Reaching Peace In Darfur. The New York Times (6/12, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports Musa Hilal, "the sheik who the State Department and human rights organizations say is an architect and perhaps the key leader of the fearsome Arab militias that have unleashed a torrent of misery in Darfur, laughed softly at the question of who these armed men" were who file around the town of Mistariha, Sudan. Hilal says, "They are soldiers. Just regular soldiers." The Times adds the "commander of the African Union peacekeeping base two dozen miles away, Col. John Bosco Mulisa, said there was little doubt who these men really were." Col. Mulisa says, "They are janjaweed. This town is their headquarters." The Times adds "whoever their commander is and whatever they are called, these men and the weapons they carry will determine whether, after three years of conflict that has left at least 200,000 dead, the fragile efforts to bring peace to this shattered region will succeed or fail." The "first and most critical step of that agreement, signed in May between the government in Khartoum and the largest rebel faction, is the disarmament of the janjaweed. The government pledged to submit a plan to disarm the militias of their heavy weaponry one month after signing the agreement and to finish the job before the end of October. But how do you disarm a phantom army whose sponsors and leaders deny its existence?"

Negotiators Debate Russian Investment In US, European Energy Infrastructure. The New York Times (6/12, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "Russian, American, European and Japanese officials are negotiating over whether Russia should be allowed greater latitude to invest in utilities, pipelines, natural gas facilities and other infrastructure in the United States and Europe." In a "draft declaration for endorsement at a Group of 8 summit meeting next month in St. Petersburg, Russia, broadened Russian access is paired with something the West wants: endorsement of market principles and greater access for foreign investment in the energy industry of Russia, one of the biggest oil and natural gas producers in the world."

Slovakian Neo-Liberal Government Seen As Likely To Lose Elections. In a Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M) op-ed, Robin Shepherd of the German Marshall Fund of the United States says, "Imagine you're the leader of a country where economic growth is running at 6.3%, your government has been praised by the World Bank as the best market reformer in the world, unemployment has fallen to a record low of 10.6% from around 20% in just four years and your flat 19% corporate, value added and income tax rate led Steve Forbes to call your country an 'investors' paradise.' Imagine, also, that your country has seen foreign investment sky-rocket to the point at which it will shortly become the world's biggest per capita car maker, and where your people's feelings about their sense of national worth have gone from shame to something approaching pride. Oh, and as icing on the cake, imagine too that you got your country into the European Union and NATO." With this "record in mind, now consider that you face parliamentary elections this Saturday at which, unless the opinion polls change dramatically, you risk annihilation by a leftist opposition party with no experience of government and a policy agenda filled with populist rhetoric. Welcome to the world of Mikulas Dzurinda, prime minister of Slovakia, who for the past eight years has led what can reasonably claim to have been the most successful neo-liberal government of the 21st century so far."

DOJ_NMG_0032912

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Lawyers Defend Marines In Raid."
"Disney's Low-Key Superhero."
"A Force Of Nature In Chile."
"Details On Detainee Suicides Emerging."
"Old-Style Taint Shadows Election In Mexico."
"Fido Party Of Four, Your Table Is Ready."

USA Today:
"Dems Slipping In State Races."
"In Debt Before You Start."
"'06 Storm Season Off To Early Start."

New York Times:
"Prisoners' Ruse Is Inquiry Focus At Guantánamo."
"U.A.W. Facing Tough Choices, Leader Warns."
"Over Tea, Sheik Denies Stirring Darfur's Torment."
"A Ring Tone Meant To Fall On Deaf Ears."
"Russia Bargains For Bigger Stake In West's Energy."
"In Diabetes, One More Burden For The Mentally Ill."

Washington Post:
"States' Changes Reshape Medicaid."
"Annapolis Publisher Remains Missing."
"Smoke Of Iraq War 'Drifting Over Lebanon.'"
"Ft. Belvoir Job Shift To Alter Commutes."
"For Wal-Mart, Fair Trade May Be More Than A Hill Of Beans."
"Breathing New Rhythm Into Tired Streets."

Washington Times:
"U.S. General Sees Troops Leaving Iraq."
"Deadly Anbar Harbors 'Rat Lines.'"
"Wuerl A 'Teaching Bishop.'"
"Newspaper Publisher Merrill Missing."
"Homeland Security Accepts Fake ID."
"Palestinians Ready To Enjoy Gaza Shoreline."
"These Hacks Won't Leave You Up In The Air."

Detroit Free Press:
"UAW Boss: The Worst Is Upon Us."
"Kids Reach For Own Phones."
"Gettelfinger's Bind: Do More With Less."
"Battle Over Wiretaps To Begin Today."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fernbank Hopes To Uncover Lost Spanish Mission."
"NSA Case In Court Today."
"Atlanta's Mexicans Revel In Cup Win."
"Shoe Leather, Little Else Fuel Campaign."

Houston Chronicle:
"Three Dead Detainees Identified."
"National Congress Looks For Respect."
"Mexico And Its Fans Having A Soccer Ball."
"Alberto No Big Deal In Florida."
"Round Rock Teens' Protests Head To Court."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Preempted By Golf.
CBS: Al Qaeda Statement; Iraq Troop Levels; Taliban Resurgence; Early American Flags; Tropical Storm Alberto; Hollywood Private Eye; Baseball HGH Scandal; China-European-Style Architecture.
NBC: Al Qaeda Statement; Iraq Troop Levels; Haditha Killings-Marine's Attorney; Gitmo Suicides; Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto-Florida; Military Recruiting-Immigrants; Afghanistan Violence; Taiwan-Heavy Rain; Florida-Aging Levee; US World Cup Soccer Team.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Tropical Storm Alberto; AZ-Wildfire; National Guard On NM border; Zarqawi Autopsy.
CBS: Bush-Camp David Meeting; Iraq Bombing; Tropical Storm Alberto; Warrantless Wiretapping; Gitmo Suicides; Gas Prices; Tony Awards; Wall Street.
NPR: Tropical Storm Alberto; China-Amnesty International Report; Afghanistan-Bombing; Kashmir-Bus Station Grenade Attack; Infant Mortality; Iraq-Bombings; Bush-Camp David Meeting; World Cup-Sex Trafficking; Tony Awards.

DOJ_NMG_0032913

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a meeting with the Interagency Team on Iraq, Camp David.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH —Speaks at the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation 2006 Mission Conference. Crystal Gateway Marriott, 1700 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington. Speaks and hosts entertainment provided by the Jersey Boys at the Senate Spouses luncheon. East Room.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 3 p.m. Meets to debate the defense authorization bill. No votes scheduled.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on implementation of the Energy Policy Act of 2005. Assistant Energy Secretary Dennis Spurgeon; Douglas Chapin MPR Associates; Tom Christopher, Chief Executive Officer, Areva, Inc. Lynchburg, Va.; Lawrence Burns, General Motors; Regis Matzie, Westinghouse Electric Company; Jeff Serfass, National Hydrogen Association; Dan Keuter, Entergy Nuclear, Jackson, Miss. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

3 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the investment treaty with Uruguay. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. The House meets for morning hour debate, and at 2 p.m. will turn to legislative business. Votes will be postponed until 6:30 p.m. Highlights: Conference Report on H.R. 4939 - Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, the Global War on Terror, and Hurricane Recovery, 2006. Suspensions (12 bills): 1) H.R. 4013 - To amend the Reclamation Projects Authorization and Adjustment Act of 1992 to provide for conjunctive use of surface and groundwater in Juab County, Utah. 2) H.R. 4162 - Los Padres National Forest Land Exchange Act of 2005. 3) H.R. 3967 - Pactola Reservoir Reallocation Authorization Act of 2005. 4) H.Con.Res. 368 - Expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to honoring the goals and ideals of Alex`s Lemonade Stand Days, June 9 through 11, 2006. 5) H.Con.Res. 338 - Expressing the sense of Congress regarding the activities of Islamist terrorist organizations in the Western Hemisphere. 6) H.Res. 794 - Recognizing the 17th anniversary of the massacre in Tiananmen Square, Beijing, in the People`s Republic of China, and for other purposes. 7) H.Res. 804 - Condemning the unauthorized, inappropriate, and coerced ordination of Catholic bishops by the People`s Republic of China. 8) H.Con.Res. 408 - Commending the Government of Canada for its renewed commitment to the Global War on Terror. 9) H.Res. 608 - Condemning the escalating levels of religious persecution in the People`s Republic of China. 10) H.Res. 792 - Recognizing the 40th anniversary of the independence of Guyana and extending best wishes to Guyana for peace and further progress, development, and prosperity. 11) H.R. 5169 - Wilfred Edward `Cousin Willie` Sieg, Sr. Post Office Designation Act . 12) S. 1445 - William H. Emery Post Office Designation Act.

5:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Hearing on On H.Res. ___ - Declaring that the United States will complete the mission in Iraq and prevail in the Global War on Terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary; H.R. ____ - Transportation, Treasury, HUD, Judiciary, DC, Appropriations Act for 2007. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: LATIN AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT _ The Inter-American Development Bank holds a conference on a new initiative to deal with Latin American development. Highlights: 6 p.m. Session on ``Redefining the Possible," with former President Bill Clinton. Location: IADB, 1330 New York Ave. NW.

SPARK CONFERENCE _ The Society of Professional Administrators and Recordkeepers holds its 2006 National Conference. Highlights: 10:15 a.m. Former Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., speaks on ``Washington Perspectives." 1 p.m. - 2 p.m. Ask the CEOs session with Phil Lussier of CitiStreet and Joe Ready of Wachovia. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ACCOUNTING OVERSIGHT _ 9 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board has scheduled a Standing Advisory Group meeting. The advisory group will discuss topics related to audits of internal control over financial reporting as well as other standards-setting topics. Location: Army and Navy Club, 901 17th St. NW.

ENERGY POLICY _ 10 a.m. The National Commission on Energy Policy holds a briefing to release a White Paper on energy needs and challenges. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

JOHANNS _ 10:45 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaksa to the Financial Women's Association. Location: Morgan Lewis Bockius law firm, 1111 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

KURDS-IRAQ _ 11:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds an event with Qubad Talabany, Representative of the Patriot Union of Kurdistan, discussing Iraq's new government. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

BANKRUPTCY-PENSIONS _ 12 p.m. American Bankruptcy Institute holds a briefing on pension issues in bankruptcy with Bankruptcy Judge Eugene Wedoff, Chief Judge of the Northern District of Illinois and presiding judge over the United Airlines bankruptcy case. Location: Room 2226, Rayburn.

FUTURE ENERGY SOURCES _ 12 p.m. The Foundation for Nuclear Studies and the Congress and

DOJ_NMG_0032914

Science Program of the American Chemical Society host a Senate Nuclear Caucus a luncheon discussion, ``Climate Change: What Is The Role of Next Generation Nuclear Energy and Hydrogen? Participants are: Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho; Vice Admiral John J. Grossenbacher (Ret.), Laboratory Director, Idaho National Laboratory; Joseph Romm, author of ``The Hype About Hydrogen: Fact and Fiction in the Race to Save the Climate; and former Acting Assistant Secretary of Energy Ambassador John Ritch, Director General, World Nuclear Association, former U.S. Ambassador to UN Organizations in Vienna. Location: Room 418, Russell Senate Office Building.

PORT SECURITY _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Senator Chafee sponsors a congressional brieifng focusing on port security and cargo screening technologies. Panel members include: Elainec Dezenski, former assistant secretary for policy, Department of Homeland Security; David Schanzer, director of the Center for Homeland Security Studies, Duke University; and Peter Kant, vice president of government affairs, Rapiscan Systems. Location: Room 188, Russell Senate Office Building.

MEDICARE SAVINGS _ 12:15 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform hold a briefing Medicare savings programs, with Jack Ebeler, who chaired the National Academy of Social Insurance panel that made the program recommendations, others. Location: Room 325, Russell.

REID-ENERGY INDEPENDENCE _ 12:30 p.m. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid will keynote the opening lunch of the Campaign for Americas Futures Take Back America 2006 conference. The lunch session, “Apollo: New Energy, New Jobs, New Independence for America, will focus on new initiatives to make America energy independent." From high gas prices to the rising costs of middle-class life, Americans face serious challenges. Location: Washington Hilton, International Ballroom, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

POLITICS-DISASTER POLL _ 1 p.m. There will be a teleconference on release of a new poll (to be released on Monday) that will show a significant differences among Democratic, Republican and Independent voters with regard to how unprepared the nation is to deal with a flu pandemic, a major terrorist attack, global warming or collision with an asteroid. The poll was conducted for SCI FI Channel and NBC News Productions by Bill McInturff with Public Opinion Strategies and Anna Greenberg with Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research. Contacts: Ed Rothschild, 202-879-9317. Notes: Call-in number is: 800 216-1258. Passcode - 202 879-9339.

BIES _ 3 p.m. Federal Reserve Board Governor Susan Schmidt Bies speaks to the Financial Women's Association Washington Briefing Conference. Location: Room 121, Cannon.

IMMIGRATION-WILSON _ 4 p.m. The Hudson Institute holds an event with former California Gov. Pete Wilson discussing immigration policy. Location: 6th floor, 1015 15th St. NW.

BERNANKE _ 7:30 p.m. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke speaks to the American Bankers Association Stonier Graduate School of Banking speakers program on bank supervision. Location: Gaston Hall, Healy Building, Georgetown University.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General’s News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:18 AM
To: Friedrich, Matthew; Hertling, Richard
Subject: NSLs

Does one of you happen to have tps on NSLs? I'm looking for tps that make the pt that NSLs are not a creation of the Bush Administration; are long recognized and used law enforcement tools that predate Patriot, etc.

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:54 AM
To: Hertling, Richard
Subject: RE: NSLs

Thanks, Richard.

From: Hertling, Richard
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:45 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: NSLs

I have forwarded this to Brent McIntosh in OLP, as he handles our national security issues.

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:18 AM
To: Friedrich, Matthew; Hertling, Richard
Subject: NSLs

Does one of you happen to have tps on NSLs? I'm looking for tps that make the pt that NSLs are not a creation of the Bush Administration; are long recognized and used law enforcement tools that predate Patriot, etc.

McIntosh, Brent

From: McIntosh, Brent
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 10:14 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Cc: Hertling, Richard; Friedrich, Matthew
Subject: RE: NSLs
Attachments: National Security Letters 2.pdf; NSL.Specter.11.23.05.pdf

I've attached talkers on NSLs and the changes wrought by both PATRIOT and PATRIOT reauth. I've also attached our letter to the Hill following last year's Washington Post front-page NSL hit piece, which captures nicely our responses to lots of myths about NSLs.

From: Hertling, Richard
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:44 AM
To: McIntosh, Brent
Subject: FW: NSLs

I will let you reply.

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:18 AM
To: Friedrich, Matthew; Hertling, Richard
Subject: NSLs

Does one of you happen to have tps on NSLs? I'm looking for tps that make the pt that NSLs are not a creation of the Bush Administration; are long recognized and used law enforcement tools that predate Patriot, etc.

National Security Letters

- National security letters ("NSLs") are similar to administrative subpoenas and may be used by the FBI to obtain specified information from specified companies in international terrorism and espionage investigations. NSLs are generally used to obtain:

  - Billing and transactional records maintained by telephone companies and Internet service providers;

  - Credit reports and other consumer information maintained by consumer reporting agencies; and

  - Financial information maintained by financial institutions.

- Recipients of NSLs can be prohibited from informing others that they have received these requests for information in order to safeguard the integrity of the sensitive terrorism and espionage investigations in which national security letters are used. But that prohibition only attaches if the FBI or DOJ certifies that certain enumerated harms — such as harm to the national security or diplomatic relations — would result from disclosure.

- In Doe v. Ashcroft, a federal district judge in the Southern District of New York struck down as unconstitutional 18 U.S.C. § 2709, one of five statutes giving federal investigators the power to issue NSLs.

- 18 U.S.C. § 2709, which was based on language offered by Senator Leahy, authorizes the FBI to issue NSLs in order to obtain billing and transactional records from telephone companies and Internet service providers and was passed as part of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986.

- This court ruling did not strike down any provision of the USA PATRIOT Act. Rather, the part of the statute invalidated by the court was part of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986 ("ECPA").

  - Section 505 of the USA PATRIOT Act did amend 18 U.S.C. § 2709 and other NSL statutes to eliminate the requirement that the FBI identify specific and articulable facts that information sought through an NSL pertained to a foreign power or an agent of a foreign power, such as a terrorist or spy.

  - Section 505 substituted the requirement that information sought through an NSL must be relevant to an authorized international terrorism or espionage investigation, the same relevance standard that is used in the context of grand jury subpoenas.

- The difference between the pre-PATRIOT Act "specific and articulable facts" standard and the post-PATRIOT Act "relevance standard" did not play a key role in the decision of the federal district judge in the Southern District of New York to strike down 18 U.S.C. § 2709 as unconstitutional.

- Rather, as stated above, that decision was based on the perceived inability of an NSL recipient to challenge the NSL request in court and the permanent and blanket prohibition on the recipient of an NSL disclosing that it had received the request.

- The legislative reauthorizing the USA PATRIOT Act remedied these concerns by providing for challenges to NSLs and their attendant nondisclosure requirements. The reauthorization legislation:

  - Makes clear that an NSL recipient can challenge an NSL in court and that a court can modify or set aside the NSL if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive.

  - Makes clear that the Attorney General may seek judicial enforcement of NSLs when recipients refuse to reply with the request for information.

  - Makes clear that an NSL recipient may disclose the existence of the NSL in the course of seeking legal advice from an attorney or obtaining assistance from those whose help is necessary to comply with the request for information.

  - Provides that the nondisclosure requirement only applies to an NSL in instances where a government officer certifies that disclosure of the NSL may result in: (1) a danger to the national security of the United States; (2) interference with a criminal, counterterrorism, or counterintelligence investigation; (3) interference with diplomatic relations; or (4) danger to the life or physical safety of any person.

  - Requires that any NSL subject to a nondisclosure requirement contain notification of that nondisclosure requirement.

  - Imposes criminal liability on those who knowingly violate NSL non-disclosure requirements, but only as a specific-intent crime.

  - Allow for NSL recipients to challenge a nondisclosure requirement and for a court to modify or set aside such a requirement.

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

November 23, 2005

The Honorable Arlen Specter
Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

On Sunday, November 6, the Washington Post published a feature article by Barton Gellman titled "The FBI's Secret Scrutiny: In Hunt for Terrorists, Bureau Examines Records of Ordinary Americans." The article presents a materially misleading portrayal of the FBI's use of National Security Letters (NSLs), which are a long-standing and important tool for preventing terrorist attacks and espionage. Contrary to the impression created by the Post's article, NSLs do not empower the FBI to spy on ordinary Americans, to listen to phone calls or read emails, or to review what books Americans read or web sites they visit. Rather, NSLs empower the FBI to conduct national security investigations by requesting very specific categories of information critical in tracking the activities of terrorists and spies and determining whether a person is a terrorist or spy.

While many of the distortions and factual errors in the Post's article can be debunked only through classified information, other flaws in the article's discussion are revealed on the face of public records and of the laws passed by the Congress. Indeed, some are revealed in the article's own internal inconsistencies. We have already briefed your staffs on many of the article's distortions and falsehoods, including those for which the underlying facts are classified. This letter is intended to provide you an account of the facts regarding certain inaccuracies that can be rebutted in an unclassified format. We have therefore listed a number of those errors and explained the truth regarding those errors.

1. As a general theme, the Post claims that the FBI uses NSLs to spy on law-abiding Americans. This is simply false: The FBI cannot and does not use NSLs outside of authorized national security investigations.

   Claims: "The PATRIOT Act, and the Bush administration guidelines for its use, transformed those [national security] letters by permitting clandestine scrutiny of U.S. residents and visitors who are not alleged to be terrorists or spies."; "Career investigators and Bush administration officials emphasized, in congressional testimony and interviews for this story, that national security letters are for hunting terrorists, not fishing through the private lives of the innocent. The distinction is not as clear in practice."

Fact: By law and in practice, NSLs cannot be and are not used to spy on law-abiding Americans or to investigate ordinary crimes or even domestic terrorism — they are limited to requests for information relevant to authorized investigations of international terrorism and espionage. To be sure, some people whose records are produced in response to an NSL may not be terrorists or spies or associated with terrorists or spies. But in these vital investigations, the FBI needs to be able to check out every tip and track down every lead. As the attacks of 9/11 taught us all, even the slightest lead must be aggressively pursued. NSLs allow the FBI use of an efficient tool for determining the seriousness of the threat posed by suspected terrorists or spies and their associates — including the ability to cull unwitting acquaintances from complicit and dangerous co-conspirators.

2. The Post insinuates that the FBI uses NSLs to seek library patrons' check-out records and monitor visits to disfavored websites. But the statutes authorizing NSLs do not authorize the FBI to request information on "the books [library patrons] borrow" or to monitor traffic on websites, and the FBI complies with those statutes.

Claims: "[T]he vendors of the software he operates said their databases can reveal . . . the books they borrow. [The purported NSL recipient] refused to hand over those records . . . ."; "If the government monitors the Web sites that people visit and the books that they read, people will stop visiting disfavored Web sites and stop reading disfavored books."

Fact: The FBI by law cannot, and in practice does not, request that an NSL recipient disclose e-mail contents or library checkout records. The NSL statutes strictly limit what information may be requested, and from whom. The NSL in the Connecticut case was issued under 18 U.S.C. § 2709, which does not authorize requests for book borrowing records. Indeed, despite the Post's insinuation, the Post's own description of the NSL at issue in the Connecticut case (the accuracy of which can only be discussed in a classified setting) does not suggest that the FBI sought check-out records. Justice Ginsburg's opinion denying emergency relief in that case confirms this, characterizing the NSL as requesting "'subscriber information, billing information[,] and access logs'" — not book check-out records. Doe v. Gonzales, 546 U.S. ___, No. 05A295 (Oct. 7, 2005) (Ginsburg, J., in chambers). As for websites, tracking visits to websites cannot be done under an NSL.

3. The Post implies that NSLs are left entirely to the FBI's discretion. In doing so, the Post ignores robust mechanisms for checking misuse.

Claim: "They [NSLs] receive no review after the fact by the Justice Department or Congress."

Fact: FBI NSL usage is subject to Justice Department and Congressional oversight. First, no NSL may be issued except in an authorized national security investigation, and no national security investigation may be authorized without notice to the Justice Department's Office of Intelligence Policy and Review and its Criminal Division. Second, should there be an allegation of wrongdoing involving an NSL, the Justice Department's Inspector General is empowered to investigate, and any misuse must be reported to the Intelligence Oversight Board. Third, all but one of the statutes authorizing use of NSLs require the FBI to "fully inform" Congress regarding the FBI's use of NSLs.

4. The Post fundamentally mischaracterizes a recent Executive Order to claim that it requires the FBI to share private records of innocent Americans with entities outside the federal government.

Claim: "Late last month, President Bush signed Executive Order 13388, expanding access to those files for 'state, local and tribal' governments and for 'appropriate private sector entities,' which are not defined."

Fact: Executive Order 13388 does not give state, local, tribal, or private entities access to information gleaned from NSLs. The Executive Order's reference to those entities directs that they be included in a federal project to bolster the "interchange of terrorism information" insofar as it is consistent with "the freedom, information privacy, and other legal rights of Americans." E.O. 13388 § 1. This policy directive implements section 1016 of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, which requires the sharing of terrorism information with "all appropriate Federal, State, local, and tribal entities, and the private sector." The information-sharing project includes policies and procedures to determine who is an appropriate recipient of what information, and to safeguard privacy and civil liberties. For instance, including private sector entities in the "interchange of terrorism information" will allow terror threat information to be shared, as appropriate, with business and critical infrastructure entities. There is no requirement that those entities be given access to information on innocent Americans.

5. The Post implies that the FBI can use an NSL to compel production of private records without the intervention of a court, and that PATRIOT Act conferees are set to expand that authority. Neither contention has any basis in fact.

Claim: "House and Senate conferees are poised again to amplify the FBI's power to compel the secret surrender of private records."

Fact: The FBI cannot compel compliance with an NSL without seeking judicial intervention. An NSL is not a court order or a grand jury subpoena; it is a request for records. In the event a recipient objects to the request, production can only be "compelled" by a court. Neither the House nor the Senate reauthorization bill contains language that would "amplify" existing NSL authorities. The changes supported by the Administration will create significant additional oversight and explicit procedures for judicial review — facts literally ignored by the Post.

6. The Post implies that Congressional oversight of NSLs is inadequate and that, in any event, the Justice Department has failed to report how many NSLs it uses. To the contrary, the Justice Department provides Congress information on NSL usage in a number of forms, including reporting, briefings, and testimony.

Claim: "The Justice Department has offered Congress no concrete information, even in classified form, save for a partial count of the number of letters delivered."; "As national security letters have grown in number and importance, oversight has not kept up."

Fact: The Department of Justice has complied with thorough Congressional oversight of NSL use. In addition to providing to Congress all information required by the numerous statutory reporting requirements regarding NSLs, the Department has participated in multiple hearings that addressed NSL authorities, responded to numerous written congressional queries, and conducted several classified briefings. It is simply false to suggest that the Justice Department has offered Congress "no concrete information" on NSL usage or that Congress has ignored its oversight responsibilities. Moreover, the article's denigration of the oversight the Congress can provide based on numbers of NSLs issued is unwarranted. The Department reports both the total number of NSLs issued and, most important, the number of different U.S. persons whose records the FBI has requested through NSLs. Those statistics permit Congress to see if there have been significant increases in the use of NSL authority. By way of example, if the Post is correct that NSLs were used during the Las Vegas investigation (a point we can neither confirm nor deny in an unclassified setting), our reports to Congress would include a huge number of U.S. persons, which would undoubtedly attract Congressional attention.

7. The Post draws misleading and erroneous distinctions between NSLs and their criminal investigative counterpart, grand jury subpoenas.

Claim: "Grand juries tend to have a narrower focus because they investigate past conduct, not the speculative threat of unknown future attacks. Recipients of grand jury subpoenas are generally free to discuss the subpoenas publicly."

Fact: The distinctions the Post is attempting to draw between grand jury subpoenas and NSLs appear to be based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the grand jury process. First, a grand jury subpoena certainly could be used to investigate "the speculative threat of unknown future attacks": grand juries are fully empowered to investigate ongoing conspiracies. Second, while grand jury subpoenas are available to investigate a wide range of criminal activities, NSLs are available only in authorized national security investigations, in which confidentiality is often a paramount concern. Finally, courts have repeatedly recognized that individuals do not have a First Amendment right to disclose information learned only by virtue of participation in an investigation, particularly where the national security is implicated.

8. The Post incorrectly implies that then-Attorney General Ashcroft empowered the FBI to investigate terrorism without regard to Americans' civil rights and civil liberties.

Claim: "He gave overriding priority to preventing attacks by any means available."

Fact: The FBI must and does conduct its investigations within the bounds of our Constitution, statutes, strict internal guidelines, and Executive Orders. Attorney General Ashcroft did not authorize, and could not have authorized, the FBI to disregard those constraints. It is simply false to suggest that there are no legal restrictions on the FBI's investigations, even of terrorism.

9. The Post asserts that because subjects are not notified of the issuance of an NSL, no one can challenge that issuance. This contention is wrong, given the availability of various oversight mechanisms and judicial review.

Claim: "Because recipients are permanently barred from disclosing the letters, outsiders can make no assessment of their relevance . . . ."

Fact: Recipients can challenge NSLs in court. Moreover, they can notify the Justice Department's Inspector General about perceived abuses. And NSL usage is subject to extensive Congressional oversight. Any recipient can challenge the NSL it receives, and the courts and the Justice Department's Inspector General are all available to address those challenges. The Department takes the position that the nondisclosure requirement does not bar all disclosure but rather allows disclosure to an attorney. Moreover, NSLs are not self-enforcing; the FBI cannot compel compliance absent a federal court order. Finally, Congress conducts rigorous oversight over NSL usage. In short, the idea that there is no outside oversight of the FBI's NSL usage is simply wrong.

10. The Post erroneously implies that the permanent nondisclosure requirements do not serve a legitimate national security purpose.

Claim: "[N]ational security seldom requires that the secret be kept forever."

Fact: Protecting the secrecy and integrity of national security investigations, techniques, and methods is critical to our ability to protect Americans from terrorist attacks and espionage. The nondisclosure requirement serves two ends in national security investigations: (1) it prevents the target of an investigation from being tipped off; and (2) it ensures that we are not revealing too much information about our investigative capabilities and techniques to our enemies. It is the second reason in particular that the Post essentially ignores. There are many parties around the world who employ sophisticated techniques for gauging our intelligence and counterterrorism capabilities. Courts have repeatedly recognized the danger of publicly revealing information that in isolation appears harmless but when combined with other information provides our enemies insights into our capabilities and techniques. The nondisclosure requirement ensures that it is the FBI or the Justice Department that makes the determination whether information can be disclosed without harm to the national security or ongoing investigations. That decision is not one properly given to the recipient of an NSL, who will almost never be in a position to make that determination accurately.

11. The Post implies that the standard governing NSL use is toothless, ignoring the robust, binding legal guidance that informs that standard.

Claim: "To establish the 'relevance' of the information they seek, agents face a test so basic it is hard to come up with a plausible way to fail."

Fact: By law, NSLs are limited to requests for information relevant to international terrorism and espionage investigations, and the FBI does not use them except in those authorized circumstances. NSLs are not available to investigate ordinary criminal activity or even domestic terrorism. Moreover, the term "relevance" is one that has been employed in the law for generations — in fact, it is the standard for the issuance of a grand jury subpoena. It is simply false to suggest that "relevance" is an undefined or limitless concept.

12. The Post peddles the notion that the existence of the authority to use NSLs is itself an "abuse," regardless of how lawfully they are used. But the lawful use of a Congressionally authorized investigative tool is not an abuse.

Claim: "What the Bush administration means by abuse is unauthorized use of surveillance data — for example, to blackmail an enemy or track an estranged spouse. Critics are focused elsewhere . . . 'the abuse is in the power itself.'"

Fact: The Department of Justice takes seriously the limits on its authorities and fully understands that unlawful use of an authority is an abuse. But lawful use is by definition not abuse. Contrary to the Post's assertion, we do not limit our understanding of abuse to the egregious, such as blackmail or stalking. On the other hand, we do not agree — and neither should Members of Congress — that lawful and prudent use in appropriate circumstances of a duly authorized investigative authority itself constitutes "abuse."

13. The Post implies that the nondisclosure requirement attaching to an NSL would prohibit the recipient from consulting an attorney, in spite of the Department's repeatedly stated position that the nondisclosure requirement does not prevent a recipient from seeking counsel.

Claim: "He wanted to fight the FBI but feared calling a lawyer because the letter said he could not disclose its existence to 'any person.'"

Fact: The NSL statute at issue in the Connecticut case allows disclosure of receipt to an "agent," which would include an attorney. In practice, and in litigation, the Justice Department has repeatedly maintained that the nondisclosure requirement allows disclosure to an attorney. Moreover, the recipient did consult an attorney and did challenge the NSL, as evidenced by the Post's own discussion of the lawsuit. The Post further ignores that the Department has expressed public support for legislation making explicit that a recipient may consult an attorney.

14. The Post claims that the Department of Justice has hidden from the courts the facts underlying the Connecticut NSL case. This claim is simply baseless.

Claim: "The central facts remain opaque, even to the judges, because the FBI is not obliged to describe what it is looking for, or why."

Fact: The Department of Justice has fully complied with the courts' requests for the facts underlying the Connecticut case. A comprehensive explanation was filed under seal; although the explanation is not publicly available, the judges have been fully informed. It is simply false to state that the FBI has withheld from the courts information on what the FBI is looking for and why. Moreover, with knowledge of the reason for the FBI's request, the District Court has not determined that the FBI's request is unreasonable or unwarranted; rather, the court only ruled that the law requires the availability of a challenge and prohibits a permanent nondisclosure provision. Neither of these rulings casts any doubt on the underlying validity of the FBI's request.

15. The Post incorrectly implies that a claim that businesses face dire consequences for noncompliance with government requests was directed to NSL requests.

Claim: The Post attributes to one expert the position that failure to comply with an NSL could mean that "a business could face criminal prosecution, 'a "death sentence" for certain kinds of companies.'"

Fact: The Post failed to provide a single instance of the government prosecuting a business for failing to comply with a national security investigation. This is unsurprising, as the government has never prosecuted any individual or company for failing to comply with an NSL. The Justice Department is not looking to impose the economic "death sentence" on businesses that fail to comply with NSLs, and the Post's suggestion to the contrary is irresponsible. The statements on which the Post bases its claim are taken out of context and did not, when made, refer to compliance with NSLs.

16. The Post incorrectly asserts that businesses have complained about the burden imposed by NSL requests.

Claim: "National security letters, [major business groups] wrote, have begun to impose an 'expensive and time-consuming burden' on business."

Fact: The letter to which the Post refers did not single out NSLs as burdensome but instead indicated in general that "document requests from the government" can pose an "expensive and time-consuming burden." There exist a variety of investigative tools with which the government can request documents from businesses, including the familiar grand jury subpoena. Many of these tools can impose substantial compliance burdens on businesses. But the Post's misrepresentation that businesses groups singled out NSLs as expensive or time-consuming is simply false. Indeed, in the Justice Department's experience, NSLs are much less "expensive and time-consuming" for recipients than some other investigative tools, and nothing in the business groups' letter contradicts that understanding.

17. The Post also erroneously insinuates that there is no internal oversight of NSL usage.

Claim: "In the executive branch, no FBI or Justice Department official audits the use of national security letters to assess whether they are appropriately targeted, lawfully applied or contribute important facts to an investigation."

Fact: The use of NSLs, like the use of any authority, is subject to significant internal oversight and checks. As an initial matter, an NSL must be approved by a field office's Special Agent in Charge (SAC) or one of a handful of senior FBI headquarters officials — all members of the Senior Executive Service, totaling fewer than 100 nationally. Before an NSL request even gets to the desk of an SAC, it will go through at least two levels of oversight, including legal compliance. After the fact, any misuse of an NSL is subject to significant oversight as part of the FBI's reports to the Intelligence Oversight Board. Finally, the Department of Justice Inspector General is empowered to investigate any allegations of abuse.

In addition to these corrections, we have provided classified briefings to your staffs, as well as to certain Members who requested them, regarding the following erroneous claims:

- "The FBI now issues more than 30,000 national security letters a year, . . . a hundredfold increase over historic norms."

- "The Bush administration . . . has offered no example in which the use of a national security letter helped disrupt a terrorist plot."

- "In late 2003, the Bush administration reversed a long-standing policy requiring agents to destroy their files on innocent American citizens, companies and residents when investigations closed."

- "Criticized for failure to detect the Sept. 11 plot, the bureau now casts a much wider net, using national security letters to generate leads as well as to pursue them."

- "Agents commonly use the letters now in 'preliminary investigations' and in the 'threat assessments' that precede a decision whether to launch an investigation."

- "Ashcroft remained bound by Executive Order 12333, which requires the use of the 'least intrusive means' in domestic intelligence investigations. But his new interpretation came close to upending the mandate."

- "Two years ago, Ashcroft rescinded a 1995 guideline directing that information obtained through a national security letter about a U.S. citizen or resident 'shall be destroyed by the FBI and not further disseminated' if it proves 'not relevant to the purposes for which it was collected.' Ashcroft's new order was that 'the FBI shall retain' all records it collects and 'may disseminate' them freely among federal agencies."

- "[T]he FBI had served national security letters on [Las Vegas casinos]. In an interview for this article, one former casino executive confirmed the use of a national security letter."

The Department of Justice is committed to protecting civil liberties and to using all investigative tools judiciously and within the bounds of the law. This includes NSLs, which are one of the important tools Congress provided the Department to help us secure our nation. We urge the Congress not to let a distorted and misleading portrayal of the FBI's use of this vital investigative tool skew the debate over how best to ensure our national security.

If we can be of further assistance, please do not hesitate to contact this office.

Sincerely,

William E. Moschella
Assistant Attorney General

cc: The Honorable Patrick J. Leahy
Ranking Minority Member

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 10:48 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/12/06 Civil Division News

Domestic Spying Program Comes Under Legal Scrutiny; A federal judge will hear the ACLU's arguments today against the National Security Agency's warrantless anti-terror surveillance

Battle over wiretaps to begin today; Suit asks Detroit judge to stop U.S

Judge gives ACLU phone suit go-ahead

U.S. Court Backs Government Broadband Wiretap Access; The court concluded that the FCC requirement is a "reasonable policy choice," even though information services are exempted from the government's wiretapping authority

Envoy under tobacco cloud

Appeals court blocks critical trust fund reports

The Debate Over Plan B

Union City private school settles meal fraud case

Piedmont Hospital to pay $3 million to settle whistleblower lawsuit

Lincare Holdings Agrees to Settle Whistleblower Suit

Brockovich has new target; Activist of film fame is suing health firms

Is the 9th Circuit Bound by Its Earlier Pledge Ruling?

Los Angeles Times

June 12, 2006

Domestic Spying Program Comes Under Legal Scrutiny; A federal judge will hear the ACLU's arguments today against the National Security Agency's warrantless anti-terror surveillance

By Henry Weinstein

Times Staff Writer

The National Security Agency's controversial domestic surveillance program faces its first major court test today before a veteran federal judge in Detroit.

In January, groups including the American Civil Liberties Union and the Michigan branch of the Council on American-Islamic Relations as well as several individuals, who said they feared the government was spying on them, filed a 60-page lawsuit seeking to have the warrantless wiretapping program declared unconstitutional. Among the individuals is James Bamford, author of two books on the NSA.

Under the program, launched after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the NSA listens in on phone calls and obtains e-mails into and out of the U.S. involving suspected terrorist affiliates. The program bypasses the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which was created after government spying scandals in the 1970s to approve warrants in some intelligence- and terrorism-related investigations.

The suit in Detroit, like one filed in New York by the Center for Constitutional Rights, asserts that the NSA's eavesdropping program has violated free-speech and privacy rights and has had a chilling effect on the communications of potential surveillance targets.

None of the plaintiffs have offered proof they were spied on. Rather, they maintain that the simple existence of the program has impeded their ability to perform their jobs as journalists and lawyers.

"The program is causing concrete and specific injury to plaintiffs and others," the ACLU said in a motion in March, asking U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor to declare the program illegal and to order its immediate halt.

A brief by Ann Beeson and other ACLU attorneys said the program was disrupting plaintiffs' ability "to talk with sources, locate witnesses, conduct scholarship, engage in advocacy and engage in other activity protected by the 1st Amendment."

The ACLU attorneys contend that because President Bush and several Cabinet members, including Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, have publicly acknowledged the existence of the program, Taylor has sufficient evidence to rule on the legality of the program without further fact-finding.

The Justice Department sharply disagrees and seeks dismissal of the cases in Detroit and New York on the grounds that they violate the "state secrets" doctrine.

First recognized by the Supreme Court 53 years ago in U.S. vs. Reynolds, the "state secrets" privilege bars disclosure of information in court proceedings when "there is a reasonable danger that compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged."

The privilege has been used most often by officials in the executive branch of government, said William G. Weaver, an attorney and a political science professor at the University of Texas, El Paso, who has co-written a scholarly article on the subject.

"It is the most powerful privilege available to the president," Weaver said. "If it is properly invoked, it wins every single time."

Before the Sept. 11 attacks, Weaver said, government lawyers generally used the privilege at the instigation of mid-level officials who did not want a program's operational details revealed.

In recent years, though, it has become "a top-down enterprise," he said. "The privilege has been transformed into a political device to protect the president from embarrassment."

On May 26, Justice Department attorneys, led by Andrew H. Tannenbaum, filed a motion urging Taylor to not even consider the plaintiffs' motion.

The government lawyers maintain in court papers that the NSA program is "essential to meeting a continuing and grave foreign terrorist threat" and is "well within lawful bounds," that the plaintiffs had no standing to bring the case because they had not demonstrated any injury from the NSA program.

On May 31, Taylor rebuffed the government's contention that she had to consider the "state secrets" issue before considering anything else. She said she would consider the ACLU's motion today, and scheduled a July 10 hearing on the government's motion.

Justice Department lawyers filed a new motion June 2 asking the judge to clarify her order and to once again consider their arguments on standing and "state secrets" before considering any other issue. Taylor is expected to respond at today's hearing.

If the plaintiffs overcome the government's argument, it will be highly unusual. Justice Department attorneys almost always prevail when they invoke the "state secrets" privilege, even when judges acknowledge a plaintiff raises serious issues.

Last month, U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria, Va., dismissed a lawsuit filed by a German citizen who alleged he was kidnapped and beaten by the CIA.

Khaled El-Masri sued former CIA Director George J. Tenet, other officials and three private companies. The suit alleged that Tenet violated U.S. and international human rights laws by permitting agents to kidnap El-Masri in Macedonia in 2003, beat him, drug him and transport him to a secret CIA prison in Afghanistan.

Five months later, according to the suit, El-Masri was released at night in Albania without being charged with a crime.

Ellis said that "if El-Masri's allegations are true or essentially true, then all fair-minded people, including those who believe that state secrets must be protected … must also agree that El-Masri has suffered injuries as a result of our country's mistake and deserves a remedy."

Nonetheless, Ellis sided with government attorneys, saying that if the case went forward it "would present a grave risk of injury to national security."

"El-Masri's private interests must give way to the national interest," he ruled.

"In times of war," he said, "our country, chiefly through the executive branch, must often take exceptional steps to thwart the enemy."

END

Detroit Free Press

June 12, 2006

Battle over wiretaps to begin today; Suit asks Detroit judge to stop U.S.

BY DAVID ASHENFELTER
FREE PRESS STAFF WRITER

The opening salvo of what is sure to be a closely watched and potentially landmark case over whether the U.S. government has the right to eavesdrop on thousands -- and potentially millions -- of telephone and e-mail communications will be fired in federal court in Detroit today.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which filed the lawsuit in January, will ask U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor to abolish the Bush administration's program of intercepting international phone calls in its fight against terrorism, saying it violates Americans' free speech and privacy rights.

The Justice Department, which represents the National Security Agency, is expected to argue that the program is legal and a key weapon in the administration's war on terror.

Although neither side expects Taylor to rule today, courtroom observers said she might reveal hints on how she will decide the case.

"Perhaps no other government action poses more of a threat to our democracy than spying on Americans' telephone calls without first obtaining a court order," Michigan ACLU lawyer Michael Steinberg said Friday. He will be on hand when national ACLU lawyer Ann Beeson argues the case.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said that he will force the executives of telephone companies that have given their customers' phone records to the government to testify about the eavesdropping program if the Bush administration doesn't fully cooperate with drafting new rules on what's allowed.

"If we don't get some results, I'm prepared to go back to demand hearings and issue subpoenas if necessary," Specter said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition."

Specter said he was more hopeful, after talking Thursday with Vice President Dick Cheney, that committee hearings and subpoenas can be avoided.

Specter had threatened to subpoena executives of major phone companies to get them to testify about their cooperation with the NSA.

But one company lawyer has told Specter the executives wouldn't be able to testify about any classified information.

Cheney indicated he was willing to work with Congress on new rules governing eavesdropping, but he stopped short of promising any action and said a final decision on the bill would be up to President George W. Bush.

Meanwhile, U.S. Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said department lawyers will attend today's hearing in Detroit, but it's unclear what they might say.

He said they expect Judge Taylor to review secret documents they filed recently to persuade Taylor to allow the program to proceed.

The ACLU sued the NSA on Jan. 17 on behalf of itself and a group of journalists, scholars, lawyers and national nonprofit groups whose members often communicate with people in the Middle East and Asia by telephone and e-mail.

The ACLU alleges that the program has had a chilling effect on plaintiffs' ability to confer with sources, conduct research and engage in other activities.

The Center for Constitutional Rights in New York filed a similar suit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan the same day the ACLU filed in Detroit. No hearings have been scheduled in that suit.

The New York Times disclosed the program in December, triggering protests from civil liberties groups, as well as opposition from liberals and conservatives.

The newspaper reported that the NSA had eavesdropped on international telephone and e-mail conversations involving suspected terrorists without obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, a secret court in Washington, D.C.

The ACLU charges that the NSA has been sifting through millions of calls and e-mails of ordinary Americans without any probable cause.

On May 11, USA Today reported AT&T, Verizon and BellSouth had disclosed phone records to the NSA without customer or court approval to aid the administration's war on terror.

Bush, who authorized the program after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, has insisted that the program is legal and vital to national interests.

He says Congress authorized the program after the terrorist attacks when it passed a resolution granting him the power to fight terrorism.

Administration officials have said the program targets people they suspect of having contact with members of Al Qaeda, not ordinary Americans.

The plaintiffs have offered no proof that they were spied upon, but said the government probably had listened in on confidential conversations between lawyers and clients, and researchers and reporters, or researchers and their information sources.

In March, the ACLU asked Taylor to summarily rule in the ACLU's favor on the grounds that the program violates federal law.

Although the government never filed a formal answer to the ACLU complaint, it asked Taylor in late May to dismiss the ACLU suit, invoking a military and state secrets privilege. It says the ACLU can't proceed unless the government divulges information that would compromise national security.

The government also filed secret information in hopes of persuading Taylor to side with the government.

Taylor denied the Justice Department's request to postpone a decision on the ACLU's motion to summarily rule against the government.

Even though the government hasn't filed a formal answer to the complaint, she said it could attend today's hearing and argue its case.

Taylor has allowed several individuals and groups -- including the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, the Asian American Legal Defense and members of Congress -- to file briefs on the case.

Taylor, 74, a senior judge who handles half the caseload of a regular judge, was appointed in 1979 by President Jimmy Carter.

Lawyers described her as smart, fair and liberal.

As a black woman who lived through the civil rights struggles of the 1960s, they said she likely will be skeptical of government assurances that the program operates within the law.

END

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

June 11, 2006

Judge gives ACLU phone suit go-ahead

A federal judge on Friday declined to stay the proceedings in a lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union against AT&T that challenges the company's release of phone records to the federal government.

Author Studs Terkel is among the well-known local residents who have agreed to serve as plaintiffs in the case, which alleges AT&T released customer information to the National Security Agency without a warrant and seeks to block those disclosures. AT&T had sought a stay pending decisions to transfer similar cases around the country to one federal district court.

U.S. District Judge Matthew Kennelly noted that the harm the plaintiffs claim is serious if proven to be true.

"The Terkel plaintiffs contend that information in which they have a significant statutory privacy interest has been and is still being disclosed," Kennelly wrote in his decision. The judge gave AT&T until later this month to file a response.

END

Reuters

June 10, 2006

U.S. Court Backs Government Broadband Wiretap Access; The court concluded that the FCC requirement is a "reasonable policy choice," even though information services are exempted from the government's wiretapping authority.

WASHINGTON - A U.S. appeals court Friday upheld the government's authority to force high-speed Internet service providers to give law enforcement authorities access for surveillance purposes.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit rejected a petition aimed at overturning a decision by regulators requiring facilities-based broadband providers and those that offer Internet telephone service to comply with U.S. wiretap laws.

The court concluded that the FCC requirement was a "reasonable policy choice" even though information services are exempted from the government's wiretapping authority.

The FCC has set a May 14, 2007 deadline for compliance.

"I am pleased that the Court agreed with the Commission's finding, which will ensure that law enforcement agencies' ability to conduct lawful court-ordered electronic surveillance will keep pace with new communication technologies," FCC chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement after the ruling.

The ruling comes at a time when critics have voiced concerned that the Bush administration's surveillance program violates civil liberties. The administration argues it needs the program, which allows the National Security Agency to monitor international telephone calls of U.S. citizens, as part of its broader war on terrorism.

Authorities are concerned the growth of Internet communications could allow criminals to circumvent wiretaps by using e-mail and Internet phone services instead of traditional telephone services.

Private networks would not be subject to the wiretap requirements, but those connected with a public network would have to comply with the law.

The FCC decision has prompted an appeal by universities and libraries. The groups, including the American Library Association and Association of American Universities, challenged the agency's authority to extend such requirements to high-speed Internet services.

The FCC has long considered broadband Internet in the category of an "information service."

But in an opinion written by Judge David Sentelle, the appeals court said the same words could be defined differently by the FCC in applying the wiretapping laws.

In a dissenting opinion, one of the judges, Harry Edwards, called the argument "convoluted."

"The agency has simply abandoned the well-understood meaning of 'information services' without offering any coherent alternative interpretation in its place," Edwards wrote.

END

The Age

June 11, 2006

Envoy under tobacco cloud

William Birnbauer

THE man President George Bush wants as the next US ambassador to Australia took "aggressive actions" to destroy a multibillion-dollar fraud case against tobacco companies, according to the US Government's top prosecutor in the case.

Robert McCallum, the US Associate Attorney-General, was said to have undermined the case once it became apparent that prosecutors could win.

The claims were made by Sharon Eubanks, who led the US Justice Department's nine-month prosecution against the tobacco firms. Last week an internal Justice Department inquiry found no wrongdoing by Mr McCallum, clearing the way for him to become the US ambassador in Canberra.

Controversy has dogged Mr McCallum over his role in slashing the penalty the Justice Department sought to impose on tobacco companies from $US130 billion ($A174 billion) to $US10 billion. He was also accused of pressuring three witnesses to tone down their testimony in relation to the penalty.

In an exclusive interview, Ms Eubanks said: "Robert McCallum definitely was not supportive of the trial team's efforts ? He took aggressive actions to destroy our efforts when it became clear that we had firm legal bases for seeking much more meaningful remedies from the court.

"I should be clear about this: Robert McCallum directed the position taken on remedies sought by the United States. It did not matter to him what the evidence actually demonstrated and supported, rather, it was only the bottom line that mattered to him ? the lower the better."

Ms Eubanks, who has not spoken publicly about Mr McCallum's role previously, made her comments to The Sunday Age and a TV documentary team consisting of Melbourne filmmaker Terry Carlyon and this journalist. A second former Justice Department lawyer, Brett Spiegel, backed Ms Eubank's version of events.

Mr McCallum was appointed to a senior Justice Department post by Mr Bush and had oversight of the tobacco case.

Mr Spiegel said the department's political appointees had undermined the trial team.

"We were working under an administration whose inaugural ball was paid for by (tobacco company) Philip Morris. You're getting some mixed signals when you have that situation."

The comments are set to increase scrutiny and criticism of Mr McCallum in the US and Australia, despite his being cleared by the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility. The office found that he did not "engage in professional misconduct or exercise poor judgement".

The US ambassador's position has been vacant for about 18 months following the departure of Tom Schieffer.

Mr McCallum, nominated as ambassador by his friend Mr Bush in March, faces questioning about his role in the fraud trial. Last week, a US District Court judge ordered him to answer questions about the penalty reduction. His nomination also must go through the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee and the full Senate.

Ms Eubanks resigned from the department late last year after 22 years of service. At the end of the case, Mr McCallum thanked her for her "tireless efforts". He denied political interference in the case, saying the remedy sought by the Government was downgraded on legal grounds. Before his Justice Department appointment, he was a lawyer at an Atlanta law firm that worked for a tobacco company.

The US Government's case against tobacco giants including Philip Morris, British American Tobacco and RJ Reynolds wrapped up last June. Judge Gladys Kessler is yet to rule on it. During the trial, a senior lawyer for Philip Morris said the penalty reduction proved the Government's case was a "house of cards".

Judge Kessler responded that the downgrade could suggest there were "some additional influences being brought to bear on what was the Government's case".

The Justice Department case, filed in 1999 when Bill Clinton was president, initially sought forfeiture of $US280 billion of profits from tobacco companies to recover the costs of treating smoking-related disease. It was one of the biggest civil suits filed in the US.

Cigarette makers successfully appealed against the health-cost recovery claim but the Justice Department proceeded with a racketeering fraud case, alleging a 50-year conspiracy by the companies to deceive the public about the risks of smoking.

END

Indianz.Com.

Monday, June 12, 2006

Appeals court blocks critical trust fund reports

Three reports that criticized the Bush administration's trust reform efforts were suppressed by a federal appeals court on Friday.

The reports were produced by the special master in the Cobell trust fund case. One detailed how negative information about an accounting system was removed from a court-ordered report while the other two questioned whether the Interior Department was meeting its obligation to preserve trust records.

But in a unanimous decision, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals threw out the reports as "tainted." A three-judge panel said the special master -- who resigned under pressure from the administration -- erred by hiring an individual whose private-sector company was in a contract dispute over the Trust Asset and Accounting Management System (TAAMS).

The individual, an employee of a Native-owned firm called Native American Industrial Distributors, "stood to gain financially from a finding of misconduct" regarding the TAAMS contract, the court said, so he shouldn't have been involved with the Cobell case.

Any reports prepared after the hiring of the individual must be suppressed as well, whether or not they were related to TAAMS, the D.C. Circuit panel added. "If those reports have not been used against the [Interior] department and are not presently part of the record before the district court, then so much the better," wrote Judge Donald H. Ginsburg for the majority.

The decision is the first to bear new Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne's name. The former governor of Idaho took office earlier this month with an interest in settling the nine-year-old case, according to tribal leaders who met with him in private.

But Cobell v. Kempthorne, as the lawsuit is now known, is far from over. The D.C. Circuit is still weighing a decision on three more matters that the administration considers central to its trust reform initiatives.

The first is a preliminary injunction that requires the disconnection of trust fund systems from the Internet; the second is a notice the government is required to send to all Indian beneficiaries that warns them of "unreliable" trust data; and the third is an unprecedented motion to remove Judge Royce Lamberth from the case by assigning it to another judge.

Oral arguments were held in April. It isn't known when a decision might be issued but Interior officials are hoping for a victory in a case that has seen the department painted as the "morally and culturally oblivious hand-me-down of a disgracefully racist and imperialist government that should have been buried a century ago," in the words of Lamberth.

The three reports that are now suppressed added more fire to the government's failure to account for billions in money owed to hundreds of thousands of individual Indians across the country. Even though Lamberth had never adopted them into the record, the appeals court judges said they needed to be removed out of concern for the "public's confidence in the judicial process."

Although the TAAMS report can't be cited as evidence in the case, many in Indian Country view the $40 million system as a waste of resources that could have been better used for other purposes. Tex Hall, an Indian account holder who serves as chairman of the Mandan, Hidatsa and Arikara Nation in North Dakota, said the trust fund remains broken despite the Bush administration's claims that progress is being made.

"You will receive a check and not know what it's for," he said at a forum in Washington, D.C., in April. "The system needs to be fixed. It is a broken system."

The other two reports -- in the form of site visits to Interior locations -- detailed poor record-keeping that is no stranger to Indian Country. The Clinton administration was held in contempt for destroying 162 boxes of trust fund records despite court orders against doing so.

In related Cobell news, Keith Harper, one of the attorneys on the case, is leaving the Native American Rights Fund next month. He will be joining the law firm of Kilpatrick Stockton, the firm where the other members of the litigation team are based.

Harper, a member of the Cherokee Nation, will continue to work on Cobell but he also plans to pursue other cases on behalf of tribes and individual Indians. He spent more than 10 years at NARF, a non-profit organization founded in 1970.

John Echohawk, the executive director of NARF, remains as co-counsel in the case. He will continue to serve as a chief lobbyist on legislation to settle Cobell. A bill is pending before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and the House Resources Committee.

END

60 Minutes

June 11, 2006

The Debate Over Plan B

Did the Bush White House pressure the Food and Drug Administration to block the "Morning After Pill," known as Plan B, from being sold over-the-counter at your local drug store? That question is the focus of a hearing in federal court on June 13, where birth control advocates have sued the FDA to make the drug available without a prescription.

Millions of women have used Plan B as an emergency contraceptive to prevent a pregnancy in situations like a condom break or a rape. Right now, it's only available by prescription, but because it must be taken within 72 hours, the drug's manufacturer asked FDA for permission to sell Plan B over-the-counter.

That was three years ago. And, even though the drug is considered totally safe, the FDA has repeatedly postponed a decision, including taking no action since 60 Minutes aired this story in the Fall of 2005.

Plan B's problems began when it was targeted by anti-abortion-rights groups and became part of a wider debate over whether religious beliefs are encroaching on scientific decision-making.

Correspondent Lesley Stahl reports.

Until last August, Dr. Susan Wood headed the FDA's Office of Women's Health and was one of the scientists inside the agency arguing that Plan B should be available without a prescription. "If it's safe, and it is, and effective, it's more effective the quicker you have it. This is why it needs to be over-the-counter," she says.

"If you need it on Saturday morning, Monday morning is too late. Getting to a physician to get a prescription, getting that prescription to a pharmacy and getting it filled takes time, as we all know. Then what are you going to do?" says Wood.

That's a question a woman named Evelyn faced in 2004, when she was raped at a New York nightclub.

Evelyn, 22 at the time, was rushed to St. Vincent's hospital, the nearest emergency room.

She says the hospital did not offer her an emergency contraceptive.

"It was something that they were supposed to offer," says Evelyn's mother, Sandi. "In the situation as my daughter's, as Evelyn's situation, they were supposed to offer, you know, and let the person make the decision as to whether or not they wanted it. I didn't know that it was optional."

Sandi says she knew about a New York law that says all hospitals must offer rape victims emergency contraception like Plan B.

Sandi called the nurse who had treated Evelyn at St. Vincent's. "I said, 'Why did you not give it to her?' And she very rudely said to me, 'Well, we're a Catholic hospital. We don't do birth control.' At which point, I told them what they could do with being a Catholic hospital and their views on birth control — I'd rather not say that on the air," she recalls. "I was absolutely livid."

Because of Evelyn's case, St. Vincent's is under investigation by the state of New York. The hospital told 60 Minutes it is now complying with the law.

Evelyn finally got a prescription for Plan B, and took it 10 hours after the rape. Had she not gotten Plan B and had gotten pregnant, Evelyn says she would have had an abortion. "I'm glad that that didn't have to happen, I never had to experience that," she says.

The Catholic Church opposes Plan B not just because it's birth control, but because it considers use of Plan B to be, in Cardinal Egan of New York's words, "a chemical abortion."

But Wood says this is not an abortion pill. "There is an abortion pill called RU-486, and this is not it," she says. "An abortion pill interrupts an established pregnancy. This product is contraception. It does not interrupt an established pregnancy."

She says even if you took it and were already pregnant, it would not end the pregnancy. "The only connection this product has with abortion is that it can prevent them by preventing an unintended pregnancy," says Wood.

There is some debate about that interpretation. Most of the time, Plan B works by stopping ovulation so that a pregnancy cannot occur. In a small percentage of cases, when a woman is ovulating on the day she has unprotected sex, a fertilized egg could form. In that case, Plan B might prevent the egg from implanting in her uterus.

While most doctors do not consider that an abortion, anti-abortion-rights doctors do, such as David Hager, a gynecologist from Lexington, Ky., who won't prescribe Plan B for his own patients.

"One of the mechanisms of action can be to inhibit implantation, which means that it may act as an abortifacient," says Dr. Hager. He says abortifacient means it causes an abortion and that this medication may act to inhibit implantation.

In 2002, Dr. Hager got a call from the Bush White House asking him to serve on the FDA advisory committee charged with reviewing Plan B's over-the-counter application along with two other anti-abortion-rights physicians. But when Hager argued against Plan B at committee meetings, he didn't talk about abortion.

"I was concerned about 10, 11, 12-year-old girls buying this product," says Hager.

He raised moral questions. "I'm not in favor of promotion of a product that would increase sexual activity among teenagers," he says.

Hager speculated about an increase in sexually-transmitted diseases. "I'm saying that it is possible that with the use of Plan B the individual may put herself at greater risk," he says.

But the advisory panel reviewed 40 studies that refuted his objections and showed that Plan B does not lead to more cases of sexually transmitted disease, or more risky sexual behavior.

Even Dr. Hager admits Plan B is totally safe. The FDA says there have been no deaths, no heart attacks, no strokes and no evidence of misuse or abuse.

But he says one of his major concerns is that young women wouldn't go to their doctors if such a drug were readily available.

"If we approve this for over-the-counter sale, then what is that going to do as far as what I call access to medical care for younger adolescent women?" Hager asks.

Wood disputes that view. "Is this cutting the doctor out? Would it cut out their relationship?" she asks. "Well, in fact, I think there's strong argument that the physicians themselves want this product to be over the counter."

Wood says the American Academy of Pediatrics, the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, and the American Medical Association have all endorsed making this product available over the counter. That includes pediatrics, meaning younger girls.

If Plan B is sold over the counter anyone — any age — could buy it easily in a drugstore, like cough syrup or bubble bath. A big part of this issue is whether pharmacies will stock it. What if they refuse to carry Plan B?

In a survey of drugstores in Kentucky, Dr. Hager's home state, the American Civil Liberties Union found that most pharmacies didn't carry Plan B; 83 of them said they would even refuse to order it for women with prescriptions. These include Wal-Mart, which has a nationwide policy against dispensing Plan B.

The American Civil Liberties Union got a prescription for a woman named Fran, and sent her to five pharmacies undercover. 60 Minutes went along with a hidden camera to see what would happen.

Only one pharmacy, Kmart, had Plan B in stock; another drug store offered to order it, but the pharmacist told Fran it would take several days before they could possibly get it.

Remember, it has to be taken within 72 hours.

At another store, Fran was turned down by a pharmacist who explained that she believes it's an abortion pill. "The morning after pill is after you have that fertilized egg, and that is a baby. You are not allowing it to implant. So it is considered abortive," the pharmacist said.

The next day, Fran and 60 Minutes went back to that pharmacy together and found the same pharmacist.

"Anyone can walk in off the street and we can refuse to fill a prescription," the pharmacists said. Asked whether a prescription could be refused on religious grounds, the pharmacists said, "On any grounds. Personal preference. Any reason, we can refuse to fill a prescription."

But the Kentucky state pharmacy board told 60 Minutes that pharmacists must have a professional medical reason, not simply a personal preference, to turn away a prescription for Plan B or anything else.

The pharmacy did offer birth control but the pharmacist did not consider Plan B birth control.

So, with Plan B mired in the abortion debate, the FDA advisory committee took its vote on recommending whether it should be sold over the counter.

Dr. Hager voted “no.” But his colleagues on the committee rejected his arguments, voting 23 to four in favor of offering the drug over the counter.

Such a lop-sided vote should have meant the application would sail through. But then the saga of Plan B took a strange turn.

Dr. Hager says someone at the FDA — he won’t say who — asked him to write a “minority report” in which he asked for more studies and more data on the use of Plan B by young girls.

A few months later something totally unexpected happened: The FDA ignored the committee’s overwhelming vote and rejected the proposal to sell Plan B over the counter, citing the very concerns in Hager’s report.

Some people believe Hager raised these objections because of his religious beliefs, but that’s something he denies. “The religious aspect did not enter into that decision for me,” he says.

But in to a speech he gave to a Christian college, he seemed to admit his role was all about religion. "God has used me to stand in the breach for the cause of the kingdom," Hager said at the time.

He was talking about Plan B.

"But I argued it from a scientific perspective. And God took that information and He used it through this minority report to influence a decision. You don't have to wave your bible to have an effect as a Christian in the public arena," Hager told the audience.

Hager says he did not mean to suggest that God wanted Plan B to fail, and that he was His instrument. "I thought that God used me, He'd used my individual gifts of, whatever, in an individual way to be able to express my opinion."

But with the speech, Hager may have fueled the fire of those who say that all he did was try to cloak religious beliefs in scientific language.

“If the idea in the population of this country is that a person can’t be a person of faith and also be a person of science, I strongly disagree with that,” says Hager.

Should agencies like the FDA be completely divorced from the debates that go on in society?

“Again, the question the agency has to deal with is, is it safe? And is it safe for teens? Yes, it is,” says Wood. “Have we asked that question about other contraceptive methods? Are we going to label, take condoms behind the counter? Make them prescription? I don't think we should.

“I think most Americans would like to leave those decisions as private decisions, and decisions within the family,” says Wood.

Plan B’s manufacturer, Barr Pharmaceuticals, submitted a new application to the FDA with an age cut-off, so that girls 16 and younger would still need a prescription to get the drug. This seemed to address Hager’s objections and those of the anti-abortion rights lobby.

But last August, then-FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford surprised just about everyone when he announced that the agency had postponed a decision on the new application for what could be months or years. He took the unprecedented step of overruling his own scientific staff.

“I think the Plan B decision to cut the scientists out is sort of a poster child of this concern about science and politics,” says Wood.

She’s talking about fears that religious forces are hijacking government decision-making. Wood was so outraged by the FDA postponement that she promptly resigned as director of the Office of Women's Health in protest.

"What I saw was the science being ignored. That the scientific and medical staff (was) being cut out of decision making," says Wood.

President Bush's latest nominee to head the troubled FDA, Andrew Eschenbach, says he has no idea when a decision on Plan B might be made.

But since this story aired, several states have taken action on their own, pressuring pharmacies to honor Plan B prescriptions. One result: Wal-Mart, the nation's largest pharmacy chain, has reversed its long-standing policy and now carries Plan B.

END

AP

June 10, 2006

Union City private school settles meal fraud case

UNION CITY, N.J. - A nonprofit corporation that runs a private school in Union City paid the federal government $469,000 to settle allegations it had wrongly charged the National School Lunch Program for meals it never served, U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said Friday.

The payment was made Tuesday by Mesivta Sanz of Hudson County. It resolves allegations that the corporation violated the federal False Claims Act.

"Misappropriating money from the school lunch program defrauds our government and hurts the children who most need this program," Christie said. "We will continue to work to protect programs which help our most vulnerable citizens."

According to the settlement agreement, between 2001 and 2006, Mesivta Sanz allegedly submitted false information and statements to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The government alleged that Mesivta Sanz wrongfully reported that school breakfasts and lunches were served on various days on which no classes were in session, namely weekend and religious holy days.

END

AP

June 10, 2006

Piedmont Hospital to pay $3 million to settle whistleblower lawsuit

Piedmont Hospital has agreed to pay more than $3 million to resolve a whistleblower lawsuit that it violated federal law, federal officials said Friday.

The hospital has agreed to pay $3.039 million to the government and accept an agreement requiring the hospital to adhere to policies and procedures to comply with the rules concerning federal health care funds, according to a statement from the U.S. Attorney's Office.

The whistleblower, vascular technologist Patricia J. Quinnelly, will receive $354,390 for shedding light on the case, the statement said.

Acting U.S. Attorney Sally Yates said the settlement demonstrates the federal government's commitment to protecting federal money from fraud and abuse.

"Ensuring the integrity of the Medicare program continues to be a priority of the federal government," she said in the statement.

The lawsuit claimed that the hospital violated the federal False Claims Act by submitting claims to federal health care programs for services that weren't eligible for reimbursement. In addition, the lawsuit claimed the hospital failed to properly execute contracts with doctors who provided professional services there, the statement said.

In the lawsuit, Quinnelly alleged that the hospital submitted claims for a doctor's interpretation of vascular lab tests even though the doctor's analysis had not been performed.

She also said that one of the lab's doctors routinely failed to conduct an independent review of the vascular test data, and instead just approved the technicians' interpretations and proposed diagnoses.

A subsequent investigation found that the hospital failed to execute contractual agreements with the physicians performing services at the vascular laboratory, as required by certain Social Security Act provisions, the statement said.

END

AP

June 12, 2006

Lincare Holdings Agrees to Settle Whistleblower Suit

The Associated Press

Lincare Holdings Inc., a supplier of home oxygen equipment, has agreed to pay $526,000 to end a federal "whistleblower" lawsuit that claimed three of the company's Massachusetts facilities overbilled Medicare, authorities said last week.

Authorities had claimed that Clearwater, Fla.-based Lincare's facilities in Marlborough, Dudley and Leicester, Mass., overbilled between January 1999 and March 2004, U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said.

The settlement agreement states that the payment is not an admission of liability by Lincare. The company did not return phone messages seeking comment.

The government's claims were based on allegations by former Lincare sales representative Susan Smith of Holyoke, Mass. She worked for Lincare for seven months in 2002.

Smith will receive $96,680 of Lincare's payment, as part of the federal government's whistleblower law. Lincare also agreed to pay her attorney $16,890.

Lincare, with more than 800 locations nationwide, is one of the nation's largest providers of oxygen and other respiratory therapy services to patients in the home.

Last month, Lincare agreed to pay $12 million to resolve federal allegations that it gave kickbacks to providers sometime between January 1993 through December 2000. Under that agreement, Lincare did not admit any wrongdoing.

Shares of Lincare rose 3 cents to close at $37.89 on the Nasdaq.

END

Baltimore Sun

6/10/06

Brockovich has new target; Activist of film fame is suing health firms

By Daniel Yi

LOS ANGELES

Erin Brockovich has a famous name, Hollywood good looks, an agent and a new cause: Medicare.

The one-time legal assistant, whose environmental crusade against a utility company inspired a hit movie starring Julia Roberts, has lent her name as plaintiff in lawsuits against several California hospitals and convalescent homes. The suits allege that the defendants pocketed millions in taxpayer dollars while covering up their own mistakes.

Her seven lawsuits, filed last week in Los Angeles Superior Court, are among dozens filed across the country targeting health care providers but using other plaintiffs, her lawyer said.

The lawsuits allege that health care companies are charging Medicare, the federally financed health plan for seniors, to treat illnesses they helped cause through medical error or neglect. The lawsuits do not involve specific allegations of wrongdoing by defendants, but seek instead to find evidence of such treatments, arguing Medicare should be reimbursed.

One defendant called the lawsuits a publicity stunt by a "celebrity plaintiff."

"These are the kinds of baseless lawsuits that contribute to the high cost of health care today," said David Langness, a spokesman for Tenet California, a division of hospital operator Tenet Healthcare Corp., a target of Brockovich's lawsuits.

Along with reimbursing Medicare, Brockovich and her attorneys could potentially win millions of dollars if the lawsuits are successful.

"This is what I do," the 45-year-old Brockovich said. "I am an advocate. It would be as odd for me to turn down a cause as it would be for Julia Roberts to not do another movie."

Brockovich is suing on behalf of the United States under a law that allows citizens to bring grievances in the government's name. Her attorneys also have filed lawsuits in New Jersey and Florida using other citizens as plaintiffs, said attorney James L. Wilkes of Wilkes & McHugh, one of two law firms behind the legal effort.

The other defendants in California include Adventist Health, Country Villa Service Corp., Catholic Healthcare West, Kindred Healthcare Inc., Longwood Management Corp. and Mariner Health Care Inc.

The allegations focus on reports by the federal government that medical errors increase costs for Medicare.

For example, if a hospital operates on a wrong body part, Medicare may end up paying for it as well as the surgery on the correct body part. Medicare may also foot the bill if a patient becomes dehydrated or contracts an infection in the hospital or convalescent home.

Federal health officials estimate medical errors may account for more than $9 billion in health care costs annually and are pushing for quality control measures to curb such expenses.

Medicare officials declined to comment this week on Brockovich's lawsuits.

Since the 2000 movie that earned Roberts an Oscar, Brockovich has made the rounds of various public forums, including TV shows. William Morris Agency manages her public relations talent, while law firms manage her legal cachet.

She served as a consultant in a lawsuit against Pacific Gas & Electric, which settled in February for $295 million over allegations that it contaminated groundwater in and around the town of Hinkley, Calif.

The tiny, windblown community 125 miles northeast of Los Angeles was the setting of separate 1996 lawsuit over a similar issue that led to a $333 million payment by the utility company and inspired the Universal Studios movie.

Brockovich is based at Masry & Vititoe, the Los Angeles law firm founded by the late Ed Masry. He helped file the lawsuits against PG&E and was featured in the movie.

Brockovich and Masry also filed a lawsuit three years ago against various oil companies on behalf of former Beverly Hills High School students who allegedly were exposed to cancer-causing chemicals left on campus from oil operations. The trial is scheduled for October.

Brockovich said she was moved to action on the Medicare lawsuits because she was concerned about rising health care costs. She also was concerned about being pigeonholed as an environmental activist.

END

Law.com

June 12, 2006

Is the 9th Circuit Bound by Its Earlier Pledge Ruling?

Howard J. Bashman
Special to Law.com

A challenge spearheaded by Michael A. Newdow to the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance is once again pending before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Unlike when Newdow's earlier Pledge challenge came before the 9th Circuit, and Newdow was the lone plaintiff, this time Newdow is serving as the attorney for two sets of parents and their minor children who object to the current wording of the Pledge.

In 2002, the 9th Circuit ruled in Newdow's initial challenge to the Pledge of Allegiance that "the school district's policy and practice of teacher-led recitation of the Pledge, with the inclusion of the added words 'under God,' violates the Establishment Clause." Thereafter, in 2003, over the recorded dissents of nine of its judges, the 9th Circuit denied rehearing en banc in the case. In 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the 9th Circuit's ruling by means of a majority opinion holding that Newdow lacked prudential standing to challenge the school district's Pledge of Allegiance policy in federal court.

Surprisingly, once a randomly selected three-judge 9th Circuit panel is assigned to hear the pending appeal in Newdow's current Pledge of Allegiance case, the first question confronting the panel will be the binding effect, if any, of the 9th Circuit's decision in Newdow's favor in the earlier case. Unlike when Newdow's first case came before the 9th Circuit and he was the party who had lost in federal district court, this time Newdow reaches the 9th Circuit on the winning side.

The reason Newdow is now on the winning side is that a federal district court ruled in September 2005 that the 9th Circuit's 2002 decision in Newdow's favor remains binding law despite the Supreme Court's 2004 decision that Newdow lacked prudential standing.

Many observers await with great interest the news of which three judges have been assigned to hear and decide Newdow's pending 9th Circuit appeal, because a panel with a substantially different outlook on Establishment Clause issues from the three judges who decided Newdow's original appeal could hold that recitation in school of the words "under God" in the Pledge is not unconstitutional, thereby reaching a result opposite from the one the original panel reached in 2002.

But the composition of the 9th Circuit panel that will hear the pending appeal would be irrelevant if the district court were correct in holding that the 9th Circuit's 2002 pro-Newdow decision remains binding. This is because in the 9th Circuit, as elsewhere, earlier three-judge panel rulings bind later three-judge panels unless the earlier decision has been overturned by the court en banc or by the U.S. Supreme Court.

In the Supreme Court's 2004 ruling in Newdow's case, a majority of the Court did not address the merits of the 9th Circuit's holding that the school district's practice of teacher-led recitation of the Pledge, with the inclusion of the words "under God," violates the Establishment Clause. Nevertheless, for reasons that I now turn to explain, the Supreme Court's reversal of the 9th Circuit's ruling deprives the 9th Circuit's earlier ruling on the merits of any precedential effect.

The federal district court's ruling, now on appeal before the 9th Circuit, treats the Supreme Court's ruling as though it reversed the 9th Circuit in part. In the district court's view, the Supreme Court disagreed only with the 9th Circuit's conclusion that Newdow possessed standing to receive a ruling on the merits but did not disagree (or agree) with the 9th Circuit's resolution on the merits.

The district court's conclusion is wrong in two respects. First, the Supreme Court's reversal of the 9th Circuit's judgment was not a reversal in part, as evidenced by the fact that the three justices who disagreed with the majority's prudential standing decision nevertheless concurred in the judgment based on their view that recitation of the Pledge was not unconstitutional. The remaining three justices could not have concurred in the reversal of the case unless the Supreme Court's judgment had the effect of erasing the 9th Circuit's resolution of the merits.

Second, the Supreme Court's majority's ruling was not a reversal in part. A typical reversal in part comes in a case where the court of appeals has issued two unrelated holdings: The color blue is more visually pleasing than the color red, and the number two is greater than the number four. If the Supreme Court grants certiorari to review the mathematical holding and thereafter reverses, holding that four is greater than two, the court of appeals' holding concerning which color is more pleasing survives undisturbed.

However, in Newdow's earlier case, the 9th Circuit's ability to reach the merits depended on Newdow's satisfaction of both Article III and prudential standing requirements. Because Newdow couldn't satisfy the prudential standing requirement, the 9th Circuit should not have resolved the merits, and thus the Supreme Court's decision rendered a nullity the 9th Circuit's resolution of the merits.

The federal district court ruling in Newdow's favor cites precedents for the proposition that a court may reach the merits where the existence of prudential standing is especially difficult to resolve. But the district court's decision severely misapplied those precedents. A more accurate statement of these precedents is that if the question of whether a plaintiff satisfies prudential standing requirements is especially difficult to decide, but on the merits a ruling against the plaintiff is relatively easy, the court may resolve the case against the plaintiff on the merits without ever having to decide the question of standing.

I am unfamiliar with any precedent, other than the district court's ruling in Newdow's case, that holds that where the plaintiff's ability to satisfy prudential standing requirements is too difficult to decide, the court can sidestep the standing question and rule against the defendant on the merits. Yet, that is the effect of the district court's ruling.

Moreover, if the district court were correct that the 9th Circuit's ruling in Newdow's earlier case remained binding law even after having been reversed by the Supreme Court, then every public school within the 9th Circuit's nine states and two territories should no longer be reciting the Pledge of Allegiance in its current form. Except for a lone federal district judge, no one understands that to be the actual state of the law today within the 9th Circuit.

The district court considering Newdow's current case could still have reached the same result without concluding that the 9th Circuit's now-reversed ruling in Newdow's earlier case remained binding precedent. All the district court had to do was issue a ruling that contained the following reasoning:

First, the district court, because it is based in California, is bound by the 9th Circuit's case law. Second, although the Supreme Court's reversal in Newdow's earlier suit deprives the 9th Circuit's earlier ruling of any precedential value, a majority on the Supreme Court failed to address on the merits the correctness of the 9th Circuit's Establishment Clause holding. Third, the 9th Circuit's earlier decision in Newdow's case reflects the 9th Circuit's likely resolution of the identical legal issue presented in the new case, given that a majority on the first three-judge panel found an Establishment Clause violation and then the full 9th Circuit failed to grant rehearing en banc of that decision. Fourth and finally, the district court could have said that no intervening 9th Circuit or Supreme Court decision calls into doubt the result on the merits reached by the original 9th Circuit panel.

That four-step process of reasoning would have allowed the federal district court considering Newdow's latest lawsuit to reach the same result as the 9th Circuit reached in Newdow's first lawsuit without erroneously holding that the 9th Circuit's earlier, reversed ruling remains binding precedent. I predict that the 9th Circuit will reject the district court's holding that the 9th Circuit's decision on the merits in Newdow's first case remains binding precedent even after the Supreme Court reversed the 9th Circuit's judgment. How the new 9th Circuit panel will rule on the merits will depend on which three judges are assigned to that panel, something which is impossible to predict at this time.

END

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 4:01 PM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: U.S. Asks Judge to Drop Suit on N.S.A. Spying

NY Times

June 12, 2006

U.S. Asks Judge to Drop Suit on N.S.A. Spying

By ADAM LIPTAK

DETROIT, June 12 — A National Security Agency program that listens in on international communications involving people in the United States is both vital to national security and permitted by the Constitution, a government lawyer told a judge here today in the first major court argument on the program.

But, the lawyer went on, addressing Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court, "the evidence we need to demonstrate to you that it lawful cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security."

The only solution to this impasse, the lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, said, was for Judge Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit before her, an American Civil Liberties Union challenge to the eavesdropping program, under the state secrets privilege. The privilege can limit and even extinguish cases that would reveal national security information, and it is fast becoming one of the Justice Department's favorite tools in defending court challenges to its efforts to combat terrorism.

The Detroit case was filed in January on behalf of journalists, scholars, lawyers and nonprofit organizations who contended that the possibility of government eavesdropping interfered with their work. In remarks to reporters after the 90-minute argument, Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, called the government's invocation of the state secrets privilege "Orwellian doublespeak."

"They argued essentially that the N.S.A. program was off-limits to judicial review," Mr. Romero said.

The small courtroom was jammed for the argument, with a dozen people standing in the aisles and journalists sitting in the jury box.

In her presentation, Ann Beeson, the A.C.L.U.'s associate legal director, asked Judge Taylor to shut down the surveillance program based on publicly available information.

The case boiled down to two legal questions, Ms. Beeson said. The first is whether the plaintiffs have suffered the sort of direct injury necessary to establish that they have standing to bring suit. The second is whether President Bush was authorized by Congress or by the Constitution to violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a 1978 law that forbids surveillance of people inside the United States without a warrant.

The Bush administration has acknowledged that it has not complied with the law but has said that a Congressional authorization in 2001 to use military force against Al Qaeda and the president's inherent constitutional powers allowed him to violate it.

The government's main argument today, repeated numerous times, was that more facts are required in the case but that more facts cannot be disclosed. Judge Taylor asked few questions but at one point appeared frustrated by this approach.

"You have conceded, have you not, that a program has been authorized?" she asked Mr. Coppolino. He responded that the administration's public defense of the program has been too general to serve as the basis for judicial adjudication. "There is very much a difference," Mr. Coppolino said, "between the existence of an activity and the details of that activity."

Even portions of the government's brief that were said to demonstrate why further information about the program cannot be disclosed have not been filed in court. Instead, the government "lodged" the brief and other classified papers at the Justice Department in Washington, inviting Judge Taylor to make arrangements to see them. At today's hearing, she shook her head no when Mr. Coppolino asked her whether she had "had a chance to review our classified submission."

Judge Taylor has scheduled a separate argument next month to consider the government's motion to dismiss the case based on the state secrets privilege. While she could theoretically rule on the plaintiffs' request to block the program before then, she is more likely to consider the two motions simultaneously.

Calling the plaintiffs' position extreme, Mr. Coppolino said the 1978 law cannot constitutionally constrain the president when the nation's safety is at risk.

"The president's constitutional power doesn't simply disappear when Congress enacts a statute," Mr. Coppolino said. "Surveillance of an enemy is indeed a necessary incident of war."

Ms. Beeson said the 1978 law, often called FISA, gave the president all the flexibility he needed. "If FISA didn't work," she said, "the proper procedure under our constitutional system was for the president to go back to Congress and ask it to amend the law."

"Our constitutional system was set up to require the president to follow the law just like anyone else," she added. "If our view of the separation of powers is extreme, then the Constitution is extreme."

Mr. Coppolino also argued that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue in the first place because they cannot show they have been injured. "You don't get standing," he said, "simply because you say the president has a program and I think it might cover me."

Ms. Beeson countered that her clients have suffered concrete harms. "Journalists' sources have dried up," she said. And lawyers for people suspected of terrorism have had to resort to alternatives to phone calls and e-mails to ensure the confidentiality of their communications, she said. "They have had to make expensive oversees trips to gather evidence," Ms. Beeson said.

Mr. Coppolino said the government is not able clarify whether the plaintiffs' fears are justified. "The government cannot confirm or deny whether a particular individual is subject to surveillance or what the criteria is," he said. "Indicating that someone is not subject to surveillance is itself revealing."

Mr. Coppolino indicated that some plaintiffs may have more reason to be concerned than others. Lawyers who represent suspected terrorists, he said, "come closer to being in the ballpark of the terrorist surveillance program."

But here too, he said, "the critical facts necessary to adjudicate" the standing question "are subject to the state secrets privilege."

As Ms. Beeson concluded her argument, which had been uninterrupted by questions, Judge Taylor called her back to the lectern. "Talk about standing some more," Judge Taylor said, perhaps identifying the part of the plaintiffs' case she considered the most difficult.

END

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 5:04 PM
To: Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: Fw: NSLs
Attachments: National Security Letters 2.pdf; NSL.Specter.11.23.05.pdf

-----Original Message-----
From: McIntosh, Brent
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Hertling, Richard; Friedrich, Matthew
Sent: Mon Jun 12 10:14:16 2006
Subject: RE: NSLs

I've attached talkers on NSLs and the changes wrought by both PATRIOT and PATRIOT reauth. I've also attached our letter to the Hill following last year's Washington Post front-page NSL hit piece, which captures nicely our responses to lots of myths about NSLs.

From: Hertling, Richard
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:44 AM
To: McIntosh, Brent
Subject: FW: NSLs

I will let you reply.

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 9:18 AM
To: Friedrich, Matthew; Hertling, Richard
Subject: NSLs

Does one of you happen to have tps on NSLs? I'm looking for tps that make the pt that NSLs are not a creation of the Bush Administration; are long recognized and used law enforcement tools that predate Patriot, etc.

National Security Letters

- National security letters ("NSLs") are similar to administrative subpoenas and may be used by the FBI to obtain specified information from specified companies in international terrorism and espionage investigations. NSLs are generally used to obtain:
    - Billing and transactional records maintained by telephone companies and Internet service providers;
    - Credit reports and other consumer information maintained by consumer reporting agencies; and
    - Financial information maintained by financial institutions.
- Recipients of NSLs can be prohibited from informing others that they have received these requests for information in order to safeguard the integrity of the sensitive terrorism and espionage investigations in which national security letters are used. But that prohibition only attaches if the FBI or DOJ certifies that certain enumerated harms — such as harm to the national security or diplomatic relations — would result from disclosure.
- In Doe v. Ashcroft, a federal district judge in the Southern District of New York struck down as unconstitutional 18 U.S.C. § 2709, one of five statutes giving federal investigators the power to issue NSLs.
- 18 U.S.C. § 2709, which was based on language offered by Senator Leahy, authorizes the FBI to issue NSLs in order to obtain billing and transactional records from telephone companies and Internet service providers and was passed as part of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986.
- This court ruling did not strike down any provision of the USA PATRIOT Act. Rather, the part of the statute invalidated by the court was part of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986 ("ECPA").
    - Section 505 of the USA PATRIOT Act did amend 18 U.S.C. § 2709 and other NSL statutes to eliminate the requirement that the FBI identify specific and articulable facts that information sought through an NSL pertained to a foreign power or an agent of a foreign power, such as a terrorist or spy.
    - Section 505 substituted the requirement that information sought through an NSL must be relevant to an authorized international terrorism or espionage investigation, the same relevance standard that is used in the context of grand jury subpoenas.

- The difference between the pre-PATRIOT Act "specific and articulable facts" standard and the post-PATRIOT Act "relevance standard" did not play a key role in the decision of the federal district judge in the Southern District of New York to strike down 18 U.S.C. § 2709 as unconstitutional.

- Rather, as stated above, that decision was based on the perceived inability of an NSL recipient to challenge the NSL request in court and the permanent and blanket prohibition on the recipient of an NSL disclosing that it had received the request.

- The legislative reauthorizing the USA PATRIOT Act remedied these concerns by providing for challenges to NSLs and their attendant nondisclosure requirements. The reauthorization legislation:

  - Makes clear that an NSL recipient can challenge an NSL in court and that a court can modify or set aside the NSL if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive.

  - Makes clear that the Attorney General may seek judicial enforcement of NSLs when recipients refuse to reply with the request for information.

  - Makes clear that an NSL recipient may disclose the existence of the NSL in the course of seeking legal advice from an attorney or obtaining assistance from those whose help is necessary to comply with the request for information.

  - Provides that the nondisclosure requirement only applies to an NSL in instances where a government officer certifies that disclosure of the NSL may result in: (1) a danger to the national security of the United States; (2) interference with a criminal, counterterrorism, or counterintelligence investigation; (3) interference with diplomatic relations; or (4) danger to the life or physical safety of any person.

  - Requires that any NSL subject to a nondisclosure requirement contain notification of that nondisclosure requirement.

  - Imposes criminal liability on those who knowingly violate NSL non-disclosure requirements, but only as a specific-intent crime.

  - Allow for NSL recipients to challenge a nondisclosure requirement and for a court to modify or set aside such a requirement.

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

November 23, 2005

The Honorable Arlen Specter
Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

On Sunday, November 6, the Washington Post published a feature article by Barton Gellman titled "The FBI's Secret Scrutiny: In Hunt for Terrorists, Bureau Examines Records of Ordinary Americans." The article presents a materially misleading portrayal of the FBI's use of National Security Letters (NSLs), which are a long-standing and important tool for preventing terrorist attacks and espionage. Contrary to the impression created by the Post's article, NSLs do not empower the FBI to spy on ordinary Americans, to listen to phone calls or read emails, or to review what books Americans read or web sites they visit. Rather, NSLs empower the FBI to conduct national security investigations by requesting very specific categories of information critical in tracking the activities of terrorists and spies and determining whether a person is a terrorist or spy.

While many of the distortions and factual errors in the Post's article can be debunked only through classified information, other flaws in the article's discussion are revealed on the face of public records and of the laws passed by the Congress. Indeed, some are revealed in the article's own internal inconsistencies. We have already briefed your staffs on many of the article's distortions and falsehoods, including those for which the underlying facts are classified. This letter is intended to provide you an account of the facts regarding certain inaccuracies that can be rebutted in an unclassified format. We have therefore listed a number of those errors and explained the truth regarding those errors.

1. As a general theme, the Post claims that the FBI uses NSLs to spy on law-abiding Americans. This is simply false: The FBI cannot and does not use NSLs outside of authorized national security investigations.

   Claims: "The PATRIOT Act, and the Bush administration guidelines for its use, transformed those [national security] letters by permitting clandestine scrutiny of U.S. residents and visitors who are not alleged to be terrorists or spies."; "Career investigators and Bush administration officials emphasized, in congressional testimony and interviews for this story, that national security letters are for hunting terrorists, not fishing through the private lives of the innocent. The distinction is not as clear in practice."

Fact: By law and in practice, NSLs cannot be and are not used to spy on law-abiding Americans or to investigate ordinary crimes or even domestic terrorism — they are limited to requests for information relevant to authorized investigations of international terrorism and espionage. To be sure, some people whose records are produced in response to an NSL may not be terrorists or spies or associated with terrorists or spies. But in these vital investigations, the FBI needs to be able to check out every tip and track down every lead. As the attacks of 9/11 taught us all, even the slightest lead must be aggressively pursued. NSLs allow the FBI use of an efficient tool for determining the seriousness of the threat posed by suspected terrorists or spies and their associates — including the ability to cull unwitting acquaintances from complicit and dangerous co-conspirators.

2. The Post insinuates that the FBI uses NSLs to seek library patrons' check-out records and monitor visits to disfavored websites. But the statutes authorizing NSLs do not authorize the FBI to request information on "the books [library patrons] borrow" or to monitor traffic on websites, and the FBI complies with those statutes.

Claims: "[T]he vendors of the software he operates said their databases can reveal . . . the books they borrow. [The purported NSL recipient] refused to hand over those records . . . ."; "If the government monitors the Web sites that people visit and the books that they read, people will stop visiting disfavored Web sites and stop reading disfavored books."

Fact: The FBI by law cannot, and in practice does not, request that an NSL recipient disclose e-mail contents or library checkout records. The NSL statutes strictly limit what information may be requested, and from whom. The NSL in the Connecticut case was issued under 18 U.S.C. § 2709, which does not authorize requests for book borrowing records. Indeed, despite the Post's insinuation, the Post's own description of the NSL at issue in the Connecticut case (the accuracy of which can only be discussed in a classified setting) does not suggest that the FBI sought check-out records. Justice Ginsburg's opinion denying emergency relief in that case confirms this, characterizing the NSL as requesting "'subscriber information, billing information[,] and access logs'" — not book check-out records. Doe v. Gonzales, 546 U.S. ___, No. 05A295 (Oct. 7, 2005) (Ginsburg, J., in chambers). As for websites, tracking visits to websites cannot be done under an NSL.

3. The Post implies that NSLs are left entirely to the FBI's discretion. In doing so, the Post ignores robust mechanisms for checking misuse.

Claim: "They [NSLs] receive no review after the fact by the Justice Department or Congress."

Fact: FBI NSL usage is subject to Justice Department and Congressional oversight. First, no NSL may be issued except in an authorized national security investigation, and no national security investigation may be authorized without notice to the Justice Department's Office of Intelligence Policy and Review and its Criminal Division. Second, should there be an allegation of wrongdoing involving an NSL, the Justice Department's Inspector General is empowered to investigate, and any misuse must be reported to the Intelligence Oversight Board. Third, all but one of the statutes authorizing use of NSLs require the FBI to "fully inform" Congress regarding the FBI's use of NSLs.

4. The Post fundamentally mischaracterizes a recent Executive Order to claim that it requires the FBI to share private records of innocent Americans with entities outside the federal government.

Claim: "Late last month, President Bush signed Executive Order 13388, expanding access to those files for 'state, local and tribal' governments and for 'appropriate private sector entities,' which are not defined."

Fact: Executive Order 13388 does not give state, local, tribal, or private entities access to information gleaned from NSLs. The Executive Order's reference to those entities directs that they be included in a federal project to bolster the "interchange of terrorism information" insofar as it is consistent with "the freedom, information privacy, and other legal rights of Americans." E.O. 13388 § 1. This policy directive implements section 1016 of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, which requires the sharing of terrorism information with "all appropriate Federal, State, local, and tribal entities, and the private sector." The information-sharing project includes policies and procedures to determine who is an appropriate recipient of what information, and to safeguard privacy and civil liberties. For instance, including private sector entities in the "interchange of terrorism information" will allow terror threat information to be shared, as appropriate, with business and critical infrastructure entities. There is no requirement that those entities be given access to information on innocent Americans.

5. The Post implies that the FBI can use an NSL to compel production of private records without the intervention of a court, and that PATRIOT Act conferees are set to expand that authority. Neither contention has any basis in fact.

Claim: "House and Senate conferees are poised again to amplify the FBI's power to compel the secret surrender of private records."

Fact: The FBI cannot compel compliance with an NSL without seeking judicial intervention. An NSL is not a court order or a grand jury subpoena; it is a request for records. In the event a recipient objects to the request, production can only be "compelled" by a court. Neither the House nor the Senate reauthorization bill contains language that would "amplify" existing NSL authorities. The changes supported by the Administration will create significant additional oversight and explicit procedures for judicial review — facts literally ignored by the Post.

6. The Post implies that Congressional oversight of NSLs is inadequate and that, in any event, the Justice Department has failed to report how many NSLs it uses. To the contrary, the Justice Department provides Congress information on NSL usage in a number of forms, including reporting, briefings, and testimony.

Claim: "The Justice Department has offered Congress no concrete information, even in classified form, save for a partial count of the number of letters delivered."; "As national security letters have grown in number and importance, oversight has not kept up."

Fact: The Department of Justice has complied with thorough Congressional oversight of NSL use. In addition to providing to Congress all information required by the numerous statutory reporting requirements regarding NSLs, the Department has participated in multiple hearings that addressed NSL authorities, responded to numerous written congressional queries, and conducted several classified briefings. It is simply false to suggest that the Justice Department has offered Congress "no concrete information" on NSL usage or that Congress has ignored its oversight responsibilities. Moreover, the article's denigration of the oversight the Congress can provide based on numbers of NSLs issued is unwarranted. The Department reports both the total number of NSLs issued and, most important, the number of different U.S. persons whose records the FBI has requested through NSLs. Those statistics permit Congress to see if there have been significant increases in the use of NSL authority. By way of example, if the Post is correct that NSLs were used during the Las Vegas investigation (a point we can neither confirm nor deny in an unclassified setting), our reports to Congress would include a huge number of U.S. persons, which would undoubtedly attract Congressional attention.

7. The Post draws misleading and erroneous distinctions between NSLs and their criminal investigative counterpart, grand jury subpoenas.

Claim: "Grand juries tend to have a narrower focus because they investigate past conduct, not the speculative threat of unknown future attacks. Recipients of grand jury subpoenas are generally free to discuss the subpoenas publicly."

Fact: The distinctions the Post is attempting to draw between grand jury subpoenas and NSLs appear to be based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the grand jury process. First, a grand jury subpoena certainly could be used to investigate "the speculative threat of unknown future attacks": grand juries are fully empowered to investigate ongoing conspiracies. Second, while grand jury subpoenas are available to investigate a wide range of criminal activities, NSLs are available only in authorized national security investigations, in which confidentiality is often a paramount concern. Finally, courts have repeatedly recognized that individuals do not have a First Amendment right to disclose information learned only by virtue of participation in an investigation, particularly where the national security is implicated.

8. The Post incorrectly implies that then-Attorney General Ashcroft empowered the FBI to investigate terrorism without regard to Americans' civil rights and civil liberties.

Claim: "He gave overriding priority to preventing attacks by any means available."

Fact: The FBI must and does conduct its investigations within the bounds of our Constitution, statutes, strict internal guidelines, and Executive Orders. Attorney General Ashcroft did not authorize, and could not have authorized, the FBI to disregard those constraints. It is simply false to suggest that there are no legal restrictions on the FBI's investigations, even of terrorism.

9. The Post asserts that because subjects are not notified of the issuance of an NSL, no one can challenge that issuance. This contention is wrong, given the availability of various oversight mechanisms and judicial review.

Claim: "Because recipients are permanently barred from disclosing the letters, outsiders can make no assessment of their relevance . . . ."

Fact: Recipients can challenge NSLs in court. Moreover, they can notify the Justice Department's Inspector General about perceived abuses. And NSL usage is subject to extensive Congressional oversight. Any recipient can challenge the NSL it receives, and the courts and the Justice Department's Inspector General are all available to address those challenges. The Department takes the position that the nondisclosure requirement does not bar all disclosure but rather allows disclosure to an attorney. Moreover, NSLs are not self-enforcing; the FBI cannot compel compliance absent a federal court order. Finally, Congress conducts rigorous oversight over NSL usage. In short, the idea that there is no outside oversight of the FBI's NSL usage is simply wrong.

10. The Post erroneously implies that the permanent nondisclosure requirements do not serve a legitimate national security purpose.

Claim: "[N]ational security seldom requires that the secret be kept forever."

Fact: Protecting the secrecy and integrity of national security investigations, techniques, and methods is critical to our ability to protect Americans from terrorist attacks and espionage. The nondisclosure requirement serves two ends in national security investigations: (1) it prevents the target of an investigation from being tipped off; and (2) it ensures that we are not revealing too much information about our investigative capabilities and techniques to our enemies. It is the second reason in particular that the Post essentially ignores. There are many parties around the world who employ sophisticated techniques for gauging our intelligence and counterterrorism capabilities. Courts have repeatedly recognized the danger of publicly revealing information that in isolation appears harmless but when combined with other information provides our enemies insights into our capabilities and techniques. The nondisclosure requirement ensures that it is the FBI or the Justice Department that makes the determination whether information can be disclosed without harm to the national security or ongoing investigations. That decision is not one properly given to the recipient of an NSL, who will almost never be in a position to make that determination accurately.

11. The Post implies that the standard governing NSL use is toothless, ignoring the robust, binding legal guidance that informs that standard.

Claim: "To establish the 'relevance' of the information they seek, agents face a test so basic it is hard to come up with a plausible way to fail."

Fact: By law, NSLs are limited to requests for information relevant to international terrorism and espionage investigations, and the FBI does not use them except in those authorized circumstances. NSLs are not available to investigate ordinary criminal activity or even domestic terrorism. Moreover, the term "relevance" is one that has been employed in the law for generations — in fact, it is the standard for the issuance of a grand jury subpoena. It is simply false to suggest that "relevance" is an undefined or limitless concept.

12. The Post peddles the notion that the existence of the authority to use NSLs is itself an "abuse," regardless of how lawfully they are used. But the lawful use of a Congressionally authorized investigative tool is not an abuse.

Claim: "What the Bush administration means by abuse is unauthorized use of surveillance data — for example, to blackmail an enemy or track an estranged spouse. Critics are focused elsewhere . . . 'the abuse is in the power itself.'"

Fact: The Department of Justice takes seriously the limits on its authorities and fully understands that unlawful use of an authority is an abuse. But lawful use is by definition not abuse. Contrary to the Post's assertion, we do not limit our understanding of abuse to the egregious, such as blackmail or stalking. On the other hand, we do not agree — and neither should Members of Congress — that lawful and prudent use in appropriate circumstances of a duly authorized investigative authority itself constitutes "abuse."

13. The Post implies that the nondisclosure requirement attaching to an NSL would prohibit the recipient from consulting an attorney, in spite of the Department's repeatedly stated position that the nondisclosure requirement does not prevent a recipient from seeking counsel.

Claim: "He wanted to fight the FBI but feared calling a lawyer because the letter said he could not disclose its existence to 'any person.'"

Fact: The NSL statute at issue in the Connecticut case allows disclosure of receipt to an "agent," which would include an attorney. In practice, and in litigation, the Justice Department has repeatedly maintained that the nondisclosure requirement allows disclosure to an attorney. Moreover, the recipient did consult an attorney and did challenge the NSL, as evidenced by the Post's own discussion of the lawsuit. The Post further ignores that the Department has expressed public support for legislation making explicit that a recipient may consult an attorney.

14. The Post claims that the Department of Justice has hidden from the courts the facts underlying the Connecticut NSL case. This claim is simply baseless.

Claim: "The central facts remain opaque, even to the judges, because the FBI is not obliged to describe what it is looking for, or why."

Fact: The Department of Justice has fully complied with the courts' requests for the facts underlying the Connecticut case. A comprehensive explanation was filed under seal; although the explanation is not publicly available, the judges have been fully informed. It is simply false to state that the FBI has withheld from the courts information on what the FBI is looking for and why. Moreover, with knowledge of the reason for the FBI's request, the District Court has not determined that the FBI's request is unreasonable or unwarranted; rather, the court only ruled that the law requires the availability of a challenge and prohibits a permanent nondisclosure provision. Neither of these rulings casts any doubt on the underlying validity of the FBI's request.

15. The Post incorrectly implies that a claim that businesses face dire consequences for noncompliance with government requests was directed to NSL requests.

Claim: The Post attributes to one expert the position that failure to comply with an NSL could mean that "a business could face criminal prosecution, 'a "death sentence" for certain kinds of companies.'"

Fact: The Post failed to provide a single instance of the government prosecuting a business for failing to comply with a national security investigation. This is unsurprising, as the government has never prosecuted any individual or company for failing to comply with an NSL. The Justice Department is not looking to impose the economic "death sentence" on businesses that fail to comply with NSLs, and the Post's suggestion to the contrary is irresponsible. The statements on which the Post bases its claim are taken out of context and did not, when made, refer to compliance with NSLs.

16. The Post incorrectly asserts that businesses have complained about the burden imposed by NSL requests.

Claim: "National security letters, [major business groups] wrote, have begun to impose an 'expensive and time-consuming burden' on business."

Fact: The letter to which the Post refers did not single out NSLs as burdensome but instead indicated in general that "document requests from the government" can pose an "expensive and time-consuming burden." There exist a variety of investigative tools with which the government can request documents from businesses, including the familiar grand jury subpoena. Many of these tools can impose substantial compliance burdens on businesses. But the Post's misrepresentation that businesses groups singled out NSLs as expensive or time-consuming is simply false. Indeed, in the Justice Department's experience, NSLs are much less "expensive and time-consuming" for recipients than some other investigative tools, and nothing in the business groups' letter contradicts that understanding.

17. The Post also erroneously insinuates that there is no internal oversight of NSL usage.

Claim: "In the executive branch, no FBI or Justice Department official audits the use of national security letters to assess whether they are appropriately targeted, lawfully applied or contribute important facts to an investigation."

Fact: The use of NSLs, like the use of any authority, is subject to significant internal oversight and checks. As an initial matter, an NSL must be approved by a field office's Special Agent in Charge (SAC) or one of a handful of senior FBI headquarters officials — all members of the Senior Executive Service, totaling fewer than 100 nationally. Before an NSL request even gets to the desk of an SAC, it will go through at least two levels of oversight, including legal compliance. After the fact, any misuse of an NSL is subject to significant oversight as part of the FBI's reports to the Intelligence Oversight Board. Finally, the Department of Justice Inspector General is empowered to investigate any allegations of abuse.

In addition to these corrections, we have provided classified briefings to your staffs, as well as to certain Members who requested them, regarding the following erroneous claims:

- "The FBI now issues more than 30,000 national security letters a year, . . . a hundredfold increase over historic norms."

- "The Bush administration . . . has offered no example in which the use of a national security letter helped disrupt a terrorist plot."

- "In late 2003, the Bush administration reversed a long-standing policy requiring agents to destroy their files on innocent American citizens, companies and residents when investigations closed."

- "Criticized for failure to detect the Sept. 11 plot, the bureau now casts a much wider net, using national security letters to generate leads as well as to pursue them."

- "Agents commonly use the letters now in 'preliminary investigations' and in the 'threat assessments' that precede a decision whether to launch an investigation."

- "Ashcroft remained bound by Executive Order 12333, which requires the use of the 'least intrusive means' in domestic intelligence investigations. But his new interpretation came close to upending the mandate."

- "Two years ago, Ashcroft rescinded a 1995 guideline directing that information obtained through a national security letter about a U.S. citizen or resident 'shall be destroyed by the FBI and not further disseminated' if it proves 'not relevant to the purposes for which it was collected.' Ashcroft's new order was that 'the FBI shall retain' all records it collects and 'may disseminate' them freely among federal agencies."

- "[T]he FBI had served national security letters on [Las Vegas casinos]. In an interview for this article, one former casino executive confirmed the use of a national security letter."

The Department of Justice is committed to protecting civil liberties and to using all investigative tools judiciously and within the bounds of the law. This includes NSLs, which are one of the important tools Congress provided the Department to help us secure our nation. We urge the Congress not to let a distorted and misleading portrayal of the FBI's use of this vital investigative tool skew the debate over how best to ensure our national security.

If we can be of further assistance, please do not hesitate to contact this office.

Sincerely,

William E. Moschella
Assistant Attorney General

cc: The Honorable Patrick J. Leahy
Ranking Minority Member

Charles.Schott@do.treas.gov

From: Charles.Schott@do.treas.gov
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 6:55 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Fw: Leaving Treasury

Neil:

Attached is an announcement we received today. Jean Card is a wonderful person and wordsmith. You will enjoy getting to know her.

Charlie

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Card, Jean
To: _DL_WHL
Sent: Mon Jun 12 18:25:02 2006
Subject: Leaving Treasury

Dear Colleagues,

After two and a half incredible years here, Iâ??ll walk down the granite steps of Treasury for the last time this Friday, June 16th.

Next Monday, Iâ??ll start my new job as Senior Speechwriter to Attorney General Gonzales at the Department of Justice.

As much as I look forward to this exciting new opportunity, I will miss the Treasury team so very much. I hope you all know how much I have enjoyed these years at 1500 Pennsylvania Avenue, and how much I value all that I have learned from you, my brilliant colleagues!

Of course, I canâ??t be gotten rid of that easily â?? Iâ??ll remain a proud part of the larger team that serves our President and I look forward to seeing you all around town.

All the best,

Jean Card

Senior Writer

Office of Public Affairs

My new contact information (as of Monday, June 19th) will be:

Jean.card@usdoj.gov

(202) 353-1561

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Tuesday, June 13, 2006 8:13 AM
To: [redacted]@do.treas.gov'
Subject: RE: Leaving Treasury

[redacted] Thanks for this heads up. I look forward to working with Jean and will search her out. Having written remarks for the AG previously, I am certain Jean will enjoy working with him. Warmest regards, Neil

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@do.treas.gov [mailto [redacted]@do.treas.gov]
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 6:55 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Fw: Leaving Treasury

Neil:

Attached is an announcement we received today. Jean Card is a wonderful person and wordsmith. You will enjoy getting to know her.

[redacted]

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Card, Jean
To: _DL_WHL
Sent: Mon Jun 12 18:25:02 2006
Subject: Leaving Treasury

Dear Colleagues,

After two and a half incredible years here, Iâ??ll walk down the granite steps of Treasury for the last time this Friday, June 16th.

Next Monday, Iâ??ll start my new job as Senior Speechwriter to Attorney General Gonzales at the Department of Justice.

[redacted]

All the best,

Jean Card

Senior Writer

Office of Public Affairs

My new contact information (as of Monday, June 19th) will be:

Jean.card@usdoj.gov

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Tuesday, June 13, 2006 8:14 AM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Subject: FW: Leaving Treasury

Some warm and unsolicited words about your new speech writer from one of her colleagues at Treas.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Tuesday, June 13, 2006 8:13 AM
To: [redacted]@do.treas.gov'
Subject: RE: Leaving Treasury

[redacted] Thanks for this heads up. I look forward to working with Jean and will search her out. Having written remarks for the AG previously, I am certain Jean will enjoy working with him. Warmest regards, Neil

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@do.treas.gov [mailto: [redacted]@do.treas.gov]
Sent: Monday, June 12, 2006 6:55 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Fw: Leaving Treasury

Neil:

Attached is an announcement we received today. Jean Card is a wonderful person and wordsmith. You will enjoy getting to know her.

[redacted]

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Card, Jean
To: _DL_WHL
Sent: Mon Jun 12 18:25:02 2006
Subject: Leaving Treasury

Dear Colleagues,

After two and a half incredible years here, Iâ??ll walk down the granite steps of Treasury for the last time this Friday, June 16th.

Next Monday, Iâ??ll start my new job as Senior Speechwriter to Attorney General Gonzales at the Department of Justice.

All the best,

Jean Card

Senior Writer

Office of Public Affairs

My new contact information (as of Monday, June 19th) will be:

Jean.card@usdoj.gov

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, June 13, 2006 8:28 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, June 13, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060613.pdf; agnb060613.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 13, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Defends Domestic Surveillance Program In Detroit Courtroom 4
2nd Circuit Panel Presses CIA Attorney Over Withheld Documents 4
Administration Backs Away From Official's Remarks On Guantanamo Suicides 5
Religious Leaders Call On US To Ban Torture 6
Canadian Terror Suspects Allegedly Trained Near US Border 6

Homeland Response:

Technology Association Study Criticizes VoIP Wiretapping Rules 7
Air Marshals Say Ammunition Not Safe For Use In Air 7
Kelly Says Lower Manhattan Initiative Put On Hold Due To Reduced Funding 7
Author Says DHS Allowed To Act Like "Keystone Stasi." 7
Evacuations Ordered In Florida As Alberto Approaches Landfall 7
Insurance Regulators Call On Congress For Help Dealing With Disasters 9
Spellings Announces Grants For New Orleans Charter Schools 9

War News:

Bush Meets With National Security Team On Iraq 10
US, Iraqi Forces Launched 200 Raids Against Insurgents Since Zarqawi's Death 13
Insurgent Attacks Kill More Than 50 In Baghdad 14
US Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict 15
Basra Spiraling Into Corruption 15
Hussein Witnesses Admit Perjury 15
Funeral Held For CBS Cameraman Killed In Iraq 15
37 Taliban Members Killed In Battles 15
NATO Seen As Increasing Role In War On Terror 15
Congress Gives Pentagon More Budgetary Authority 16
Army Changes Pain Treatment For Wounded Soldiers 16
Rival US Labs Compete To Build Safer Nuclear Bomb 16

Corporate Scandals:

Former Interspeed Official Convicted Of Fraud 16
US Subpoenas Monster In Widening Options Probe 16
Manne Argues Case For Insider Trading 17
Bill Would Limit Use Of Pension Accounting Benefit 17

Criminal Law:

FBI Reports First Rise In Violent Crime In Five Years 17
Libby Lawyers May Call Memory Expert 20
Judge Dismisses Part Of Charge Against Safavian As Trial Goes To Jury 20
Shadegg Circulates Article Linking Lewis, Earmark Corruption 20
SCOTUS Ruling Sends Texas Death Penalty Case Back For Possible Fourth Trial 21
Utah Professor Has Anderson Documents, But Will Keep Them From FBI 21
Supreme Court Issues Two Restrictive Death Penalty Rulings 21
Former FBI Boston SAC Testifies At Wrongful Death Trial 22
Nevada Judge Shot In Courthouse By Sniper 23
Wisconsin Procurement Official Convicted Of Contract Fraud 23
Witness Testifies Daley Aide Told Him To Lie To Press About Political Hire 23
Former Pennsylvania Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug, Obstruction Charges 24
Fake Precious Metals Traders Caught In FBI Sting Face Sentencing 24

FBI Interested In Tape Of West Bank Man's Interview In Michigan MySpace Case 24
Virginia Sex Offenders To Be Monitored By GPS Technology 24
Pellicano Lawyers Say Prosecutors Slow To Turn Over Evidence 25

Civil Law:

High Court Rulings Curb Use Of Civil RICO 26

Civil Rights:

11th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of Florida Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn 26
Senate One Vote Away From Passing Flag Desecration Amendment 26

Antitrust:

Former Energy Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Prices 27
AGs Ask DOJ To Crack Down On Rising Gas Prices 27
Barr Pharma Settles Novartis Suit 27
Mittal Will Not Raise Arcelor Bid 27
EU Moves Toward Inclusion Of Turkey, Croatia 27
Mirant Withdraws Bid For NRG 28
Zale Ends Merger Discussions With Signet 28
BBVA Set To Enter Market For US-To-Mexico Payments 28
RIAA Head Says Illegal Song-Sharing "Contained." 29
German Antitrust Authorities Scrutinize Web Rights Deal 29

Environment:

Pipe Company Official Sentenced To Prison For Rigging Pollution Tests 29
EPA Rule Loosened After Texas Oil Exec Lobbied Rove 29
McCain Says There Will Be "Heavy Price" For Failing To Act On Climate Change 30
NYTimes Urges Kempthorne To "Resurrect" Interior's "Stewardship Of Public Lands." 30

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges In Connecticut Following Three-Month Investigation 30
"Pill-Popping" Parties Become Popular As More Teens Abuse Prescription Drugs 30
Tennessee Ranked Nation's Third-Highest State Encountering Meth "Scourge." 30
MLB Suspends Grimsley For Using Human Growth Hormone 30
Nearly 2 Percent Of American Indian Population Said To Be Using Meth 31
Afghanistan Seen As "Narco-State." 31
Marshals Service Takes Over Operation Of Connecticut Trash Hauling Business 31
Suspect In Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot Appears In Court 31

Immigration:

Sensenbrenner, Tancredo Criticize Senate Immigration Bill 32

Tax:

Nevada Man Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Tax Fraud 32
Sloan Says Estate Tax Repeal Would Hurt The "Small Rich." 32
WPost Laments Need For Wolf's Proposed Tax Code Commission 32

Congress-Administration:

House Expected To Approve $94.5 Billion Supplemental Spending Bill 33
Schwab Says US Eager For WTO Agreement, Not "Watered-Down" Compromise 33
Conservatives Pressure Bush To End Probe Of OSC Official 33
Before Joining White House Staff, Zinsmeister Blasted Clintons, Gore 33
Budget Deficit Down 16.6% From Last Year 34
Lobby Firms Paid For 90 Congressional Trips Over 2000-05 34
Pelosi Takes Case For Ousting Jefferson From Key Panel To Black Media 34
Supporters Rally To Hoyer In Wake Of Murtha Challenge 35
Congressional Democrats To Host Town Hall Meeting On 2006 Platform 35
Energy Department Informs 1,500 Workers Hacker May Have Accessed Personal ID 36
Voinovich Bill Aimed At Strengthening Performance Appraisal System 36
Byrd Becomes Longest-Serving Senator 36
Bush Daughter Moving To Manhattan 36
Pentagon's Small Institute Of Heraldry Creates All Presidential Seals, Plaques 36
WSJournal Criticizes Hayden Testimony 36

Other News:

Stocks Continue Slump On Interest Rate, Growth Worries 36
Dummar Takes Another Shot At Claiming Hughes Estate 37
Conflict Questions Raised About Getty Book Deal 37
Webb, Miller Stump For Votes On Eve Of Virginia Senate Primary 38
GOP Seen As Profiting From Good News Week 39
Bell Seen As Having Uphill Struggle In Texas Gubernatorial Race 39

DOJ_NMG_0032974

Eleven Senators May Run for Presidency In '08 39
Kansas GOP Split Could Foreshadow 2008 Presidential Primary 39
Laura Bush To Raise Funds For Santorum, Kean 40
Study Finds Volunteerism Rising 40
WSJournal Says 2003 Principle Should Apply When Justices Hear Punitive Damages Case 40
El-Baradei Criticizes Iranian Data Gaps 40
Hamas, Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In Palestinian Territories 41
Expert Says North Korea Trying To Get US Attention 42
Coburn Meets With UN Deputy Secretary General 42
Cuba Cuts Power To US Mission In Havana 42
Islamic Leader In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With US .. 43
World Bank Says Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Bird Flu .. 43
Chinese Officials Divided Over Booming Auto Market 43
Russian TV Show Promises Seats In Parliament To Young People 43
US Urged To Avoid "Public Spitting Match" With Egypt 43
Kristof Calls For Debate On Effectiveness Of Foreign Aid 44

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 44

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 45

DOJ_NMG_0032975

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Defends Domestic Surveillance Program In Detroit Courtroom. The AP (6/13, Karush) reports, "The U.S. government defended warrantless domestic surveillance in court for the first time Monday, saying the program is well within the president's authority but arguing that it would require revealing state secrets to prove that point." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit heard arguments in a case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against the National Security Agency. The ACLU is asking for an immediate halt to the program, arguing that it violates the rights to free speech and privacy. … The Bush administration has asked Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit on state-secrets grounds. … The ACLU says the Bush administration already has publicly revealed enough information about the program for Taylor to rule it is illegal. … But government attorney Anthony J. Coppolino told Taylor on Monday that the case cannot be decided based on a 'scant public record.' … 'This case does not involve easy questions,' he said. 'It's a case that requires a robust factual record.' … Coppolino alluded several times to a classified court filing, which Taylor indicated she had not yet reviewed. In that brief, 'we demonstrate that it (the program) is narrowly and specifically focused on al-Qaida,' he said. … The plaintiffs do not have access to the classified brief, and Taylor would have to make a special request and travel to Washington to read it, said Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director and the lead attorney for the plaintiffs."

The New York Times (6/13, Liptak) reports, "A National Security Agency program that listens in on international communications involving people in the United States is both vital to national security and permitted by the Constitution, a government lawyer told a judge here today in the first major court argument on the program. … But, the lawyer went on …, 'the evidence we need to demonstrate to you that it lawful cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security.' … The only solution to this impasse, the lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, said, was for Judge Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit before her, an American Civil Liberties Union challenge to the eavesdropping program, under the state secrets privilege. The privilege can limit and even extinguish cases that would reveal national security information, and it is fast becoming one of the Justice Department's favorite tools in defending court challenges to its efforts to combat terrorism." The Times notes, "The Detroit case was filed in January on behalf of journalists, scholars, lawyers and nonprofit organizations who contended that the possibility of government eavesdropping interfered with their work. In remarks to reporters after the 90-minute argument, Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, called the government's invocation of the state secrets privilege 'Orwellian doublespeak.' … 'They argued essentially that the N.S.A. program was off-limits to judicial review,' Mr. Romero said."

Knight Ridder distributes a Detroit Free Press article (6/13, Warikoo) that reports, "In vigorous arguments that offered clashing views on the limits of state authority, the U.S. Justice Department and civil rights advocates squared off in a packed Detroit courtroom for a hearing on whether the government's domestic surveillance program violates the U.S. Constitution." The Free Press continues, "The talk inside U.S. District Court on Monday morning went to the core of what should define American government and was followed across the country by legislators and citizens debating an essential question: How much power should the president have? … Making its case in court for the first time, the government argued that the president needs as much power as necessary to secure the country, especially as al-Qaida continues to threaten the United States with terrorist attacks. But an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union said that President Bush can't violate the law while trying to protect the country." Judge Taylor "set July 10 as the next court date to address the government's state secret arguments. Taylor did not say when she might make a ruling."

UPI (6/13) also reports on the courtroom arguments.

2nd Circuit Panel Presses CIA Attorney Over Withheld Documents. The New York Times (6/13, Hartocollis) reports, "A federal appeals court panel in Manhattan questioned a lawyer for the federal government yesterday as to whether the Central Intelligence Agency had a legitimate national security interest in refusing to confirm or deny the existence of documents authorizing it to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects overseas." The Times continues, "The tough questioning came in oral arguments by the American Civil Liberties Union and lawyers for the C.I.A.

DOJ_NMG_0032976

before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The civil liberties group is trying to force the C.I.A. to disclose how much authority it has been given to interrogate detainees since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." The Times adds, "Through the Freedom of Information Act, the A.C.L.U. is seeking documents, including a directive said to have been signed by President Bush, giving the agency the authority to set up detention sites outside the United States and to interrogate prisoners. In its lawsuit, the group says the existence of these documents has been hinted at in news reports. … But the government has refused to confirm or deny the documents' existence, saying that to do so would jeopardize national security by revealing C.I.A. methods and activities. Last September, Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of Federal District Court upheld that position, and yesterday's hearing was part of the A.C.L.U.'s appeal of his ruling. … The three-judge appeals panel seemed divided on the issue, with Judge John Gleeson asking the most forceful questions of the government lawyer, Peter Skinner. Judge Gleeson seemed to be trying to determine whether the A.C.L.U. was right in contending that the agency was acting to avoid political embarrassment, rather than out of national security interest."

Administration Backs Away From Official's Remarks On Guantanamo Suicides. The AP (6/13, Gearan) reports the Administration "distanced itself Monday from remarks by a U.S. diplomat that the weekend suicides of three Arab detainees at the Guantanamo Bay military prison were a 'good P.R. move.'" Assistant Secretary McCormack is quoted saying, "I would just point out in public that we would not say that it was a P.R. stunt. We have serious concerns anytime anybody takes their own life." The AP says Deputy Assistant Secretary Colleen Graffy "told the" BBC "that the deaths at the US-run camp in Cuba were a 'good P.R. move to draw attention'" and 'a tactic to further the jihadi cause.'" The AP notes, "Graffy's unscripted remarks threw a monkey wrench in the administration's careful plan to demonstrate concern over the deaths and respond to rising criticism of the U.S. operation of the prison. [President] Bush expressed 'serious concern' Saturday over the suicides, and he directed an aggressive effort by his administration to reach out diplomatically while it investigates."

Knight Ridder (6/13, Rosenberg, Clark) notes Graffy's job as the "deputy assistant secretary of state for public diplomacy…involves improving US public relations, especially in the Muslim world." The New York Times (6/13, Cloud, 1.19M) runs a similar report.

Military To Review Rules For Guantanamo Detainees In Wake Of Suicides. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 7, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported after three Guantanamo Bay detainees committed suicide over the weekend, "US military officials announced they will review the rules for handling and monitoring detainees at the prison camp. This will be an internal review separate from the Navy's criminal investigation."

Meanwhile, Knight Ridder (6/13, Rosenberg, Clark) reports "military pathologists have completed clinical autopsies of the three captives who hanged themselves over the weekend." Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, prison spokesman, said, "'Now it's the analytical part of the autopsy, compiling the report and making conclusions," adding "the team of medical examiners from the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology arrived Saturday and departed Sunday."

Detainee Has Been Cleared For Transfer. The AP (6/12, Selsky) reports, "One of the Guantanamo detainees who committed suicide had been cleared for transfer to another country, a second allegedly was involved in an Afghanistan prison uprising in which a CIA agent died, and a third had ties to al-Qaida." The Defense Department on Sunday "identified the three as Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi Al-Utaybi, Yassar Talal Al-Zahrani and Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen." Al-Utaybi "had been recommended for transfer to another country for continued detention, though the Defense Department did not specify where."

Groups Call For Independent Probe. The Washington Post (6/13, A4, White, 744K) reports, "Human rights groups and defense lawyers yesterday called for an independent investigation into the three detainee suicides at the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, questioning the military's preliminary explanation of how the men killed themselves and the way US officials have characterized the deaths." Amnesty International "officials said yesterday that an independent investigation 'is a matter of absolute urgency.'"

US Continues To Search For Country To Take Chinese Detainees. The Washington Times (6/13, Konviser, 90K) reports, "Authorities are looking for a new home for five Chinese Muslims who have been held in a refugee camp in a diplomatic limbo since being transferred to Albania from the US prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, last month." Albanian officials "say they see no viable future for the men in one of Europe's poorest countries, where no one speaks their language and the culture is fundamentally alien to their central Asian background."

DOJ_NMG_0032977

More Commentary. Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University and former constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, writes in USA Today (6/13, 2.31M), "Some foreign leaders posture as if Guantanamo's doors should just fly open. Residents of Madrid and London might dissent. Even so, the international criticism should not be dismissed. It should be seen as implied willingness to share the cost and burden of detention. If we can't try all the detainees, serious thought ought be given to having the UN convene an ad hoc international court."

USA Today (6/13, 2.31M) editorializes, "President Bush insists he 'would like to end' Guantanamo but needs first to wait for the Supreme Court ruling. That won't do. What Guantanamo represents needs changing, and immediately. It's time to lay out the evidence against those who need to be charged and release those who don't."

